I know not what the coming year
May bring of good or ill,
What cup of joy or cup of woe
For us the year may fill;

But this I know, the hand that shaped
This world for righteous ends;
The destiny of that world holds,
And to its purpose bends.

So come what may of good or ill,
'Tis from the hand of God;
A blessing it must prove at last,
Be it caress or rod.

With courage greet the coming year,
Away with craven fear,

In mercy is severe.

Prayer for Soldier Sons.

O God of infinite mercy, hear the mothers of this land as we plead before Thy throne for the loved ones we are sending forth to battle for the right. Though our hearts are bowed with sorrow, we pray not for ourselves; all our prayers, O God of love, are for them, the priceless treasures of our lives. We are willing to suffer, and, if need be, to die, for our country.

We would gladly give our lives to save these loved ones, dearer to us than life itself, who are going out to fight foes, seen and unseen, to face all the horrors of the battlefield, and perchance to die, that others may live, but by no word or look will we hold them back when duty calls them to save others.

Give them the manhood to meet this supreme test of life; give them strength of body, of mind and soul to do battle for the right, and to succor the women and children. Arm them with Divine power to smite evil; fold them in Thy loving arms; yea, though they walk through the valley of the shadow of death, may Thy presence banish every fear and Thy rod and Thy staff comfort them.

For three long years the men of our allies have battled for us as for their own homes, and their loved ones have endured the sorrows which now we must face. Our men go forth to help save us from ruin and the world from barbarism. We suffer, but we glory in their manhood. We dedicate our lives to this great cause that we may serve behind the lines while they carry forward the flag of civilization. The prayers of a world in agony, for whom these loved ones are fighting, are lifted up to Thee for these men.

They are offering all that earth holds dear, because they have heard Thy voice calling them to the noblest work to which lives were ever consecrated. Thy love, O God, our Father, excels all human love, so we leave them with Thee. To Thee have we committed them. They are Thine, created in Thy image. Into them Thou hast breathed the breath of life in its largest and divinest sense.

In their sacrifice, offering their lives that others may live, they are following in the footsteps of the Son of God Himself who died to make men free from the power of evil. We trust them, O God, to Thy infinite love, and to Thy ever-watchful eye. Hold them as in the hollow of Thy hand, for they are doing Thy work and fulfilling the teachings of Him who spake as never man spake, when He taught that greater love hath no man than that he is willing to lay down his life for others.

"Average human experience is determined by the character of average human activity; it is the response which God provides out of the infinitude of His resources to the demand which the average will and the average faith of man makes upon Him. But what if there were a human will which conceived an object of endeavor far nobler than the average? What if there were a faith which, faced by a difficult situation, was inspired to a demand upon God grander than the ordinary man ever dreams of? Must not God, by virtue of the very uniformity of His nature, respond to such an exceptional will and such an exceptionally faith in a correspondingly exceptional manner? Would not this exceptional response constitute a new departure in human experience?"—A. G. Hogg, "Christ's Message of the Kingdom."

The New Year.

'Tis midnight's hour, and everywhere
Rests on the air,
A holy hush
As if the world in silent prayer
Were looking up to God.
And gently drooping, soft and white
As feathers in Their downward flight,
The snowflakes fall, and veil from sight
The paths o'er nature trod.

And when the morning's golden beams
Shall rouse the world
From slumber's dreams,
O'er all the hills and vales and streams
A spotless robe shall lie;
A robe of unseen hands outspread,
A shroud to wrap
The old year, dead.
A clean page for the new, instead,
Dropped from the bending sky,

So, Heavenly Father, may Thy grace
As kindly cover
Every trace
Of my sad wanderings from Thy face;
Let not one spot remain.
Before me lies the new-born year,
Each page as yet
All white and clear,
Oh, help me write it in Thy fear
And keep it free from stain.

Here, in the solemn hour, I raise
My heart to Thee
In thankful praise
For all the good that crowned my days
Throughout the old year, gone.
Unto the new I cannot see,
I know not what
'Twill bring to me,
I only know Thou lovest me
And still wilt lead me on.

The Epiphany Call.

The Epiphany season unfolds or manifests the wonderful truths of Christmas, but also emphasizes another great truth upon which we desire to dwell. The truth is that the intensive perfection which we behold in the character of Christ was of such a nature that it could not be confined. Christ could not possess such qualities as we ascribe to Him and enjoy them alone. Because the greatest of those virtues was love, and because love necessarily goes out to those upon whom it is bestowed, we are invited during the Epiphany season to behold the extensive aspect of the character of Christ. The extension of His incarnation is not only symbolized in the perpetuation of the Eucharistic Memorial, but it is seen especially in His command that His gospel should be preached to all nations. Just as Christ could not "enjoy alone" the divine virtues that He possessed, so cannot we "enjoy alone" our participation in them, or as it has well been called, our "appropriation" of them.

Selfish, exclusive Christianity is as impossible a thing as black whiteness.

The Epiphany season is therefore the time above all others at which we are reminded of our obligations to others—to those at home or abroad whom we may bring to a saving knowledge of Christ. The two great spheres of opportunity that present themselves are those which were conspicuous at our last General Convention, namely, Social Service and Missions. Heathen both at home and abroad need our help.

It is our duty carefully to preserve due proportion in the amount of time, study and money that we devote to the various departments of the great extensive work of the Church. The parish has its claims upon us, and the "man of Macedonia" is constantly crying, "Come over and help us." Let us listen to both calls. They are both legitimate and imperious. Let us beware of individualism and of parochialism. Intensive work for ourselves or for the parish, in proportion as it deepens and strengthens within us a truly Christ-like character, will of necessity drive us beyond the limits of personal interest or of parochial development into the great world of opportunity beyond. We will acquire a vision like that of Jacob Riis, of Carey, of Livingstone, of St. Paul. Our slogan will be, "The whole wide world for Jesus." Our dearest hope will be that God may in some way use us in accomplishing a modern Epiphany. Our prayer will be that, as we tell the world of the Word that "became flesh and dwelt among us," all nations may behold "His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."—Church News (Mo.)

"He puts the fodder too high," was the comment on the sermons preached by a theological professor.

EPIPHANY.

Epiphany follows Christmas logically and necessarily, Jesus being what He was and is. He came not on a private errand, but for our sake, for the world's sake, and every purpose of His mission demanded that He be manifested unto men. If He was the light, then the light must shine abroad. If He was life and truth and love, then He must extend and expend Himself. If He came to save men, He must reach them, and if He would make them what He Himself is, they must know Him. The Christ, then, must be revealed and made known to all men. This, and not the isolated fact that wise men from afar were wondrously led to seek and find Him, is the lesson of the Epiphany.

An essential element in the incarnation of the Son of God is its universality. It is for every soul and every people and every generation in their every interest and relation and sphere of activity. Christ is the fulness of life, and nothing that affects human life, making it less or more, better or worse, is outside the range of His divine concern and operations. Whether there be one lowly soul in a secret place seeking grace of forgiveness and strength for the humble task of a single day, or the great composite soul of a mighty people groping for truer ideals and a larger liberty or rising in protest against ancient wrongs and errors, it is Christ who answers the aspiration which He has inspired, making it one more step in their knowledge of Him. He is come to touch and permeate human life everywhere and everhow, renewing, uplifting, sanctifying, making it worthy and blessed. As He is revealed unto men He is able to impart the fulness of the divine favor. As He personally enters into their lives and hearts and is acknowledged in all their ways can He give them life indeed. But except as He is manifested in His truth and power and spirit His mission falls as a light unseen, a truth unknown, a love refused and thrown back upon itself unsatisfied.

The purpose and desire of our Lord in this respect is very plain indeed. And equally so is the fact that He expects and desires every soul to whom He has imparted His life and thereby made him His own, to be sharer with Him in this design. If one is made a partaker of Christ, a recipient in any degree of His salvation and spirit, surely he cannot willingly, or without conscious dereliction, fail to be of one mind with His Master in this longing endeavor that He be manifested unto all men, and to welcome the responsibility laid upon Him of making His name known in the earth. Otherwise he is failing to receive Christ in His fulness and is refusing a very essential element in his own salvation. But strange to say, this is a conception which some Christians have been slow to grasp. So narrow and unworthy is their idea of what it is to be a son of God, so mechanical or commercial is their view of what salvation is and how it is wrought in the soul, that they miss its crowning grace and glory, which is fellowship with Christ in His divine adventure for the world's redemption. In manifold ways may this fellowship be evidenced, for it is a many-sided Christ with a wondrously wide mission whom we serve; in one way only can it be gained, by cultivating the spirit which is His, and letting the mind be in us which was also in Christ Jesus, who counted not His heavenly majesty and glory a thing to be grasped and held, but to be surrendered and vacated that He might bring redeeming life to His brethren, to make them know God in the revelation of His Son.

To be partaker with Him in that high enterprise is His challenge to every soul that names His name. The call comes in terms that are so familiar, the cause is presented in guises that are so homely and commonplace, that we may easily miss the inspiration of the one and the worth and dignity of the other, failing to see the Christ in them. Now it is missions presenting an unceasing claim, and now an opportunity for personal service in the ministrations of the Church; now a demand for large sacrifices in behalf of a great and righteous cause, and now the appeal of a single case of sorrow or need or sinfulness for a sympathizing heart and a helping hand in His name; now a wrong to be righted, now a load to be lifted, now a word in season to be spoken, now a little child to be taught a lesson of love; now only the daily life to be lived and its duties done on a high, unselfish, spiritual plane; but always Christ to be manifested and His ways to be made known among men, that He may see the travail of His soul and be satisfied.

It costs something now as in the days of His flesh. The blood of the Innocents and the flight into Egypt remind us of that, and the cross on which the Christ was lifted up to draw men unto Him assures it. But the cost has its great compensations. It is the purchase price of the finest fruition of our lives, the shining badge of those who are the friends of Christ.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF JERUSALEM IN THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

A Sermon

Preached by Rev. Wallace E. Rollins, D. D., Professor of Church History in the Virginia Theological Seminary, in the Bethlehem Chapel of the Holy Nativity, Washington Cathedral, Mount St. Alban, the Fourth Sunday in Advent, December 23, 1917, on the occasion of a special service of thanksgiving for the recovery of Jerusalem.

"Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her: rejoice for joy with her, all ye that mourn for her."—Isaiah 66:10.

We have met together to-day to celebrate, with joy and thanksgiving, an event that has sent a thrill throughout Christendom; an event that has deeply stirred the emotion of all Jews, Mos-gether to celebrate an event of world-wide significance, for the occupation of Jerusalem by Christians on December 11, 1917, after an almost continuous Moslem possession of 1,280 years, will have, in the language of the British Prime Minister, "a profound influence on the history of the world."

It is most fitting that we should assemble here in this Bethlehem Chapel in the capital of our country to give humble and hearty thanks to Almighty God for so great a gift. It is fitting also that, in the midst of our praise, we should pause to meditate on the Significance of Jerusalem in the history of the world.

For at least thirty-three hundred years Jerusalem has wielded, either directly or indirectly, a profound, and often a determining, influence upon the destinies of the world, and this influence has not been due to the fact that she has ever been a great political and a military capital like Rome or Constantinople, or a great center of commerce like Tyre or Corinth, or a great intellectual center like Athens or Tarsus or Alexandria. Nor has her great influence been due to a highly favored location; for she sits on a high and barren Judean plateau, thirty-four miles from the sea, and isolated from the great highways between the East and the West, bare of many of the necessities of life.

Her power has been due solely to her history and to her sacred associations. She became the religious capital of the world and the most venerated sanctuary on earth because she was the bearer of a Divine message to the world. It was here on this barren spot, to quote the words of her greatest historian, that "She arose who, more than Athens and more than Rome, taught the world civic justice and gave her name to the ideal city that men are ever striving to build on earth, to the City of God that shall one day descend from heaven—the New Jerusalem. For her builder was not Nature nor the wisdom of men, but on that secluded and barren site the Word of God, by her prophets, laid her eternal foundations in righteousness, and reared her walls in her peoples' faith in God."

When Jerusalem first comes into the clear light of history—about 1,400 years before Christ—she is a fortress, of no ordinary strength, under a Semitic chieftain Abd-Khiba, who held his position under the king of Egypt. The name of the city even then was "Urusalim." All this and much more we learn from the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, eight of which were written from Jerusalem itself.

About the year 1000 B. C., as every child knows, this fortress was captured from the Jebusites by King David. It is interesting to recall that David, contrary to the customs of his time, generously spared the lives and the property of the inhabitants—a thing that has seldom happened in its many subsequent captures. David made Jerusalem the capital of all Israel. He brought the sacred ark there and made Jerusalem the religious center of the twelve tribes.

Solomon built a magnificent temple of stone on Mt. Moriah for the wandering Ark. He greatly increased the population and the buildings of the city. "If he found it little more than a fort he left it a city."

In the eighth century it was for full fifty years the scene of the inspired ministry of Isaiah. He is the real creator of the spiritual Jerusalem. He became the interpreter of her divine mission, of God's purpose through her to the whole world. It was, as has been suggested by George Adam Smith, the advance of Assyria in the eighth century B. C. that made Israel for the first time realize the world as a whole, just as the aggressions of German militarism in this twentieth century have forced America out of her provincialism and have made her, for the first time, conscious of the world as a whole and of her mission to the world.

In the year 621 B. C. the Law was discovered in the Temple, and, as a result, a great reformation was begun. Worship was centralized at Jerusalem. Henceforth there was to be but one altar. Henceforth the nation was really the city—the rest of the nation was but the outskirts of Jerusalem.

In 586 B. C. Jerusalem was captured and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar and many of its inhabitants were deported to Babylon. But, though in a strange land, their hearts turned ever to Jerusalem. "By the waters of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept when we remembered Zion."—Psalm 137:1.

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy."

The exiles returned to their land in the year 537 under Cyrus, king of Persia, and in a few years more a new temple was built and dedicated, and later still in the year 458 her walls were rebuilt by Nehemiah.

I will not speak of Jerusalem's tragic history during the Greek period—of its many sieges, captures, and desecrations, as, for example, "the Abomination of Desolation" in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes in the year 168 B. C.

The glory of the city revived in the year 165 B. C., when Jerusalem became, and continued for nearly a century to be, the capital of a more or less independent Jewish state.

In the year 63 B. C. it was captured by Pompey for the Romans, and was under Rome when our Lord was born.

The Holy City was most intimately associated with our Saviour's life and ministry. In was this city which He visited as a boy. It was here that He drove the money-changers from the temple. It was to this city that He went up to attend the Feasts. It was here that He had His memorable conversation with Nicodemus. It was into this city that He made His triumphant entry. It was in this city that He instituted the Last Supper. It was the city which He loved and over which He wept. It was the scene of His trial and condemnation and He was crucified just outside its walls. It was here also that He arose from the dead and it was in the sight of this city that He ascended into heaven. These events, all occurring within the brief space of a few months, have given to Jerusalem a glory and a pathos that can never fade away, and have made it for Christians the most venerated spot in all the world.

In 66 A. D. the Jews rebelled against the Roman Empire and in the year 70 Jerusalem was captured and destroyed by Titus. One million one hundred thousand Jews are said to have perished in the awful struggle and 97,000 were taken prisoners.

The fourth century of our era marks a new epoch in the history of Jerusalem. The Emperor Constantine became a patron of Christianity, and built a magnificent church—the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre—on the site of the tomb of our Lord. His mother, Helena, built the Ascension Church on the Mount of Olives.

In the year 637 A. D. occurred one of the saddest events in all the tragic history of Jerusalem. The city was besieged by the Khalif Omar and his Arabian Moslems. The Patriarch of Jerusalem was Sophronius, one of the most learned bishops in the Church, and one of the ablest defenders of the faith, and who deserves to rank with the great Athanasius. Under his inspiration the Christians fought valiantly for four months, but resistance was hopeless. Sophronius agreed to surrender the city if the Khalif himself should come to the walls and receive it. Omar agreed, and, entering the city, forced the aged patriarch to be his guide to the holy places. Omar erected a mosque of wood on the temple area which bears his name to this day, and which is the most sacred spot to Moslems, next to Mecca. On this same spot a magnificent stone building—the Dome of the Rock—was built in 688 A. D. by Khalif Abd-al-Melik. That great black dome shines in the sunlight to-day almost exactly as it did 1,229 years ago.

Late in the eleventh century Palestine was overrun by the Seljuk Turks—rude and savage tribes from Central Asia. Jerusalem was captured. Many Christians were imprisoned and many sold into slavery. Christian pilgrims were mistreated. All this led to the Crusades—those romantic episodes in history whose glamour affects us still. A burning zeal took hold of the Christian world to be in possession of

"Those holy fields,
"Over whose acres walked those blessed feet,

"Which fourteen hundred years ago were nailed

"For our advantage on the bitter Cross."

Millions of lives were lost in the attempt to win the Holy Sepulchre. Jerusalem was captured by the first Crusaders in 1099. For eighty-eight years a Latin kingdom was set up in Jerusalem (1099-1187)—Christian in name, but not always in deed. Whatever may be said of the misguided zeal and the cruelties of the Crusaders, the fact remains that they bear eloquent testimony to the idealism of the Middle Ages, for they came to her, "not like most other invaders, because she was the road to somewhere else, but because she was herself, in their eyes, the goal of all roads, the central and most blessed province of the world." It is with gratitude that we now recall the fact that generous, idealistic France took the leading part in the crusades. The crusades began and ended in France.

In the year 1517 the Ottoman Turks captured Jerusalem, and, with the exception of a brief period of Egyptian occupation, have held it to the present time. Thus the adherents of Islam have held Jerusalem, with a few brief intermissions, since 637 A. D. Of this time the Ottoman Turks have held it almost continuously for 400 years.

Such is a fragmentary sketch of the history of Jerusalem. It is a tragic history. No city in the world has had a more tragic one. But now at last her day of deliverance has come! Two weeks ago to-day, as all the world knows, Jerusalem was surrendered to the British forces, under General Allenby. On December 11 the official entry took place. General Allenby entered the city reverently and on foot through the historic Jaffa Gate. Near this gate is a breach in the walls made to allow the proud Emperor of Germany to enter in state in 1898, but this breach was not used on this historic occasion. The commander-in-chief lems and Christians. We are met to-day accompanied by representatives of his own army, and by the commanders of the French and Italian detachments, and by a military representative of the army of the United States. Once more the inspired prophecy of Isaiah has come true:

"Break forth into joy, sing together. ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord has comforted His people, He hath redeemed Jerusalem. The Lord hath made bare His holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."—Isaiah 52:9-10.

The City of Jerusalem during its long history has been besieged more than fifty times and has been captured almost as often. But this capture of Jerusalem by the British is, in many respects, unique among all its conquests.

Never before has so much consideration been shown by any captor for the city and for its sacred places. Turkish guns, concealed near the city and upon the Mount of Olives, fired upon the British troops, who did not reply for fear of injuring the Holy City, but with great bravery stormed the guns with rifle and bayonet. As a result, not one stone of the city has been broken or torn down by its capture.

Never before has a conquering army shown such consideration for the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Not one of its 60,000 inhabitants was killed or even injured.

Never before have the inhabitants of the city welcomed a conquering army with clapping hands, with shouts and tears of joy. Never before in the long list of conquerors—Babylonian, Persians, Greek, Roman, Arabian, Turkish, Crusader—has a conqueror been acclaimed by the inhabitants, as was General Allenby. Flowers were strewn in his path as he entered the city by Jews, by Moslems and by Christians! What a tribute to the character, to the fairness, the justice and the generosity of our valiant ally, Great Britain!

There is one other respect in which this deliverance of Jerusalem will, we devoutly trust, prove unique. All other deliverances have been temporary. This, please God, shall be permanent. Never again shall the Holy City be turned over to the cruelties of the unspeakable Turk, nor shall it ever be dominated again by his still more unspeakable masters in Berlin.

What will be the results of this last great deliverance?

Pilgrims will flock again in ever-increasing numbers to worship at the sacred places of the Holy Land. Jerusalem will be made sanitary, and pilgrims will have every care and guidance. The holy places will be reverently guarded and protected.

Archaeologists will have the opportunity, unhampered by Turkish bigotry and interference, to make fresh discoveries which will illuminate and confirm our sacred narratives. The old Jerusalem is buried from twenty to forty feet below the present city. Scientific investigation will settle many a disputed question of topography and will bring to light many new facts in regard to the city of Christ and His Apostles.

It may be that many Jews of all lands, inspired by prophecy, and by their intense affection for the land of their fathers, will return to Palestine and build again a Jewish state, under British or allied protection.

But the greatest result of this last deliverance of Jerusalem will be its immense influence upon the sentiments of mankind—upon the scattered Jews throughout the world, upon the many millions of Moslems, and upon Christians of every name. The military importance of the capture of Jerusalem may or may not be great, but the world, after all, is ruled by its sentiments and affections, and it may be that December 11, 1917, will yet prove to be the turning point in this great war. At any rate, the great significance to us of this capture of Jerusalem is that it is one more step in the great world-wide battle for righteousness, liberty and peace. One more stone has been laid in the building of that Ideal City which men are ever striving to build on this earth—the City of God that shall one day descend from heaven—the New Jerusalem.

May God grant that America shall do her part in the building of that city!

THE LOST CHORD.

(A chapter from "The Cross at the Front," by Thomas Tiplady, Chaplain of the Forces. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.)

Last night I cycled into the neighboring village to make inquiries about a lad who had perished in the fighting. As I drew near the church I heard sounds of music floating out through the shattered windows. If a seraph had stood in the streets of the village and sung heavenly songs to us, he could hardly have caused greater surprise to the occasional passers-by. The village lies forsaken. Every house is in ruins, or bears the marks of shells. There, at the crossroads, where the sentry stands, a shell burst a few weeks ago. The soldier on duty felt no pain and needed no burial. Now, on the same spot, stood another soldier wistfully listening to the music of the church. The civilians have fled, and taken their belongings with them. A stranger race—an aforesaid enemy—guards for them their land. The heroic breed is not dead, and in that youthful sentry is seen the England of a thousand years. I blessed him as I passed him; for in him I saw all the undimmed and undying glory of the race.

I placed my bicycle against the church wall, and sought the back entrance. The right-hand corner of the priest's garden wall had been blown away. The damaged archway had been propped up with a pole, and the path was blocked by a large shell-crater. The door of the vestry was off its hinges, and the floor was littered with books, vestments, and debris. Stepping over obstructions, I passed into the chancel. What a sight! A shell had been hurled through the centre of the wall immediately above the altar. The wall was two and a half feet thick, but it had broken before the invader like brown paper. A hole two yards wide gaped like a wound. The picture above the altar had been blown into a thousand fragments, and these were lying about the floor and window-sills. The altar, with its ornaments, lay crushed beneath a mass of masonry. The windows and the communion-rail were shattered to pieces and scattered far and wide. A lump of stone had been carried from above the altar into the pulpit. A still larger stone had been hurled to the other end of the church and lay in the central aisle. It seemed the work of some mad giant—some Samson insane with sorrow for the loss of his eyes. Stones had smashed through the back of the movable pews and, with bits of the communion-rail, strewn the floor and the seats. Plaster from the ceiling, fragments from the lamps, and stained glass from the windows crunched under my feet. I felt as guilty as if I were treading on lilies. I understood Jeremiah's tears. Chairs lay on the floor overturned, like cripples, and no one lifted them. The unheinged side-door leaned helplessly against the wall. It was a scene of desolation—a holy place desecrated by the dance of devils. Yet, looking down from a picture on the wall, was the sweet face of the Virgin. Straining to her breast her beautiful Babe, she seemed to be shielding Him from the horrible happenings about Him. But the figure of the suffering Saviour nailed against the wall on the opposite side showed how impotent even a mother's love may be.

Out from the soul of the organ came a chord sweet as the fragrance of violets at the unsealing of a maiden's letter, and "dear as remembered kisses after death." It was the Lost Chord of Germany. All unconsciously the English lad at the French organ was calling up the spirit of old Germany to witness the havoc of new Germany in the temple of the God it has ceased to worship.

At the peril of his life he was touching those ivory keys. Straight before him gaped the great hole above the altar. Yet he played on. A few days before he had leapt over the parapet amid a murderous fire, and, armed with bomb and bayonet, had sought the evil heart of a race that has become the disgrace and terror of mankind. But now the war was forgotten. He was back in the old days, and he heard not the sound of the guns. Peace wrapped him round as with a phalanx of angels' wings. By the incantation of his music he had called up the soul of old Germany as in the ancient days the Witch of Endor called back the soul of the sad-eyed Samuel. It sang of the shame and sorrow brought upon it by its children. "Hear My Prayer" trembled upon the air as from a soul in pain. Crushed beneath the iron heel of the Prussian, like a daisy beneath the hoof of a stamping war-steed, the ancient spirit of Germany cried for deliverance. The Hymn of Hate deafens in the streets which once echoed to the sacred melodies of young Luther. The grieved spirit of Mendelssohn turns away from the lifeless churches of his own land, as Paul turned away from the synagogues of his countrymen. Passing over the desolation of No Man's Land, he enters a ruined shrine and finds at the organ one with whom he may commune, and together the German musician and the English soldier pray for the return to the Fatherland of the gospel that makes men great. "Hear My Prayer." Will God hear, and send a new Luther to save Germany from the new tyrant and the new superstition? Or will He let the nation perish in its sins?

The prayer of Mendelssohn died away into silence, and a message of comfort floated through the ruined church. "O rest in the Lord; wait patiently for Him, and He shall give thee thy heart's desire. O rest in the Lord." It was a song of hope to the broken-hearted nations which have been swept into the vortex of this world-tragedy. It floated out through the shattered windows, and I saw a soldier quietly listening without. Oh that the bereaved and anxious might hear it, and rest in the Lord! The priest of the church was away in the trenches, but God had sent to us from heaven a prophet of the old and better Germany. The voice of Mendelssohn grew still, and there came to us the voices of English men and English women sweetly singing of the faith that had made light for them the valley of the shadow of death, and bidding us be of good courage. They had sung the hymn on the sinking deck of the Titanic—and they were singing it still:

Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee;
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me,
Still all my song shall be,
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

"Though like the wanderer," the lad could not be silent. He lifted up his voice and sang with the heavenly visitors. Then came the sound of other voices. They were from over the sun-daring sea. Under their influence we forgot the ruined church. We were home again. The melody, "I hear you calling me," passed out through the broken windows and wafted our spirits over the waters as on the wings of angels.

"It's enough to break a man's heart, isn't it, sir?" said a soldier who had just entered the chancel, and was looking at the ruins. From the soul of the organ came the answer:

Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

There was one sanctuary left unscarred; one Rock that towered above the surging floods of hate and lust; and the lad at the organ had found it.

While I draw this fleeting breath,
When my eyelids close in death,
When I soar to worlds unknown,
See Thee on Thy Judgment Throne,
Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

He was a simple soldier—a private in the Rangers—who a few days before had seen hundreds of his comrades fall at his side as he charged through a triple curtain of fire, and he was playing, from memory, the songs that soothed his spirit. He was holding companionship with the truths by which men live, and for which men die. And he brought from the soul of the organ the chord which modern Germany has lost, and which no nation can lose and live. The German dead on the slopes around are the silent witnesses.

CHURCH WAR COMMISSION.

$500,000 Needed on January 27.

As has been already stated in the Church press, the Church War Commission will within a few weeks call upon the Church for a contribution of $500,000 for the prosecution of its work. This work, let it be noted, is not conducted in rivalry with that of the Y. M. C. A., but is supplementary to it. As Dr. Mott has well said, the Y. M. C. A., composed of laymen, and the commissioned and voluntary chaplains, being the clergy, are indispensable to each other in the work of the Church for the men of the Army and Navy.

Bishop Lawrence, President of the Church War Commission, writes in regard to the contribution, which will be asked on January 27, as follows:

"The question is often asked, is the money that we are spending for campaign work in our Diocese to count towards that $500,000? The answer is, no. The analogy of the methods of our Board of Missions is a good one. Each Diocese does a certain amount of missionary work in its Diocese, in addition to that which it contributes to the Board of Missions, for the general work of the Church, that money to be distributed by the Board where it is most needed.

"A number of the Dioceses have heavy camp expenses. Others have none. Those that have heavy camp expenses will support them and also give towards this general fund. If, however, there comes a request from any one of those Dioceses for an appropriation from the general fund to help them in their Diocesan camp responsibility, the War Commission can draw from the one-half million dollars for that help. For illustration, the Diocese of Pennsylvania has a budget of perhaps $50,000 for expenditure in its Diocese. It is planning to raise $100,000 towards the War Commission. Its total campaign therefore will be $150,000. The $100,000 will be used by the War Commission for distribution where most needed.

"On the other hand, some Southern Diocese may be very heavily loaded with camp expenditure. Its resources are strained to the utmost. It will do everything in its power to support the work in its borders. It will, as a matter of church loyalty, make some contribution to the general fund; and then the War Commission may send back to that Diocese an appropriation from the general fund to reinforce the Diocese in its heavy campaign responsibilities, hence every Diocese should give towards this campaign as they give towards general missions. Those with heavier responsibilities will receive aid from the general fund. Those Dioceses which have light campaign responsibilities must be depended upon for large gifts, hence the difficulty of the War Commission making any exact apportionment, although they may, from their central point of view, suggest a rough figure.

"This, however, is the one war call of the Church. Men and women of the Church have given in large figures for the excellent work of the Y. M. C. A. and loyalty to the Church will prompt them also to give in large figures to their own Church work."

The Great Commission

THE AFTERMATH OF THE PILGRIMAGE.

A Letter from the Office of the Woman's Auxiliary.

This war had not been long upon its dreadful way before it roused a feeling among English Christians which impelled them to call for a Nation-wide Mission of Repentance and Hope.

Stirred by that call, there was formed the Society of the Pilgrimage of Prayer. This Pilgrimage was taking place in the summer before our Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions was to hold its Triennial meeting, in October, 1916. It was there resolved that American Churchwomen also should enter upon a Pilgrimage of Prayer.

Its method has been described and its progress related in the pages of our Church papers, especially in those of "The Spirit of Missions." Both methods and progress differed from those pursued in England. With us, the Church Year from Advent 1916 to Advent 1917 made up the cycle of our pilgrimage, and the prayers arose week by week from diocese after diocese until the round of the American Church and its missions had been made. The subjects of our prayers were chosen while we were still a neutral people, but in their petitions for unity, peace and the coming of the Kingdom among man, every purpose of the prayers we use to-day is found.

In the January number of "The Spirit of Missions," the official record of this Pilgrimage Year was ended, but since those pages were printed some word has come from distant places, without which that record would not be complete, and we give them in here that our Churchmen may not lose their incentive.

As far back as last May a committee of preparation was formed for the District of Hankow, and its week in the following October was kept with daily celebrations in some churches and less frequent Communion in others and with prayer-meetings planned by native and foreign clergy and led by Bible women, members of the Woman's Auxiliary and Juniors, and the girls of St. Hilda's School. The Rev. S. C. Hwang preached on Chinese Unity to Chinese women, and the Rev. A. M. Sherman conducted a Quiet Hour for the foreign women of the Wuchang compound. In Ichang a little company of five—one an Englishwoman and one a Churchwoman from Virginia—joined in English intercessions. In Changsha the arrival of thousands of soldiers from Szechuan combined with rain in torrents failed to keep a company of twenty sincere and earnest souls from the two celebrations and two afternoon meetings that had been planned. In one period set apart for continuous intercession men and women of Ichang both took their share. From that station, one thousand miles up the Yangtze, Deaconess Ridgely writes: "It seems easy to pray earnestly. I am sure we were feeling the power of all the weeks of prayer that went before."

China's week most happily included the Feast of All Saints, which to our Christians is as a second Easter, and Mrs. Gilman, President of the District Branch of the Auxiliary, says: "I think a week of prayer for the whole Auxiliary at All Saints' time each year would be a lovely thing."

From Japan, Deaconess Knapp writes that in Tokyo there was a daily celebration in the Cathedral at 6:45, with special prayers at evensong, and Mrs. Wallace adds: "The prayers and Litany for Missions, so helpful at this time, will not cease to be of use in future years."

In Kyoto District the priests in charge at mission stations were asked to have a celebration on the Sunday and to speak at one of the services upon prayer. The Rev. Mr. Powell, of St. John the Evangelist's, Boston, visiting in Kyoto at the time, conducted two Quiet Days, one for the workers in that city and its neighborhood and one for those on the west coast. Kyoto's week immediately preceded that of their special anniversary evangelistic meetings, and this gave the Christians a special object for prayer, which surely added to the efficacy of the meetings of the succeeding week.

In Cuba thirty-eight Havana women gathered for a special service with their Bishop; the priest of the colored mission at Limonar sent out a Pilgrimage leaflet to the Spanish speaking people; the Juniors at Guantanamo had a Corporate Communion when about fifty communicants assembled, and there, and in the Hooker School in Mexico, the pupils received daily instruction in the subjects of the petitions of the Pilgrimage.

At the end of the year those who had been praying in their separate places in their appointed weeks were asked to join in the closing week of prayer, and we can well believe that thousands of hearts re-echoed the thought expressed by a worker in the Virginia mountains, who wrote: "It seems as though every year ought to be a Pilgrimage Year. I don't see any use in stopping!"

To those of us who have been on pilgrimage, not one week only, or two, but through every week of this year, there has ceased to be the thought of stopping; the necessity is on us more than ever for keeping on. Are not too many in our Church and nation still too like what a correspondent in a small country place in England says of her neighbors: "This is practically a very godless little backwater, and though there is scarcely a house where there has not been a great loss, and for all there is the terrible anxiety, yet prayer seems to be the last thing wished for. It was very awful to me, when after two years I came home from France, where every day the services in the little Roman Catholic church were attended by every one and on Fridays there were special services and prayers.

"I do think if our great desires can be prayers, they are made. For we work, we all have incessant work, and the greatest anxieties, for over three years. It seems as though one could never be away from the awful grandeur of this sacrifice! And the splendid friendship between the two great English speaking peoples, both living, working and dying for the same mighty cause, is the greatest help—the spiritual bond most of all.

"It seems very beautiful and fitting, the beautiful unity of souls this Pilgrimage plan makes."

So, if the Pilgrimage Year has taught its followers anything, it must have taught us this—the absolute necessity for prayer. The Blessed Lord, who is our Great Example, had a work to do to which He gave incessant toil, but a part of that labor of His most laborious earthly life was performed in the silence of the night and in the loneliness of the garden where He wrestled in prayer with God. It will be happy for us not to wait till loss and suffering and sorrow intensified drive us, like our friends in France, to our churches and to our knees. In the Sacred Feast spread before us for our strength and blessing, in the opening before God the desires of our hearts for the restoration of this world through the coming of His Kingdom, we shall find that which He would have the seed and root of every deed of love to our fellows—believing and confiding love and trust in Him.

There will always be some fresh advance before our pilgrim. Two papers lately issued mean immediate opportunity.

In 1846 there was established by the society known as "The World's Evangelical Alliance" what they call "The Annual Universal Week of Prayer." During this week, January 6-12, 1918, they ask "all Christians" to "pray daily" for such objects as "the Universal Church," "the Nations and their Rulers," "Missions among Moslems and Heathen," "Home Missions and the Jews," "Families, Schools and Colleges and the Young." And in the week, January 18-25, the members of our own World Conference on Faith and Order are asking us to pray earnestly for "the Reunion of Christendom" and for "the blessing and guidance of all efforts to that end."

"Of all efforts."—There is a hope that springs undying in our hearts through all these darkest days. We feel it as Christians and non-Christians are brought into a new and close comradeship and understanding, born of a common struggle; we feel it in the drawing together of helping companies under the leadership of the same White Companion; we feel it as our President of the Board of Missions and his one associate venture perilous waters and the untried risks of the West Coast of Africa to remind us—what we are so prone to forget—that the world wide, age long warfare is always on. And this hope is sure and certain as God's promise, and its fulfillment each passing day draws nearer, for, "The dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet into the way of peace."

Letter to Missionary Givers, from Bishop Lloyd.

Bishop Lloyd, before leaving on his mission to Liberia, left the following message for the contributors to the Church's work under the auspices of the Board of Missions during the fiscal year 1916-1917:

"This is to thank you again for your help. Your co-operation in the Church's Mission during the past year has meant blessing to the work, and I trust to you also.

"It is true we have a deficit of $143,000 in our Missionary treasury. But this, I am sure, is but a passing phase—a lack which the Church will care for when she has become adjusted to life under war conditions.

"It must be remembered that heretofore the undesignated legacies have been used to keep down deficits, which was not the case in the year just closed. The Church through General Convention spoke against this unwise policy and hence these legacies have been reserved for strengthening and advancing the work. Under the old policy the deficit would not have occurred; but the Church wants to meet her own obligations. She is no longer content to use up the gifts of the departed in meeting the responsibilities of the living. We can thank God that this day has come.

"You will be pleased to know that the One Day's Income Plan reached a total of $132,286.08. Without it we should have had a deficit of alarming proportions. But, heartening as this total is, the most encouraging feature is that over two thousand new contributors were added to the list of the Plan's friends. The value of this Plan will always consist in enlisting each year new thousands who, by thus consecrating the income of one day as a thank offering, additional to their usual gifts through the parish, will come to realize what a personal and intimate share each one has in accomplishing that which our Lord entrusted to us as His co-laborers. The devotion and increased interest thus stirred in the hearts of its friends—that is the richness the One Day's Income Plan brings to the work. The splendid total of the offerings is secondary.

"Let our prayers to our Heavenly Father be filled with thanksgiving for what He has enabled us to do; with intercession that other thousands may be led to grasp the beauty of this service; with supplication for blessing on the work, and on the workers who must be strengthened to carry the Message of the Prince of Peace more vigorously to those who know not the Father, while at the same time we are espousing the cause of righteousness and freedom on the battlefields abroad.

"If we do this, we can enter upon the new year with every confidence that the Church will be found completely faithful and that God will abundantly prosper our handiwork. Thank you again.

"Very truly yours,
"A. S. LLOYD."

A Chinese Christian educated in this country and now practicing law in Shanghai sends some interesting information to a friend in the United States with regard to the present situation in China;

"China's policies are still complicated. The dissolution of Parliament and the extrusion of the de jure President showed on the part of Chinese militarists now in power at Peking that they have neither idea of nor respect for constitutional government and have ridden roughshod over the liberties of the people. Consequently the country is again on the verge of splitting into halves and each making grimaces against the other and fighting mountain pass battles in the interior, while famine, flood and pestilence run riot in the land. The country has entered into the war and the entry was made an excuse to plunge the country into civil commotion first by the attempt to restore the monarchy and then by restoring the republic with the militarists entrenched in arbitrary power. The government of China to-day is nothing but an oligarchy very much like the military clique in Berlin or Potsdam, and until it is dissolved or driven out and exterminated there will be no peace in this fair land, just as there is none in Europe. The problem of China is the same as that of the West. Militarism versus democracy. Both sides or regions of the world problem must be met and faced and fought out and one faction must win. I am hopeful that the cause of democracy will prevail in the West, so that the moral victory and the moral forces that that victory will release and strengthened will help defeat the forces of evil in this land.

"Some of our best public men have been proscribed by the militarists by the methods of Czarism, Sutanism and Manchuism and Kaiserism. All these isms are blood brothers in spite of racial and climatic differences. The worst is the revived Manchuism in China, for in its path is nothing but destruction with no redeeming feature; it is degrading to China and morally bankrupt and is but hastening the country to absolute ruin. I can liken the system and condition of this country to nothing in history. It is even worse than the gradual decay, the vices, the utter rottenness of Rome in its lowest depths of degradation. Such is China in politics and in big business and in society, both of which latter is sucked dry and demoralized by the relentless vampires masquerading under the cloak of officialdom. The country will need your prayers and American assistance if it is going to survive."

This must always be the truth which must underlie all understanding of the Incarnation. Man belongs to God. The human nature belongs to the Divine. It came to its best only by entrance and possession of it by Divinity. The Incarnation, let us always be sure, was not unnatural and violent, but in the highest sense supremely natural. It is the first truth of all our existence that man is eternally the son of God. No man who forgets or denies that truth can really lay hold of the lofty fact that God entered into man.—Phillips Brooks.

Church Intelligence

Congratulations to Bishop Brooke.

At its last quarterly meeting, the Board of Missions learned that on the Feast of the Epiphany, Bishop Brooke, of Oklahoma, would observe the twenty-fifth anniversary of his consecration. It placed the enclosed minute upon its records.

"The Board of Missions congratulates the Right Rev. Francis Key Brooke, D. D., upon the completion of twenty-five years as Missionary Bishop of Oklahoma. Going to his field at the Church's call in the pioneer days, Bishop Brooke has seen Oklahoma grow into one of the greatest States of the Union, embracing two missionary districts. His devotion to duty, his forgetfulness of self, his readiness to serve the humblest of God's children—these and many other qualities have endeared him to the people of the Church and of the State. The Board of Missions sends greetings to Bishop Brooke, his clergy and his people, and wishes them God-speed as they go on in their work together for the upbuilding of the Church in their great Commonwealth.

Resignation of the Missionary Bishop of Utah.

In view of the findings of the Commission of House of Bishops appointed to examine his case, the Missionary Bishop of Utah has addressed the following letter to the Presiding Bishop.

Bishop's House,
Salt Lake City, Utah.

Dec. 20, 1917.

The Right Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., 74 Vandeventer Place, St. Louis, Mo.
Right Reverend and Dear Sir:

Having received the report of the Commission authorized by the House of Bishops to inquire into the whole subject of my loyalty and my usefulness as Bishop of Utah, in which report the Commission unanimously advises me to resign, I, therefore, acting on that advice, hereby tender you my resignation as Missionary Bishop of Utah to take effect whenever it is accepted. This action is taken with the distinct understanding that there are no charges standing against me touching my good character or integrity, for if there be any such I insist upon a trial of them.

My reason for submitting this resignation is not merely to comply with the advice of the Commission to which I had previously pledged myself.

The Commission, speaking, I take it, for the House of Bishops, maintains (first) that war is not an unchristian thing and that no Bishop may preach that this war is unchristian, and (second) that a Bishop should not express the opinion that peace can be secured otherwise than by the prosecution of the war when the government and the preponderance of the membership of the Church believe otherwise.

Those conclusions I cannot accept; for I believe that the methods of modern international war are quite incompatible with the Christian principles of reconciliation and brotherhood, and that it is the duty of a Bishop of the Church, from his study of the word of God, to express himself on questions of righteousness, no matter what opinion may stand in the way.

I had hoped that, notwithstanding the "excited condition of public opinion" referred to by the Commission, there might be room in the Church for a difference of opinion on the Christianity of warfare and ways of attaining peace, and that, if so, it was preeminently the duty of one supposed to be a leader of the Church to voice his convictions on those subjects. But the Commission makes it perfectly clear in its report that a Bishop should resign before venturing to differ from others on such a Christian problem, or to express opinions at variance with the government. To me, that seems evidently to mean that the Bishops of the Church should be followers and not leaders, and I have no desire to remain in such an anomalous position.

I have, therefore, authorized the Council of Advice of the District to act as Ecclesiastical Authority of the same with full responsibility for the maintenance and conduct of the work from the first of January, 1918, until my resignation shall be acted upon, and I have for the same period offered myself to the General Board of Missions for any work they may wish to delegate to me.

Faithfully yours,

PAUL JONES,
Bishop of Utah.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Bishop of Virginia requests that all the clergy will heed the War Call of the Church War Commission and make ready their subscriptions for the last Sunday in January, when a general collection will be taken all over the country. The War Call of the Church is for $500,000 for the equipment of our Chaplains and for the war work of the Church for a year.

The Rev. L. Valentine Lee, assistant minister of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, and Miss Margaret L. Clendon, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Clendon, of Richmond, were married on Wednesday, December 26, in St. Paul's Church, by the rector, the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, will take pleasure in calling upon out-of-town Church people or their friends who may be in Richmond hospitals, if notified of their coming. Address 1011 Park Avenue, Richmond, Va.

The Rev. Arthur Gray, Sr., of Lawrenceville, has accepted the position of Chaplain at the Home for Homeless Boys, Covington, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop

Resolutions.

In response to the call of Bishop Darst, the committee of men and women representing the Diocese of East Carolina met at St. Mary's School on Wednesday, December 5. After an inspection of the school buildings and attendance upon a reception tendered the visitors by the rector and faculty of the school, the committee assembled in the Library and entered upon a full discussion of the Relation of the Diocese of East Carolina to the Movement Which Has Been Inaugurated by the Trustees of St. Mary's School to Raise a $250,000 Fund. After a serious consideration of every aspect of the subject and the part that is expected of the Diocese of East Carolina, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Special Committee called to consider the campaign for $250,000 for St. Mary's School in its relation to the Diocese of East Carolina: (1) That we heartily endorse the plan of the Trustees and pledge our co-operation in carrying out the same in our Diocese; (2) It is further the sense of this committee that notwithstanding the many worthy calls of the present day that the necessity of the school requires, that we press the matter at this time and enter into the plan and make our canvass in the Diocese of East Carolina immediately after the completion of the canvass now going on in the Diocese of North Carolina, which will be about the first of February, 1918; (3) That the Bishop appoint a special committee to co-operate with the Special Representative of the Board of Trustees in carrying out the canvass in the Diocese of East Carolina, and that the Bishop himself be ex officio chairman of said committee.

Mr. George C. Royall, of Goldsboro, was appointed active chairman of the committee called for in the resolution, and Bishop Darst announced that he would appoint the other members of the committee after due consideration. The Bishop has since appointed Major B. R. Huske, Fayetteville; Mr. C. S. Chamberlain, Kinston; Mr. Frank Wood, Edenton; General James I. Metts, Wilmington.

Grafton: Bishop Darst consecrated St. Mark's Church, Grafton, on Tuesday, December 4, assisted by the Rev. George F. Hill, rector of St. Paul's Church, Greenville, and the Rev. Howard Allgood, who has the pastoral care of the new church.

The Rev. Basil Walton is temporarily in charge of the churches in Aurora, Edward and Bonneron.

The Rev. Daniel G. MacKinnon, D. D., has entered upon his duties as rector of Christ Church, New Bern.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

A Notable Service was held at the Bethlehem Chapel of the Washington Cathedral on the afternoon of Sunday, December 23, in thanksgiving for the recovery of Jerusalem. A large number of clergy were in the procession and in the congregation were present the British Embassy, representatives of the French Embassy, and many other distinguished officials of our own and other governments. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Wallace E. Rolins, D. D., of the Theological Seminary in Virginia, and appears by his kindness in another column of this issue.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

The Ninety-fifth Birthday of the Rev. A. Gordon Bakewell, D. D., was celebrated at Trinity Chapel, New Orleans, Sunday, December 16, from 5 to 7. A song service was held, to which all the Daughters of the Confederacy and the many friends of Dr. Bakewell were invited.

Since 1837 Dr. Bakewell has been identified with New Orleans and his life work has endeared him to thousands, not only in New Orleans, but throughout the South. After living through the siege of Vicksburg, Dr. Bakewell was made Chaplain of the Confederate prison at Andersonville, Ga.

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.

Archdeacon Demby Accepts.

In a letter to Bishop Winchester, Archdeacon Demby accepts his election as Suffragan Bishop for Colored Work in the Diocese of Arkansas, subject to the canonical requirements.

The Rev. E. T. Demby was ordained deacon in this church in 1898, and priest the following year, by Bishop Gailor. He had previously been engaged in teaching in a colored college. He has since served in Tennessee, Missouri, Illinois and Florida. He has been for several years Archdeacon of Colored Work in the Diocese of Tennessee and principal of the Hoffman Industrial Institute, Keeling, Tennessee.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop

The Church and the War in South Carolina.

The War Commission has made an appropriation of $6,000 for the work of the Church at the cantonments in South Carolina.

The Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., has resigned the rectorship of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbia, and began work as a voluntary chaplain at Camp Jackson January 1.

The Rev. R. L. Merriman, of Marion, and the Rev. Oliver J. Hart, of Charleston, have made application to become official chaplains in the Army.

The Rev. A. G. B. Bennett is a voluntary chaplain at Camp Jackson, Columbia.

The Rev. E. S. Willett is working among the colored troops at Camp Jackson and Camp Gordon.

The Rev. Robert E. Gribbin, of the Diocese of East Carolina, who began his ministry at Grace Church, Charleston, as assistant, is a voluntary chaplain at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C.

A Service Flag, containing sixty-seven stars, was unfurled recently in Grace Church, Charleston, the Rev. William Way, rector. A patriotic address was made by Judge Francis D. Winston, of North Carolina, and special music was rendered by the choir. The flag bears sixty-seven stars, equal to one-fourth of the men who are regular communicants of the church.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The tenth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. G. F. G. Hoyt as rector of St. Paul's Church, Columbia, was celebrated on Wednesday evening, December 19. About three hundred parishioners and friends of the parish gathered to do honor to the occasion. The Bishop was present and made an address of congratulation. He was followed by a Russian artist, Dimitri Romanoffsky, who spoke on conditions in Russia. Congratulatory addresses were also made by neighboring clergy and various ministers of the town. Mrs. Hoyt was presented with a gold pin set with jewels by the women of the parish, and Mr. Hoyt with a purse well filled with gold by the members of the congregation. The Bishop in his address read a letter from the Board of Missions of the Diocese, which referred to the spirit shown by this congregation toward its work. The Sunday-school here has held the banner, which the Board awards annually to the school that contributes most per capita to Diocesan Missions, for three years in succession.

Institute of Applied Christianity. A Unique Enterprise.

An Institute of Applied Christianity has grown out of the work of the Seabury Society of New York. This work, as may be recalled, began under the late Bishop Potter and at first consisted of furnishing volunteer lay readers for Church extension in the Bronx. Later the same men started what is now the Cambridge Conference of Church Workers. They have also served religious and daily newspapers of the country for twenty years, and have profoundly affected the Christian publicity of all America through service of Church news to practically all of the great daily papers of all principal cities east of the Rocky Mountains. The Society has furnished volunteer lay readers to start no fewer than twenty-four new churches, seventeen of them now large parishes.

The Institute of Applied Christianity is the first in the country. It is on lines of Institutes of Applied Science, teaching Christ's Economy as those Institutes teach the laws of physics. In its first year, 1917, 242 clergymen were conferred with personally, 1,000 laymen were under instruction for longer or shorter periods, and formal addresses were given by Institute laymen before the Diocesan Convention of Connecticut, and the Presbyterian Ministers' Associations of New York and Philadelphia. The 1,000 laymen referred to were from practically every religious body, including Roman Catholic. The Institute serves all Christian bodies for two reasons. One is that laymen of bodies other than the Church appeal to it for help. The other is that divisions of Christian bodies are on the side of doctrine and evangelism. There are no divisions in Christ's Economy. Furthermore, Bishop Burch, the Rev. Dr. Slattery, the Rev. Dr. Van de Water, and other Church leaders who are members of the Institute Council and helped to formulate its program, advised the policy which is followed.

Very early prominent Church leaders of New York began to contribute money to the Seabury Society, it being known what were its aims, viz.: To teach laymen to do Christian work; to promote scientific management of Church work; to provide parishes with trained workers, and the Church as a whole with Church Engineers. These leaders have included, most of them giving year after year for ten or twelve years, Bishop Courtney, Bishop Greer, Bishop Burch, the Rev. Dr. W. T. Manning, the Rev. Dr. C. L. Slattery, Samuel Mather, of Cleveland; Granger A. Hollister, of Rochester; R. Fulton Cutting, William Edmond Curtis, J. Pierpont Morgan, Charles Steele, Lewis L. Clarke, William P. Clyde, William R. Peters, Eugene H. Outerbridge, Robert L. Pierrepont, E. P. Dutton, Francis Lynde Stetson, Robert S. Brewster, Mrs. Percy R. Pyne, Mrs. Clarence M. Hyde, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Mrs. J. Hull Browning, Mrs.

James May Duane, Mrs. J. Henry Watson.

Some twenty foremost educators of the country have assisted, some of them at times during the past six years, in formulating a Course of Instruction for the Institute. This Course is scientific and pedagogical. It is wholly on the material side in its relation to the spiritual, and carrying it out duplicates the work of no other Christian agency, Y. M. C. A., missionary society, social service commission, or Brotherhood.

Three instructors comprise the active Institute staff, but efforts are making to secure a fourth. They are Eugene M. Camp, founder of the Seabury Society and author of the Institute text book, "Christ's Economy," to which Bishop Burch wrote the introduction; D. Webster Wylie, of the Wylie Teachers' Training School, and Millard F. Taylor, a founder of one of the Bronx parishes, and now chairman of the Executive Committee of the Institute. There are six guildmasters available for part time work. Many clergymen and laymen are also available on occasion.

In addition to the contributions of friends of the effort, some progress has been made toward supporting memberships, $5 each, in sufficient numbers to pay the expenses, or most of them. Almost all of the work is volunteer, and a campaign is now on to secure 800 members. The instruction is given in churches, under auspices of Men's Clubs and Bible classes, but for the period of January to May, 1918, five training centres are to be maintained for the holding of monthly conferences of leaders. Two of these are in New York, two in Brooklyn, and one in Newark. One of those in Brooklyn is in the porch of St. Luke's Church in Clinton Avenue, the Rev. Dr. H. C. Swentzel, rector, and the one in Newark is in the parish house of St. Paul's, the Rev. R. C. Ormsbee, rector. The annual meeting of the Institute, the first since its organization, is to be held on January 21 at the Delta Kappa Epsilon Club, New York.

A Laymen's House in the Madison Square district is possible through the kindness of a communicant of Grace parish, and here is a Guild hall seating 100. This winter exhibits of applied Christianity—what the Church is doing for enlisted men, world missions, and the social service of the Church in New York—are to be made, with addresses by prominent Christian leaders. Were it not for the war it would be possible to command financial support sufficient to make possible the proposed Summer Conference on Greenwood Lake, for which some subscriptions are in hand. If it can be brought about, a small conference is to be held there in July and August, 1918.

Commemorative and New Year Services at the Church of the Holy Communion.

The closing of the old year and the opening of the new have always associated with them an unusual interest in the Church of the Holy Communion, the Rev. Henry Mottet, D. D., rector. Perhaps the earliest service in commemoration of the departed held in this city, outside the Roman Catholic Communion, was instituted by Dr. Muhlenberg, in 1847. On the last day of the year, at 8 P. M., the congregation takes part in a deeply impressive service, at which are read the names of all those called home in the twelve-month past.

Then at 11:30 P. M. follows the Watch Service, ending just at midnight. With the beginning of the New Year the whole congregation receives the Holy Communion.

A dozen or more years have proved the essential value of the unusual service which is held on New Year's morning at 11 o'clock. It is a Communion Service, with a specially adapted Collect, Epistle and Gospel. The music is just as jubilant and uplifting as it is Christmas and Easter; and the sermon is specially prepared for the day. Every year this service attracts a steadily increasing number of attendants drawn from far and wide. There are some—relatively they are the minority—who begin the year in revelry. There are thousands who would begin it in the heavenly Father's House. Conscious of their dependence on Him, they would submit themselves to His direction, consecrate themselves to His service, and meet and commune with their Elder Brother at His Holy Table, asking for His constant companionship all along the road of 1918. The day must come when every God's House will see and recognize this impressive yearning and this divine aspiration.

None can foresee what the year 1918 holds in store for the nations of the world. How better spend a portion of its first day than in thought and resolve and prayer in the house of Him who is the God of all the Nations.

Reception to the Rev. Dr. Glazebrook.

Foremost Jews of New York, at the home of the former Ambassador to Turkey, the Hon. Henry Morgenthau, paid honor to the Rev. Dr. Otis A. Glazebrook and Mrs. Glazebrook at a reception tendered to them. This reception had as guests Jacob H. Schiff, perhaps the most honored of American Jews, and many others who work with him. A silver tea service was presented, and an address of high praise was made by the Rev. Dr. Stephen S. Wise. The occasion was in recognition of the relief work done by Dr. and Mrs. Glazebrook, while the former was United States Consul at Jerusalem. Much of the vast sum which the Consul handled, and handled well, was given by American Jews. In accepting the honor and the gift Dr. Glazebrook protested that he had done no more than his duty to man and to God.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the laying of the Cathedral cornerstone was observed on St. John's day this year by the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Cathedral, Mrs. Henry W. Munroe president, and a meeting of the Cathedral trustees. In an address to the women Bishop Greer paid high tribute to women's part in bringing the Cathedral to its present stage of completion. He regarded the present war year as exceptional, in that it found the women burdened with war relief and yet loyal to the Cathedral and its plans. At the meeting of the trustees, figures were given of cost to date. Work upon the nave is ordered stopped, pending the tremendous war demands. It was announced that more and more the Diocesan work will be centred at the Cathedral, and that the Cathedral itself is to be more and more Diocesan. On January 8 a meeting of Diocesan friends of missions is to be held. It is the early winter effort to help the general missionary work of the Church.

Freemont: On the fourth Sunday in Advent in St. Paul's Parish, Freemont, the Rev. A. I. E. Boss, rector, at the morning service the Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese confirmed a class of nineteen, making a total of thirty-nine confirmed by him in the parish during the last thirteen months. At this service, after a brief address to the class, the Bishop preached forcefully on the subject, "The Nation's Vocation." After the sermon the Bishop blessed a beautiful silk National flag and a Service flag, the gifts of Miss Minnie Failing, a devoted member of the parish. The Service flag bears nine stars, representing the nine men who have thus far entered the nation's service from this parish.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

Grace Church, Grand Rapids, the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, rector, now has seventy-three men on her Roll of Honor. As the entire roll of the Church membership amounts to one thousand communicants, the members of Grace Church feel that they are doing their bit when it comes to sending out men to fight for her country. The parish is not a rich one, but Grace Church has contributed liberally toward the recent appeals for charity and war work.

At the time of the midnight service the Church was well filled on Christmas Eve, and almost every soldier and sailor who was able to be back for Christmas was in his place of worship.

The children's Christmas service was an unusual one, and took the form of a reverent interpretation of the Story of the Advent of the Christ-Child. The offering of the Church School presented to the Christ-Child by one of the Wise Men was a very large one for the children to give. Fifty dollars went to the suffering Armenians and $35 was given as an Advent offering. The sacred interpretation of the Advent was written by Dean Bell. Then the children visited the various hospitals and homes, and also the homes of poor families in the city, distributing gifts.

The Union Epiphany Rally of the Sunday-schools of the Church in Grand Rapids will be held on January 13. All the Sunday-schools in the Diocese are invited to take part in this missionary rally, which begins the Lenten mite box offering drive. It is expected that a large number of delegates will be present.

The Standing Committee, of which the Very Rev. Francis S. White was the President, has elected the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent to take his place, pursuant to his resignation on account of his taking up war work in Waco.

The Rev. W. H. Jordan, rector of Grand Ledge Parish, has resigned and accepted a call from another Diocese.

The Rev. G. M. Brewin has resigned Holy Trinity Manistee, Michigan, to become rector of the Church of the Evangelist, Oswego, N. Y.

Is anything on earth more terrible than a repudiated ideal? A repudiation which carries with it an abandoned ambition? All men who have sinned know how terrible is the moment after their fall, when they wake up to the fact of something lost, that moment which is followed immediately by the sense of something incurred. But perhaps the most terrible thing that happens whenever a man sins is the repudiation of his ideal, the abandonment of the eternal purpose of God, the deliberate turning away from the mountain heights to walk on some middle pathway through life, the surrender of his destiny.—John Gardner.

New National Hymn—America and Her Allies.

By Washington Gladden.

Tune: Materna.

O land of lands, my Fatherland, the beautiful, the free,
All lands and shores to freedom dear are ever dear to thee;
All sons of Freedom hail thy name, and wait thy word of might,
While round the world the lists are joined for liberty and light.

Hail sons of France, old comrades dear!
Hail Britons brave and true!
Hail Belgian martyrs ringed with flame!
Slavs fired with visions new!
Italian lovers mailed with light! Dark brothers from Japan!
From East to West all lands are kin who live for God and man.

Here endeth war! Our hands are sworn! Now dawns the better hour,
When lust of blood shall cease to rule, when Peace shall come with power;
We front the fiend that rends our race and fills our homes with gloom;
We break his scepter, spurn his crown, and nail him in his tomb!

Now, hands all round, our troth we plight to rid the world of lies,
To fill all hearts with truth and trust and willing sacrifice;
To free all lands from hate and spite and fear from strand to strand;
To make all nations neighbors and the world one Fatherland.

"Constructive Criticism": Leadership.

The problem of the large metropolitan parish and the small country mission in matters spiritual is incidentally the same and the "x" in the solution of the problem is the same, and it is always found to be the priest, whether rector or missionary. The policy of a bank is outlined, in the main by the president, the sales force of a department store looks to the general manager for direction, and Churchmen, whether they admit it or not, look to the priest for leadership in everything that pertains to the welfare of the parish, especially in matters of a definitely spiritual nature. It is an easy matter for the clergy to call upon the laity to do something to help deepen the spiritual life of the parish, but the individual layman wants to know, "What will you have me to do?" Of course the laity should know, but nevertheless, they ask the question and it has to be answered.

It is not difficult to speak to a congregation in a general way of matters of spiritual import such as family prayer, meditation, Bible reading, preparation for communion, etc., but it is the quiet personal appeal, born of personal experience, that produces results and the personal appeal requires greater courage than the appeal to the multitude.

Where the clergy have set before their people a program for deepening the spiritual life of the parish and have led the way in carrying out that program there always has been a real response on the part of truly loyal Churchmen.

Our Lord's greatest appeals were made to individuals and very small groups of people rather than to the masses.—F. D. Tyner.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

VAST SAVING OF WHEAT AND MEAT.

First Unofficial Report From Nation's Churches to the Food Administration Shows Definite Results—Allies' Needs to Be Met.

The National Food Administration has been in existence less than five months. For the first time in the history of this nation a mighty engine has been created for the control of the food supplies of America. The scheme is so big, so complex, that even yet a general public comprehension of it is not assured. Yet it is already certain that it is working as effectively as is the more easily comprehended scheme for creating a national army.

Powers granted to the board of which Mr. Hoover is the head are arbitrary, though discretionary. Only a tithe of these powers have yet been utilized. It was deemed wise statecraft, in view of the history and temper of the American people, to begin with moral suasion, and not with autocratic dictation that distinguishes the food control of the Teutonic powers, or the unlimited and automatic State authority instituted in France from the very beginning of the war.

A vast advertising campaign, based on an appeal to patriotic impulse, has been in full swing since early summer. The newspapers, the churches, the merchants, the railroads, and the hotels have been voluntary and willing participants in this campaign. It has flooded the nation with the slogan, "Food will win the war; don't waste it." For the better part of the last half year we have seen and heard that in nearly every newspaper, from most pulpits, from a host of shop windows, from billboards, from pamphlets and lecturers, and from street corner orators.

All this time the Food Administration has been carefully and quietly organizing the sources of supply, watching for technical violations of the law and punishing them, preparing data to fortify itself in its probable request in the near future for further remedial legislation. But the great work has been in publicity and in the moral appeal. As yet the screws have not been put on—not actually. No one has been obliged, under dire penalty of the law, to change his diet or curb his appetite. If he has had the price and has been willing to indulge himself, nothing has restrained him. The bread cards are yet to arrive; the meat tickets have not been printed. We have had but a slight foretaste of what may yet occur in the recent tendency of many stores to ladle out the sugar in limited doses.

Therefore, much cynical speculation has resulted. It has been predicted that time was being wasted; that the American people would not control their appetites, or change their diet, practically over night, merely on request. Earnest and well-meaning patriots have urged an immediate regulation of food on the European basis—a living ration to each citizen, to each guest, and to each dependent of the republic, but no more.

Now the time has come to ask the question: What has been accomplished by moral suasion? Is the gigantic publicity campaign a failure or a success?

How much essential foodstuffs have we saved?

And if we have made a substantial saving, it must be remembered that the contribution is practically voluntary, even though accompanied by a veiled threat.

The official answer is being prepared. The Food Administration expects to make an announcement in the near future, probably about the first of the coming year. It is a difficult and highly complex thing to determine, involving vast bookkeeping of a hitherto unorganized description. Reports by the score of thousands are being received and tabulated in Washington. However, in anticipation of this official report, necessarily delayed, it has been possible to arrive at the facts sufficiently to forecast it with satisfactory accuracy. George A. Cullen, who for three months was the chief of the Division of Co-operating Organizations of the United States Food Commission, has had access to a multitude of these reports and has been willing to make a digest of them and their meaning.

It seems that among the co-operating organizations are the railroads, the hotels and the churches. It would seem to be comparatively a simple matter to get accurate reports of savings from railroads and hotels, but the eating done in these public places is the much smaller amount of eating done by the people as a whole. In the effort to reach the substantial homes of the country the best avenue of approach seemed to be the churches. Therefore, early last summer an inter-denominational organization was effected. The only denomination not represented was the Lutheran. Catholic and Protestant, Christian Scientists, and all the creedless cults alike were whole-heartedly enlisted.

In the campaign of appeal during the first three months more than 20,000 churches participated. For the last two months a check has been made on the results accomplished among the families represented in these 20,000 churches. The average membership of these churches is around 200, or about 40 families each. The allowance made is on the basis of 5 to a family. This, then, represents about 4,000,000 Americans, surely an average and substantial part of the general community. And the Food Administration now knows what has been accomplished in food saving in the families reached by these 20,000 churches.

In general (and this statement is not official, but merely a private forecast based on cursory examination of the compilations) these 800,000 families (4,000,000 people) have for the last two months been averaging nine wheatless and fourteen meatless meals a week also.

That is the startling general statement. It will bear careful analysis, and is worth a little thought from each individual. If it leads into statistical computation, it must be remembered that the single ultimate aim of the Food Administration is the saving of so many millions of bushels of wheat and so many millions of pounds of meat. And this is where the saving comes—from the substantial families of the land. * * *

As the total production of beef cattle in the United States for 1916 was only 57,000,000 head, this would mean that we are now saving meat through voluntary reduced consumption at the rate of slightly more than a quarter of our annual production of beef. The government has not said just how much meat it requires for the use of the Allies, but such a present as that 15,000,000 head of beef is thought to be ample.

The wheat figures (needs of the Allies) are more definite. Mr. Hoover said several months ago that in the coming year the Allies would require from the United States 210,000,000 bushels of wheat. As this country in 1916 produced 670,000,000 bushels, of wheat and consumed 590,000,000 bushels, that left us only 80,000,000 bushels for export. Somewhere we must find 130,000,000 bushels.

That was the problem of the Food Administration at the beginning of summer—to save 130,000,000 bushels of wheat from the normal consumption of the United States. That was the concrete object of the vast campaign for saving. If we take these church figures we will see just how near to making that saving the country is at this time. In the first year the United States will save 150,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 20,000,000 bushels more than is needed to supply the needs of the Allies.

To sum up: Judging by the reports from the churches of America made in the last few weeks, which represent the actual savings in meat and wheat accomplished when the saving campaign has reached its normal height of efficiency, it is safe to say that the moral appeal of the Food Administration has been a success, that if persisted in it will be sufficient to meet the immediately future demands of the Entente Powers, and that if the present rate of food economy is conscientiously maintained throughout the country among all classes there will be no need for drastic measures.

Of course, these statistics are not conclusive. The Food Administration has not made its final report. There are other elements to be considered than the churches. But what the churches have shown, beyond doubt, is the possibility of voluntary economy, together with its incalculable sum total, and the heightened value of unofficial organization.—Richard Barry, in the New York Times Magazine.

Peace.

"My Soul, there is a countrie,
Afar beyond the stars,
Where stands a winged Sentries
All skilfull in the wars.
There, above noise and danger,
Sweet peace sits, crown'd with smiles,
And One born in a manger
Commands the beauteous files.
He is thy gracious friend
And (O, my Soul awake!)
Did in pure love descend,
To die here for thy sake.
If thou canst get but thither,
There grows the flowre of peace,
The rose that cannot wither,
Thy fortress, and thy ease.
Leave then thy foolish ranges;
For none can thee secure,
But One, who never changes,
Thy God, thy Life, thy Cure."

Epiphany: It is seldom that January 6 falls on a Sunday, and this year congregations have the great privilege of listening to the magnificent Isaiah 60: "Arise, Shine! for thy light has come!" It was once a stirring missionary appeal to God's ancient people and is still helpful, still needed. Responsibility rests upon those who have light to let it shine; and if this held for Israel of old, how much more strongly now for Christians, for those who have seen the light of the glory of God as it shines in the face of Jesus Christ! The New Testament lesson is the manifestation, the "Bethphany," of the glory of the Christ at the wedding in Cana of Galilee, as a result of which "His disciples believed on Him." The two lessons bring together the two main ideas connected with the whole Epiphany season: one, manifestation to the Gentiles; and the other that which is manifested, viz., God as revealed in our Lord Jesus Christ. (The latter aspect includes "theophany," or manifestation of God.)

The evening lessons are (1) Isaiah's prophecy of the Messiah and His work, which would be world-wide and cause the righteousness of the Church to "go forth as brightness"; and (2) St. Paul's discussion of the relative positions of Jew and Gentile in the providential ordering of the world, concluding with a paean of praise to God for the universality of His mercy and the depth of His riches of wisdom and knowledge; in startling contrast to Calvin's "horrible decretum."

The use of Isaiah 60 for the morning Old Testament lesson is, of course, an interruption of the Old Testament Historico-topical course, which is resumed on Monday with a brief account of the reign in the upper kingdom of Jeroboam, son of Joash, who persisted in the sins of the original Jeroboam, but who, in the providence of Jehovah, wrested out of the hands of the Syrians some territory they had filched from Israel. This is mentioned as having taken place in accordance with the word of God as spoken by the prophet Jonah. Without intending to imply that the book of Jonah was necessarily produced at this time, we have introduced it here as bearing specially on the Epiphany season. It is the great Foreign Missionary book of the Old Testament. We are on sure and certain historical ground in the use here of Amos, to be followed by Hosea, Micah and Isaiah, interwoven with historical material. While Amos is not distinctly missionary, it is implicitly so. The prophet is concerned with Jehovah not as the God of Israel merely, but as Creator of the universe (Amos 5:8) and of mankind, as the God who not merely brought up Israel out of Egypt, but also "the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir" (9:7). The Old Testament daily lessons in the evening are topically selected to set forth the larger idea of God which was revealed to His people from the eighth century B. C. on, as their growing knowledge and contact with foreign nations made such larger conception necessary; laying the foundation for all future missionary work and the only possible basis of rational hope for humanity in this world or the next. The New Testament daily lessons are missionary in character.

Reality in Worship.

"Before thou prayest prepare thyself, and be not as one that tempteth the Lord."

... I am sure that some preliminary work of a private nature is necessary, some brief exercise such as the reading of a short Psalm, which will serve to detach us from the world, and remind us of the solemn nature of what we are going to do. I know that in these days the cares of life flow almost up to the Altar steps, still there is surely some little space that we can snatch for recollection. Few of us may be able, like George Herbert, to use the Churchyard for this purpose, yet all of us may find some place in which to say, "While that my soul repairs to her devotion, Here I entombed my flesh."

It does seem unthinkable that persons who hurry late to Church or arrive only just in time, and come talking up to the door, should be under the impression that they are about to worship. I well remember the chorus of gossip kept up by the members of a house party in a country Parish on their way to Church about the chance of the next day's sport or the details of last night's Bridge. Every one of them had a keen sense of incongruity in other matters, yet they seemed quite unaware that they were making themselves ridiculous in the sight of Heaven. As well as the joy in devotion, we want the seriousness of it. In one word we want reality. If only people would come to Church prepared, and intent on what is before them, what a joy worship would be, and what a power the Church would be in the nation's life. Until we get back the piety of worship we cannot be equipped as a Church. The world is waiting the appearance of real religion. Outwardly, of course, it scoffs at such, inwardly it respects it—I had almost said reverences it. The indifferent quality of our worship is one of the greatest hindrances to the spread of the Kingdom. In this respect, the very fact that it is the public witness to the existence of God, open to all sorts and conditions of men, ought to put us on our honor to make it real. An indifferent worship is worse than an inconsistent life, for the latter is remarked by a few, the former is a stumbling-block to many. Let us see to it that by preparing ourselves, and invoking the Holy Spirit's aid, we "shew forth His praise" as those who have been "called out of darkness into His marvellous light."—The Treasury.

The best time for Bible reading is in the morning. The mind and body are fresh after the repose of the night, and the highest powers of thought may be brought to bear upon the portion selected. But with most people each recurring morning brings its own pressing tasks. Business cares, the daily toil, and the duties of the house are the first and most engrossing concerns. Some hours must pass with many before they can find time to sit down to any quiet reading. Let the plan be honestly tried by taking some words from God's Book for the meditation of the morning. Make for the month a fair, steadfast trial of the plan of studying the Bible when your powers are at mental high-water mark. Familiarity with the Psalms, the Gospels, the Epistles is gained a little at a time, by patient, daily reading—thoughtful, prayerful reading, too—which was prized by the soul as something worth treasuring. We shall all gain immeasurably in our influence as well as our comfort by giving more of our unwearied thought to the Holy Book. A few tired, sleepy, worn-out moments at night, and those only, are almost an insult to the Master whom we profess to serve.—Selected.

"I cannot pretend to care for many with whom I come into contact as much as I do for the few. But I can pray for them, and the feeling will more or less come in time. Just try to pray for some person committed to your charge—say for half an hour or an hour—and you will begin really to love him. As you lay his life before God, as you think of his needs and hopes, and failings and possibilities, as you pray earnestly for him as you would for some one whom you feel intense affection for; at the end of the time you will feel more interested in him, you will think of him not as one of a class, but as a separate, mysterious person. You will not, it may be, have time to pray for many in this way, but you will learn imperceptibly to extend your sympathy—to feel real love for many more. I advise you to keep a record of these prayers. It is quite worth your while to take practically a day off sometimes, and to force yourself to pray. It will be the best day's work you have ever done in your life. Remember that."—Forbes Robinson, "Letters to His Friends."

A Psalm for the New Year.

O New Year, teach us faith!

The road of life is hard;
When our feet bleed, and scourging winds us scathe,

Point thou to Him whose visage was more marred

Than any man's; who saith,
"Make straight paths for your feet,"
and to the oppressed,

"Come ye to Me, and I will give you rest."

Yet hang some lamp-like hope

Above this unknown way,
Kind year, to give our spirits freer scope,
And our hands strength to work while it is day.

But if that way must slope
Tombward, oh, bring before our fading eyes

The lamp of life, the hope that never dies.

Comfort our souls with love—

Love of all human kind;
Love special, close, in which, like sheltered dove,

Each weary heart its own safe nest may find;

And love that turns above

Admiringly; contended to resign.
And loves, if need be, for the love divine.

Friend, come thou like a friend,

And whether bright thy face,
Or dim with clouds we cannot comprehend,

We'll hold our patient hands, each in his place,

And trust Thee to the end.

Knowing Thou leadest onward to those spheres

Where there are neither days, nor months, nor years.

—Dinah Mulock Craik.

The Empty Places.

Throughout the long years which have passed since the Wise Men from the East worshipped the Child Who was born King of the Jews, there has been a great gathering of the peoples about that King. In spite of much apparent failure, grievous backslidings, terrible ignoring of privileges, wanton neglect of His first principles, blasphemous distortions of His teachings, and in spite of war and its indescribable horrors—in spite of all, there has been a great, noble, and varied assemblage of the nations of the earth about Him, there has been deep and earnest contemplation and learning of Him, the opening of many treasures for Him, the offering of priceless, acceptable gifts to Him.

In quiet villages, in noisy cities, in low-lying valleys and upon mountain sides, in great continents, and upon the islands of the sea, in the first few tragic years of the Christian Church's life—the time of fire and blood, in the age of heresies, disputations, questionings, in the age of prosperity, and temporal power, when the world was with the Church, in the time of Reformation, the breaking up of the old order of things, in our own age with its many and distracting forces, with its complex organization, with the stain of the most awful war of history upon it—in every age, under every condition, there have been those who sincerely and joyfully have worshipped the Child of Bethlehem, who in His light have seen light, who in the contemplation of His Cross have learned the greatest things of life, those who for His sake and in His Name have been ready to do and to suffer, to deny themselves, to shun sin, to take up His Cross, and to grow into His perfect Stature.

There has been a great gathering of the nations there. In part what that first Epiphany foretold has been fulfilled. Yes, in part, but it has been in part only. Even in the midst of war, the Church cannot forget the Missionary Work which presses upon her in all ages and under all conditions—even under war conditions! Indeed not until the Redeemer's final commandment has been obeyed shall wars cease in all the world. There are places about that throne which never have been filled, there are gifts which never have been offered. Those places must be filled to make clear the meaning of the Epiphany picture. Those gifts must be offered before, to our dull eyes, the full glory of the Heavenly Child appears.

Every missionary appeal is an appeal that those empty places may be filled, that those gifts may be offered. The nations of the earth need Him desperately. There is a place beside the Magi for them. They need Him nationally, socially, individually; need Him as only men who sit in darkness need the light—in their hands are priceless treasures, in their natures is an unknown, unfathomed capacity for holiness and righteousness, worship and service. We are entrusted with the responsibility of helping to fill those empty places about the Redeemer's Throne!

The Epiphany picture is in itself a missionary appeal—an appeal that those nations who have not come may be given an opportunity to come and take their places before Him, and in His presence, and in His power, work out their destiny, fulfil their expectations, realize their national ideal, manifest some glory of the Saviour of all men, help forward the cause of Truth, Righteousness, and Peace, and thus each in their several ways help to hasten the time when "the Kingdoms of this world are become the Kingdom of Our Lord and of His Christ; and He shall reign forever and ever."—Dean D. T. Owen, in Canadian Churchman.

The Road to Blighty.

There are two faces—one of a nurse and one of a doctor—that Coningsby Dawson, Lieutenant Canadian Field Artillery, will always remember. He saw them during the days he spent in a hospital in France. He describes them as follows in Good Housekeeping:

"I arrived about nine on a summer's evening at the Casualty Clearing Station. In something less than an hour I was undressed and on the operating table. You might suppose that when for three interminable years such a stream of tragedy has flowed through a hospital, it would be easy for surgeons and nurses to treat mutilation and death perfunctorily. They don't. They show no emotion. They are even cheerful; but their strained faces tell the story and their hands have an immense compassion.

"Two faces especially loom out. I can always see them by lamplight, when the rest of the ward is hushed and shrouded, stooping over some silent bed. One face is that of the Colonel of the hospital, gray, concerned, pitiful, stern. His eyes seem to have photographed all the suffering which in three years they have witnessed. He's a tall man, but he moves softly. Over his uniform he wears a long white operating smock—he never seems to remove it. And he never seems to sleep, for he comes wandering through his Gethsemane all hours of the night to bend over the more serious cases. He seems haunted by a vision of the wives, mothers, sweethearts, whose happiness is in his hands. I think of him as a Christ in khaki.

"The other face is of a girl—a sister, I ought to call her. She's the nearest approach to a sculptured Greek goddess I've seen in a living woman. She's very tall, very pale and golden, with wide brows and big gray eyes like Trilby. I wonder what she did before she went to war—for she's gone to war just as truly as any soldier. I'm sure in the peaceful years she must have spent a lot of time in being loved. Perhaps her man was killed out here. Now she's ivory-white with over-service and spends all her days in loving. Her eyes have the old frank, innocent look, but they're ringed with being weary. Only her lips hold a touch of color; they have a childish trick of trembling when any one's wound is hurting too much. She's the first touch of home that the stretcher-cases see when they've said good-by to the trenches. She moves down the ward; eyes follow her. When she is absent, though others take her place, she leaves a loneliness. If she meant much to men in days gone by, today she means more than ever. Over many dying boys she stoops as the incarnation of the woman whom, had they lived, they would have loved. To all of us, with the blasphemy of destroying still upon us, she stands for the divinity of womanhood.

"What sights she sees and what words she hears; yet the pity she brings to her work preserves her sweetness. In the silence of the night those who are delirious re-fight their recent battles. You're half-asleep when in the darkened ward some one jumps up in bed shouting, 'Hold your bloody hands up.' He thinks he's capturing a Hun trench, taking prisoners in a bombed-in dug-out. In an instant, like a mother with a frightened child, she's bending over him; soon she has coaxed his head back on the pillow. Men do not die in vain when they evoke such women."

Wayfarers.

The friendly faces that I meet
Upon the crowded city street!
I cannot know them, half or all,
Yet mine each kindly face I call.

The anguished faces that I meet
Upon the surging city street!
I cannot reach their wants and woes,
I pray for them to One who knows.

The hopeless faces that I meet
Upon the hard-paved city street!
I only know the sparrow's fall
Is marked by Him who loves us all.

The holy faces that I meet
Upon the common city street!
They summon me to lift my face
Toward farther heights of daily grace.

O faces that I daily meet
Upon Life's ever-changing street!
How think you when you glance my way?
Do I add aught unto your day?

Handicaps Three.

Ann Louise had red hair. Ann Louise had freckles. Ann Louise was far taller, far larger than any other girl of her age in Boston. Now you must not imagine that Ann Louise did not know these faults which were hers. She knew them only too well. So aware of these handicaps three was Ann Louise that often she lay awake at night pondering whether it would be a sin to pray to God to change her hair, to remove her freckles, and to shrink her, just a little, in all directions.

I say she often pondered; still Ann Louise never did pray for these changes. Because each night after she had thought and thought, always she remembered that some children have white hair, some have a black skin, while still others are destined to become Fat Ladies of the Circus! When that thought crowded into her brain Ann Louise was usually very sleepy, not too sleepy, however, to smile at the funny fat-faced Circus Lady!

One morning at the breakfast table Mother handed Ann Louise a letter. Father took off his glasses, saying: "Well, well! Isn't there some mistake, Mother?" Brother laid down his knife and fork, inquiring: "Don't I get one, too?" Mother looked at Ann Louise, saying: "Read your letter to us, dear, so we can all share your excitement."

Ann Louise began: "Miss Martha Andrews requests the pleasure of your company at five o'clock on Tuesday, May first, 1917."

Returning his glasses to his nose, Father remarked: "Well, well, Mother! It seems to me we have a young lady daughter! That's the third party Ann Louise has gone to this winter." Brother grasped his knife and fork, remarking: "My, but you're lucky. Wish I'd been asked. It's May Day, too."

Ann Louise murmured softly, "I think I'll not go."

"Why, Ann Louise, not go to Martha's party! Of course you'll go, dear. You shall wear your pretty new smock frock."

As Mother finished speaking she saw tremendous tears trembling in the eyes of Ann Louise. Suddenly Father choked. The whole family had to fly to his rescue and pat him on his back before he could regain his breath. After that Ann Louise held Father's overcoat, opened the front door and waved him out of sight as he hurried down Beacon Street to his office. Then she started with Arthur for school.

On the way he said: "Look here, Sister, why won't you go to the party? Think if they should have favors and mottoes!"

"I'll tell you, Brother. 'Twould make Father and Mother sad to know. Cross yer heart an' promise neveh ter tell till yer die?"

"I promise," came the solemn answer.

"The girls laugh at me. They call me 'Jumbo.' They say, 'Where's the white horse? Here comes the red head!'"

"One girl says: 'What makes a spotted girl spotted?' The rest all call out together, 'Freckles.'"

"They oughter be ashamed. They arn't ladies. They'll be sizer-you two years from now. Your hair's twice as long an' thick as theirs. Your freckles, why, your freckles are the nicest kind of freckles I ever saw in my whole life!" burst from Arthur.

"If yer don't go to the party Mother and Father are sure to guess."

"Then I've just got ter go! I'd rather die than do it! Martha doesn't want me. Her mother tells her to invite me 'cause I'm in her class at school."

* * *

Brightly shone the hair of Ann Louise. Tall and straight in fresh white muslin smocked with palest blue she stood. So cloudy was the day that the loathsome freckles were almost lost to view. Yet none of these things were in the mind of Ann Louise as she shook hands with Mrs. Andrews.

Instead she was thinking. "I'm doing it so's they won't be sad. I'm doing it so's they will never know how every one laughs at me 'cause I'm so homely and hideous!"

The party commenced. Tails were pinned recklessly upon a donkey by blindfolded girls; then every one went to Jerusalem. After that came a peanut hunt which ended in a perfectly new and exciting way. The lights were turned off. Dimly there appeared in the corner of the library a little old lady sitting behind a counter in a little old shop. Each peanut hunter received as many paper pennies as peanuts found. In turn they were told to go to the shop and buy anything they most desired.

First Dorothy Beardsley walked daintily forward, as she had found the greatest number of peanuts. Long golden hair, large blue eyes, cheeks of the pinkest, had Dorothy. Carefully she glanced at the little old lady's treasures before selecting what to her seemed the most attractive, a small china teaset.

Next came Elsie Humphrey, with black curly hair, flashing black eyes and deep dimples. At once she purchased a string of carmine beads and rushed back to exhibit them to the waiting girls.

Ann Louise walked slowly forward when her turn arrived. How big she felt! How red her hair! How countless her freckles! Well she knew the girls were whispering! Well she knew the girls were laughing. Yet on she walked. Quietly she decided upon a little green sewing basket. For a moment Ann Louise forgot the girls, remembering instead to drop her courtesy and say softly, "Thank you." No one asked to see her little basket.

One by one the girls walked to the shop. When Katharine Brooks' turn came she hurried to the little old lady. Many trinkets were gone, yet plenty remained. Katharine frowned darkly.

The little lady said: "Here is a paint box, here a pin-cushion and here a Japanese doll, and—"

"I don't like any of your things!" burst from Katharine.

"Wouldn't you like this pretty book?" questioned the little old lady anxiously.

"No; I wouldn't like anything you have. I would only like a little green sewing basket."

"I am very sorry," ventured the astonished old lady. "The only basket I had was sold some time ago—won't you change your mind and buy this little pin-tray?"

"No; I won't. I'll go home without anything at all." So spoke Katharine Brooks.

Not a sound could be heard for one whole minute. Ann Louise needed all her courage to say, "Little lady, she may have my basket if she wants it." Before any one realized what was happening Katharine had grabbed the little green basket held towards her. Silently she walked off to see exactly how it was made, exactly what is held.

Just then the lights were turned on. Lady and shop disappeared. Supper was waiting. Candles twinkled joyfully about the table, flowers nodded their pretty heads. May baskets marked each place and in every way had Martha's mother planned a most delicious supper. Creamy soup and rolls, crisp chicken, tiny green peas and piles of remarkably shaped sandwiches. Ice cream and such ice cream! Every one had more than enough and the cake was angel food. Mottoes began to snap, tongues to fly. No longer did the girls whisper, they talked now—they laughed.

Too soon the going home time arrived. Too soon each girl found herself hurrying away laden with souvenirs. After all Ann Louise was really glad she had gone.

As her front door opened she heard Mother's voice at the telephone saying: "Oh, Mrs. Andrews, you mustn't be sorry. Why, no! If Ann Louise gave the basket away, I am sure she wanted to do so. Thank you very much for saying such kind things, Mrs. Andrews. We think her pretty nice ourselves. Thank you very, very much. Good-by."

"Why, Ann Louise, darling, here you are! What do you think Mrs. Andrews just telephoned? She says that of all the girls at the party this afternoon our Ann Louise was the sweetest and the loveliest. She says of all the women that will some day grow out of these little girls she is sure that our Ann Louise will be the finest!"

Before Mother finished speaking Ann Louise flew to her arms, sobbing: "But, oh! Mother! That doesn't change my size, my hair, or my skin!"

"No, darling, it doesn't. I am thankful to say it doesn't change our Ann Louise one single bit. Why is my dear girl crying when she should be so happy?"

Whereupon Ann Louise told Mother everything. Everything from beginning to end. Mother spoke not one word till Ann Louise was all through, then she said: "Ann Louise, do you remember the picture Father has in the back of his watch taken when Mother was a little girl?"

"Yes—and it's beautiful, Mother; sweeter and nicer than any of the girls at the party," breathed Ann Louise rapturously.

"Well, here comes Father to tell for himself why he wears it after all these years. Tell Ann Louise why you keep that picture in your watch, Father," Mother inquired.

Father took out his watch, opened it, looking first at Mother, then at Ann Louise with a queer little far-away smile.

"Why, because, first of all, I used to wish I had known Mother when she looked like this little sweet-faced girl. Then, at last, God gave me a little girl all my own who looks just like this picture. So much so, that at times I have to stop to be absolutely sure whose picture it is, Mother's or Ann Louise's."

As Father ended Ann Louise hurled herself into his arm, crying: "Father! Father! I'm so happy, so happy! Why didn't you tell me all this years ago? I'm glad to be big! I'm glad to have red hair! Yes, and I am even glad to have freckles! If I look the way my own Mother did!"

Father bent over Ann Louise, whispering: "Next time promise you will tell Mother and Father your trouble sooner. We always know a way out. That's just why we were put here."

Ann Louise has never forgotten the promise she made that night. The strangest thing of all is that the girls have started to tell Ann Louise their secret joys and even their hidden sorrow. Shall I tell you the reason? Why, simply because Ann Louise isn't afraid of them any longer. She knows that her hair, her freckles and her size don't count nearly so much as her smiles or the things she does to make others happy. The fact of the matter is Ann Louise entirely forgets herself. She is really too busy to think about herself at all.—Edith B. White in Congregationalist.

However carefully the virtues of obedience and respect for older persons may have been inculcated by thoughtful training, the time comes as a child grows older and approaches the adolescent stage, when he begins to feel his own importance as an individual, begins to reason independently and very likely to feel that he has certain rights that the customary restraints of family life have denied him—the right to choose for himself, to think for himself, to act without reference to parental control.

If parents are unwise and continue to treat children in this stage as they have treated them in the past, demanding unquestioning obedience and thwarting a will that is justly enough seeking to take its own responsibilities, they are likely to make them, if not outwardly rebellious, what may be far worse, inwardly protestant and possibly deceitful in following out their own way.

If they are wiser, they reflect that if a child can thus decide for himself what he thinks he ought to do, he is also old enough and sufficiently developed mentally to reason the matter out with an adviser. And parents—fathers of boys particularly—must remember that sometimes it may be necessary for them to yield as gracefully as may be; for there is a possibility that the child's stand may be quite reasonable. Such a yielding, wisely made, need not be interpreted as weakness and result in lack of respect; it will rather result in a new understanding and confidence, and a new sense of responsibility on the part of the boy.

"My Peace I Give Unto You."

Fresh as the dewdrops falling,
After the heat of day;
Sweet as the perfume-laden Breath of the new-mown hay—

So to the aching spirit,
Bidding its sorrows cease,
Cometh the unseen Presence
Bearing the gift of peace.

Peace! like the calm of evening
Crowned by the sunset glow;
Peace! as a mighty river
In silent, ceaseless flow—

The "peace which passeth knowledge,"
Which none may ever win
Until the heart is ready For Christ to enter in.

Come, then, O Peace of Jesus!
Great gift His presence brings
To lift His weary children
Above all earthly things

To give us glimpse of Eden,
Sweet Comforter, O come!
And safely through the shadows
Lighten our journey home.

For the Young Folks

For the Southern Churchman.
We Thank Thee.

Margaret Frampton Harper.

We thank Thee, Father, for the light
And all that makes this world so bright;
For words and smiles and loving care,
And everything that gives us cheer.

We thank Thee, Father, for the night,
And for Thy guidance when our sight
Seems too dim for us to tread
The way which leads us home to God.

We thank Thee, Father, for this life,
For joy, for sorrow, for peace and strife;
And all that makes our life complete,
Until we reach the blood-bought seat.

We thank Thee, Father, for Thy Son.
And when our work on earth is done—
We would thank Thee for a place
Purchased for us by His grace.

The Giving Story.

There was once a little Prince who had everything in the world to make him happy. He had a kind father and mother who were king and queen; he had a velvet suit for every day in the week and two for Sunday; he had a little white pony and a great white dog, and so many toys that they filled several playrooms. There were ladies-in-waiting to tell him stories, and gentlemen-in-waiting to teach him to hunt and to ride, and many little pages to teach him new games and take care of his toys and find them when he lost them.

Yet the little Prince was not happy. Sometimes he sat looking at his window for an hour at a time looking down at the brown winding path in the forest that lay just below the palace. Here the little children from the village played, and the Prince liked to watch them.

"The Prince must be ill," said the King. "He plays very seldom now."

"He never smiles," said the Queen. "We must call the court doctor."

So the court doctor, looking very important, came and looked at the Prince's tongue, but all the time the little Prince was looking out of the window.

"See that boy down in the forest; he is giving a little girl a ride on his sled, and they are carrying home a green hemlock tree that he cut with his hatchet. It will be their Christmas tree, won't it? I wish I could go and see their gifts when the tree is trimmed," he said.

The court doctor shook his head. "The little Prince is not in need of medicine," he said. "What he needs is a gift that will give him more pleasure than any gift ever gave him before. That will make him quite well again."

It was very near the joyous Christmas-time, so every one in the whole court put on his thinking-cap and tried to think of a more beautiful gift than any other, which he could give to the little Prince to make him happy on Christmas Day.

The King bought a train of toy cars that could run, quite alone, on a set of toy tracks, and whenever they passed the little signal stations red or blue or green lights flashed.

The Queen bought a wonderful toy circus, in which there was almost every kind of a toy animal, and clowns that would jump, and doll trapeze performers, and dolls that would walk upon a tight rope. There were other gifts too—a ball that had a covering woven of gold thread, and a white fur cloak, and a gold watch with shining jewels set in it, and a silver trumpet, and a box of a hundred toy soldiers with the officers in uniform like the uniform of the court, and a fairy book with gilded covers and colored pictures.

All these most beautiful gifts the little Prince found when Christmas dawned all white and green in the castle.

He started his cars, but when the little signal lights flashed he did not see them. for he was looking out of the window and down at the evergreen trees in the forest so white with snow. He set up his circus but when the toy clowns tumbled merrily over each other the little Prince was not watching them. He had seen some small footprints in the snow path of the forest, and he was watching them from his window. Suddenly the little Prince called for his own sleigh. He carried all his gifts down to it—the train of cars that would run alone, and the circus that had jumping clowns, the golden ball, the fur cloak, the watch, the silver trumpet, the box of soldiers, and the book of fairy tales with gilded covers and colored pictures.

No one saw the little Prince, wrapped in his fur cloak, drive away; every one else in the palace was enjoying his own Christmas gifts. Presently no one could have seen him if they had tried for he took the road that went through the forest, and followed the footsteps that he had seen from the castle window in the snow.

He knew whose footsteps they were. On and on they led until they stopped at the door of a very small house at the edge of the village. The little Prince thought that he had never seen so small a house in all his life before, but he thought, too, that he had never heard such happy laughter as came through the keyhole.

When they opened at his knocking the little Prince saw the same little boy and girl that he had seen in the forest, and there was the same little green hemlock tree that the boy had cut down. It was trimmed with a few gilded nuts and a string or two of popcorn and an apple.

There were no toys, but the children were dancing about the tree as if it shone with a hundred candles and were hung with a hundred toys.

When they saw the little Prince and watched him bring in from his sleigh all his wonderful toys, they could not say a word for their surprise.

"It is the Prince!" they said. They began bowing to him but he motioned to them to stop.

"I am only a little boy," he said, "and I have brought you some Christmas toys. I will stay and play with you awhile if you would like to have me."

The Prince had never had so splendid a time in all his life as he had then, playing with the boy and girl in the house that was smaller than any he had ever seen in all his life before. The boy could tell him about tiny animals that lived in the woods and were more wonderful than those in the toy circus, and the little girl told him fairy tales that were not in any book. The children themselves were happier, too, than they had ever been before playing with their new toys, and as the little Prince watched them he suddenly felt as warm and well and merry as if he were out in the sunshine of a summer day.

He still felt happy when he told the children good-bye and went home. It was the joyous laughter of the little Prince that called the King and Queen and all the others to his playroom.

"Which gift is it that has made you well?" they cried, and then they looked around in surprise, for the Prince's Christmas gifts were not there. "Where are your gifts?" they asked.

"I gave them away," said the little Prince. "But I feel as if I had found a gift over there." He pointed to the forest. "It sings like a bird inside me."

So they understood about the little Prince. He had found on Christmas the gift that is best of all—the gift of unselfishness.—Carolyn S. Bailey, in Kindergarten Review.

A Belated Christmas Tree.

Everybody called them the "Ash" children, because their father was an ashman, and did nothing all day but haul ashes and trash. But sometimes he found things among the trash which brought joy to his family, for they were not hard to please.

They lived in a tumble-down house on the outskirts of a big city. They could not go to school because they did not have the right kind of clothes, and they had to take turns wearing the few shoes they possessed. So when Miny was out Jinny had to stay in.

And Christmas! Why this year it came and went, and they had nothing but some cake a kind woman gave their father, to his delight.

You see, their mother was dead, and there was no one to sew or wash their clothes.

Miny could cook a little, and when "Pop," as the children called their father, got his wages he always bought bread and potatoes, and once in a while a little coffee.

Abe and Chaddie, the twins, said they were going to be ashmen, too, some day, but Jinny said she did not think ashmen got very rich.

It was the twenty-fifth of February, and a bitter-cold day, so cold that they had stuffed so many rags in the window that they could hardly see out. By and by Jinny, hearing the sound of Pop's cart, opened the window and looked out. Then she shouted in glee: "Oh, come, Miny and Chaddie and Abe, see what Pop has brought—a Christmas tree!"

And sure enough, there in the cart was a discarded Christmas tree, yellow and faded, but just the same a Christmas tree. It did not take them long to rush out and help "Pop" bring it in, and if the rich Mrs. Wynne had seen the joy those Ash children had over that tree she would have been surprised indeed, for saucy little Bobby Wynne had looked at it critically in all its trimmed beauty and then said: "They have a prettier one at the Carter's house."

In a short time it was in a corner of the kitchen, and the belated Christmas began. Things from Pop's cart, boxes, tin cans, an apple or two, colored twine and all sorts of "trash" went on that tree, and then Jinny lit a candle and they all took hands and danced around it, "like the people in the book did," said Miny, who loved pictures. "Pop" sat back and smoked a pipe, and was glad he had not dumped the tree, as old Griggs had told him to do, saying: "Who wants a Christmas tree in February, man? Christmas is over long ago, and some people's mighty glad it is!"

It was late when the Ash children went to bed that night, but Christmas did not end that day. No, indeed; it lasted all week, and then they planted it in their yard, for Jinny said: "Well, we have the tree anyway, and maybe next Christmas we'll find some prettier trimmin's like they have in the stores."

But they did not have to wait until "next Christmas," for the night before Easter there was a commotion in the back yard, and when Easter morning dawned, beautiful colored eggs hung all over the tree, and shoes and trousers and dresses and hats were piled up under it, and a big purple card with gold letters spelled the words: "Happy Easter to the Ash Children."

And I won't tell you what they did, for you can easily guess.—From the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

A Bit in Doubt.

That Willie Brown, he truly is
The worstest boy I know;
He teases me, he pulls my hair,
And hurts my feelings so
He makes such awful faces and
He rolls his eyes and grins;
If I was Willie I'd be scared
To have so many sins.

Last night he told me that there was
A goblin on the hill;
A nasty, squeezey, squoozy thing
What looks for kids to kill.
Of course I knew he made it up,
'Twas such a silly yarn;
But just the same I was afraid
To go up to the barn.

But sometimes Billie's awful nice,
And shares his sweets with me;
I guess I sort of like him when He's good as good can be,
If he would only stay that way,
And not get rough and crow,
'Cause when he does I b'lieve he is
The worstest boy I know.

The Lady Who Wanted to Go to School.

Translated from the Chinese—By Martha Lee.

Once upon a time there lived a very pretty lady, and she wanted to go to school, but her father would not let her because there were no girls' schools and he did not want her to go to a boys' school.

One day she said to her father: "If I dress like a man, I promise you that you won't know who I am because I will look exactly like a man."

The father, however, said he would always know his daughter, no matter how she was dressed. But the lady was not so sure about that, so she got some men's clothes and put them on, and then she bought some fortune tellers' things and went to the door of her father's house and asked if she might tell his fortune. The servants led her in and she called her father. When he came in she began bowing, and her father said he wanted her to tell the fortune of his daughter.

"She is going to a boys' school and every one is going to take her for a boy," said the daughter. Then her father dismissed her. She immediately went around to the front. Here she met her father, and she was very glad to see that no one was with him, for she was going to take her costume off so he could see who she was. She stepped up to him and said:

"Father, do you know me?" She threw off her disguise as she spoke. "I am your own daughter, and you did not know me."

The father was astonished beyond words. He only stood and stared at her.

"Now," continued the girl triumphantly, "I can go to school and nobody will know me."

At last the old father found voice to speak with.

"You may go to school if you like," said the father sadly. At this the girl was delighted and went to a store to get her boys' clothes.

She came back a little later with a whole outfit of boys' clothes. The next day she started out to find a school. Her father was very sorry to see her go, but that did not stop his high-spirited daughter.

She had not gone far when she met a boy who was going to the same school that she was going to. So they both went along, very happy to think that they were going to the same school.

When they got there they were allowed to have a room together. They were both the best scholars in the whole school, and no one suspected her of being a girl, not even her room-mate.

When she had completed her studies she prepared to go home, and of course she thought her room-mate would get ready to go too, but he did not.

The day she was going away she asked him why he did not get ready to go too.

"I must stay here one year more, before I go," he said.

The girl was sorry to hear this, but nevertheless she went on home that day.

Her father was overjoyed at seeing his daughter again. And so great was his joy that he decided to have a feast. Many friends were invited to this feast and all of them had a fine time.

One man at the feast was very rich and well educated and also very handsome. So the father decided that this young man should be the one for his daughter to marry,* but his daughter did not want to marry this other man and she cried and entreated her father not to make her marry him, but the father was firm in his purpose and paid no attention to her. The daughter wanted to marry her boy room-mate, and though she did not succeed in getting her father to let her marry her room-mate, she did get him to wait till the end of the year, for it was then that her friend was coming home.

But her room-mate did not come as soon as the girl expected, and the father said that he was certainly not going to change the day of wedding again, so they had the wedding one day before the school-mate came home.

The next day he came, and when he got to the girl's house he found them at a feast, and it was the wedding feast of the girl. The girl was delighted to see her old friend again, but when her friend saw that she was a girl he was very much surprised, but glad too.

The wedding was over now and the girl was married to the other man, whom she did not like at all.

Her father would not let her marry the man she loved, but though they did not marry, they were always fast friends.

One day a note came from her friend saying that he was very sick and wanted to see her right away. She went as fast as possible to her friend, but she did not get there in time, for when she came to his bedside he was dead. She was very sorry that he was dead, and she had a grand funeral for him.

One day she decided to go and see his grave, so she made her servants get out her sedan chair and she went and got her best clothes on and set out in her chair. When she got to the grave she began to wail and cry.† And suddenly the grave opened and the girl was so sad that she just jumped right into the open grave. When the servants saw this they were very much frightened. Just as the grave closed one of the servants caught a piece of the girl's skirt and tore it off of her and then he and the other servants hurried home to tell the sad news.

As soon as the girl's husband saw her skirt and heard the news he ran away and hanged himself.

And that is

The Little Red Balls.

Mary Ann Elizabeth and Bobby carefully looked on as big Cousin Madge from the city washed the cranberries and put them in a pan upon the stove. They were dark red and almost as big as the marbles Bobby had stowed away in a small wooden box.

"Do they grow in other countries than our own?" he asked.

"Yes," said Cousin Madge, "they also grow in Europe and in Asia. Shall I tell you how the foresight of one man developed the cranberry industry in America?"

"Oh, please do!" pleaded Mary Ann Elizabeth at once.

"In the Cape Cod district and in the marshlands of New Jersey the cranberries grow wild just as our common weeds grow wild here. Any person some years ago could pick them in the stray corners and in the marshes. The people sold them to the sailors, who were very fond of them.

"It was sixty years ago that a man, who bore the spider-like name of Webb, came to New Jersey. He was a hustler, although he had only one leg. During one autumn he picked cranberries and succeeded in selling them in his own neighborhood. Then he began to think of the possibility of growing cranberries for market.

"He noticed that the salt-water bogs where the cranberries grew wild were often covered with a coating of sand. He also noticed that in these sand-covered bogs the cranberries grew larger and had a better taste than those without the film of sand.

"And then and there poor old one-legged John Webb caught a big idea. He held on to it. He developed it. Out of his bog he jerked the stumps and other debris. He carefully leveled the surface and put on two or three inches of sand-covering. Then he planted slips from the wild bushes.

"Webb's work was a success. Since he blazed the way, the little red balls that help so much to make merry both Thanksgiving and Christmas have been cultivated, and now cranberries are a staple holiday food or embellishment."

"What does a plant look like?" queried Bobby.

"The cranberry plant," Cousin Madge continued, "may well be called a creeper. It is also an evergreen. The leaves are dark and shiny and about an inch long. They bloom in May or a little later, and the flowers have a beautiful rose-pink hue.

"The berries ripen in August and September. Then the armies of pickers arrive. The best of them will pick four bushels daily. The land yields about thirty-five barrels, or $300 to the acre. So you see the growing of cranberries is very profitable and that we owe much to John Webb, who discovered their true value."

"Cousin Madge," asked Mary Ann Elizabeth, "how many kinds of cranberries are there?"

"Dears," she replied, as she peeped at the cranberries stewing in the pan upon the range, "the kinds are fewer than the fingers of one hand—just three in this country. They are the bell-shaped, the oblong or bugle, and the round or cherry, which is probably the kind you have most often seen at the market-house.

"Most of the cranberries are dark red, but their color varies from dark purple to pink. The cultivation of cranberries is an industry in New Jersey, Cape Cod and elsewhere; but the little red balls grow wild in marshes from South Carolina to Maine."—Evelyn Lee, in Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Telling the Good News.

In the first Book of the New Testament, St. Matthew tells us how an angel came to St. Joseph, who was the husband of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

This bright and glorious angel told Joseph that Mary was to be the mother of the Son of God. This Child was not to be named as children usually are—because some member of the family has a certain name; or because one name sounds prettier than another. He, being the Son of God, was to be named as God directed; and God sent this holy angel to tell Joseph that the Child was to be named Jesus. Now, the name Jesus meant that He was to save His people from their sins.

So you see, before our dear Lord was ever born, someone knew He was coming, and knew just what His Name was going to be, and why.

Long, long before that time a great prophet had said that a pure maiden was to bring forth a Son, who was to be called Emmanuel, which means God with us. It is one of the names our Lord has always been given. So you see our Lord was expected, and at least a few people knew that He was to be the Son of God, come down from Heaven to save His people and make them good.

When the angel had told Joseph all these things, we read that Joseph watched over Mary carefully and reverently, for he knew she was to be the Mother of Christ. He knew she was going to hold the Lord Himself in her arms, and wrap Him in tiny baby-clothes, and feed Him and keep Him well and strong, and teach Him all she could. This makes us see that white He was really and truly God, yet He also was really and truly man. For if He had not become really and truly man, He could not have understood us and sympathized with our every trouble and weakness and sorrow and temptation as He does; He could not have loved us as deeply and wonderfully as He does, either.

You see, He came down to earth and lived with mankind as man. So He knows how it is to be cold and hungry and tired and homeless and poor and forgotten and misused. And when we are grateful and thankful and happy because we are well taken care of He understands just why.

It is wonderful to have such a near and dear Friend, Who is always watching over us and loving us.

Because it is so wonderful, we must try to spread the story, and get people to come to church and learn about the God we worship and love. We must tell people about the Church, which our Lord came to earth to found. We must tell about her, and we must also live up to all the good and loving things she teaches. For people will pay more attention if they see that we are living good lives.

We will be bringing sunshine and happiness and content into people's lives if we help them to love God; for God especially loves those who love Him and do His good work.—Shepherd's Arms.

Two Tin Clocks.

Grandfather and Arnold were sitting on the verandah of Arnold's home, waiting for the rest of the family to get ready for church. Grandfather was enjoying his visit, for he and Arnold were the best of chums.

"What time is your Sunday-school held?" asked grandfather.

"At twelve o'clock—right after preaching service," answered Arnold; "but I'm not going to stay to-day."

Grandfather looked at him in surprise. "Aren't you well?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, but I don't feel like it. It's too pleasant out of doors."

"I thought from your letters last winter that it took something pretty serious to keep you away from Sunday-school," said grandfather. "You wrote how you waded through the drifts during a regular blizzard one Sunday; and another time, when you had to stay at home on account of the grippe, you seemed nearly heart-broken."

"Oh, there was a contest on then—the reds and the blues! I was on the blue side and we won—true blues, you know; I didn't miss but one Sunday for five months, and I got six new scholars!"

"Good!" exclaimed grandfather. "How many have you got since?"

"I haven't tried since," replied Arnold. "When the contest was on every new scholar counted ten points, and I did some hustling, I tell you—asked all the scholars in my school if they went to Sunday-school anywhere, and if they didn't I got them to come to ours. It was against the rules to get them from another Sunday-school."

"I suppose you don't miss a Sunday very often," remarked grandfather.

Arnold looked a little embarrassed, and he felt relieved when grandfather went on without waiting for an answer. "Ever notice the little old clock on grandmother's kitchen shelf—the one she cooks by?"

"Without any glass over its face?" asked Arnold.

"Yes, that's the one," laughed grandfather. "Hard-looking ticker, isn't it? Your Uncle Bob bought it when he went away to school. He needed an alarm clock to get him up in the mornings when he didn't have mother to call him. His 'little tin clock,' he always called it. It went through the academy with him, and when the four years were over it bore the marks of many a scuffle. Its glass was gone, its sides were dented, and the end was broken from one of the hands. Bob thought it was too shabby to keep, so he threw it into the waste-basket with some paper, old shoes and other rubbish. When his trunk had gone and he was ready to leave for home he sat down a minute to take a last look at his room. It was very quiet, and in the stillness he heard the little tin clock ticking faithfully on in the waste-basket. He dug it out, put it into his coat pocket and brought it home, still ticking.

"Mother laughed when he set it on the kitchen shelf by the side of a new 'tin clock' which I had purchased for her a few days before. The new clock was what Bob's had been when he bought it—bright and shining. Beside it Bob's looked worse than ever; but his ticked just as merrily as the new one. Did you ever think how much company a clock is, and how quickly you notice when it stops? Nothing will make a fellow feel more homesick. 'When I heard that little tin clock of mine ticking in the waste-basket,' Bob said, 'I couldn't bear to leave it. It seemed like throwing over a good old friend. It keeps dandy time!'

"We'll put it up in the back chamber," said mother.

"Well, the new clock worked fine all summer, but in the fall, when the nights were cool, we often found it stopped in the morning, though it had been wound the night before. We would set the hands along to the proper hour and shake it to start it going. For half a minute, perhaps, it would tick, then stop and refuse to go until it had been put on the stove and thoroughly warmed up.

"Then it began to get contrary if it didn't rest just so on the shelf, and we had to prop it up a little in front. We oiled it. Then we had it cleaned. Whenever anything was done to it it would go better for a time, then bother again. Finally we got tired of so much warming and coaxing. When mother wanted it to tell her if the eggs had boiled long enough, or if the cake was about done, just as likely as not it would be off duty.

"One day, when she was cleaning house, she brushed the dust from the 'little tin clock' in the back chamber, and for the fun of it wound it up. She thought no more about it until she was getting breakfast next morning, with the kitchen clock warming on the stove, as usual. Then overhead we heard the 'little tin clock' sound its alarm. It was seven o'clock, and it was telling Bob to get up, just as he had set it to do, though he was a hundred miles away. In less than two minutes that little old clock was on the kitchen shelf, and it has been there ever since—battered and scarred, but dependable. Whenever Bob comes home for a visit he looks at it and says, 'Little tin clock, you're all right!' What became of the other clock I don't know. We didn't consider it worthy even a place in the back chamber."

As grandfather finished his story Arnold's father and mother came out on

H. C. LOWRY.

The subject of this sketch was born in Bedford County, Va., December 15, 1839, and died in the same county November 12, 1917.

In early life he seems to have been endowed with the attributes and qualities of a man rather than with those of a child. He always exhibited a great thirst for knowledge, and had a praiseworthy ambition "to know something, to do something and to be something." To accomplish these worthy ends, he made the classics, mathematics, history, philosophy, biography his trusted allies.

He literally burnt the midnight oil, and "drank deep of the Pierian Springs." He had vast powers of intellectual digestion and assimilation. The mere acquisition of knowledge, however, was not the goal of his ambition. This knowledge and the moral strength that accomplished it were a means to an end; for he always kept the uplift of humanity within the purview of this intellectual and moral activity. The aphorism of Sir William Hamilton, "There is nothing great in the world but man," appealed to him irresistibly and spurred him to unwonted activity. "I must work while it is yet day, for the night cometh when no man can work." He had an abiding faith in the fundamental principles of the Christian religion and in the dignity and worth of human nature.

The various positions of honor and trust which an admiring people confided to his keeping were filled with rare and conspicuous ability.

In all the relations of life, as son, brother, husband, father, citizen, law-maker, he met the duties and responsibilities of these several relations with a tact, a delicacy, a firmness, a patience, an intelligence that captivate our imaginations and challenge our highest admiration.

In effect, he said with Seneca, "I will so live as not to forget that I was born for others"; and again, "I have no possessions so real as those I have given to others."

With pardonable pride could he have said with Cicero, "I am sustained by the consciousness of a well spent life."

With the great apostle he believed that "faith without works is dead," and that the forces of Christianity, which are love, charity, hope, faith, are as constant as gravity and as eternal as the stars.

Broken Measures.

Life is full of broken measures,
Objects unattained;
Sorrows intertwined with pleasures,
Losses of our costliest treasures,
Ere the heights be gained.

Every soul has aspiration

Still unsatisfied;

Memories that wake vibration

Of the heart in quick pulsation,

At the gifts denied.

We are better for the longing,

Stronger for the pain;

Souls at ease are nature wronging,

Through the harrowed soil come strong-ing

Seeds, in sun and rain.

—S. K. Bolton.

When we are filled with love it is easy to work for God; it is easy to reach the fallen and the lost, if we can only convince them that love is the motive power; it breaks down every barrier. What we need is to be baptized with the love of God. If we are filled with love, there is no danger of backbiting, or of one person starting a false report of another; if we can only be filled with the love of God, we are going to be a power all through life.—D. L. Moody.

EXCHANGE YOUR OLD BODY FOR A NEW ONE.

You can do it in three weeks and thereby renew your health. This article is written by a physician who has seen it demonstrated in numerous cases and explains how it is done.

Listen: If your weight is one hundred and thirty-three pounds your body contains eighty pounds of water, for, according to standard medical books, the human body contains sixty-seven and one-half per cent. of water. Now disease is invariably caused by impurities which we call poison, and these are readily dissolved by the right kind of natural mineral water. Drink ten gallons (eighty pounds) of Shivar Mineral Water (use no other water for twenty-one days), and you will have exchanged your old body for a new one, so far as the soluble part of it is concerned. The impurities will be dissolved and pass away. If you suffer with dyspepsia, indigestion, sick headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, uric acid poisoning, or other conditions due to impure blood, accept Mr. Shivar's liberal offer which appears below. Read the following letter carefully; then sign and mail it:

New Year.

We are standing on the threshold, we are in the opened door,
We are treading on a border-land we have never trod before;
Another year is opening, and another year is gone;
We have passed the darkness of the night; we are in the early morn;
We have left the fields behind us over which we scattered seed;
We pass into the future which none of us can read.
The corn among the weeds, the stones, the surface mould,
May yield a partial harvest; we hope for sixty-fold.
Then hasten to fresh labor, to thresh, and reap, and sow,
Then bid the new year welcome, and let the old year go—
Then gather all your vigor, press forward in the fight,
And let this be your motto, "For God, and for the Right."

Personal Notes

The Very Rev. Carroll M. Davis, Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, Mo., has returned from Rouen, where he served as chaplain of the Barnes Hospital Unit of St. Louis.

The Rev. F. W. Cornell, rector of Grace Church, Millbrook, N. Y., has resigned, and will on February 1, 1918, become a member of the Episcopal City Mission in New York City.

The Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, Md., preached on Sunday, December 9, at the Chapel of the United States Military Academy at West Point.

The Rev. Alexander W. Seabreeze, a retired minister of the Diocese of Easton, has moved from Port Deposit, Md., to 1704 Princess Street, Wilmington, N. C.

The Rev. G. A. Carstensen, D. D., who has accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Holy Rood, New York, entered upon his new duties on January 1.

The Rev. William L. Haupt has entered upon his duties as assistant to the vicar of the Chapels of the Nativity and the Resurrection, Washington. D. C., and should be addressed at 210 Thirtieth Street, S. W.

The Rev. Charles E. Taylor, formerly of the Diocese of Chicago, has become assistant minister at St. James Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., and should be addressed at 51 Irving Place, Brooklyn.

The Rev. Joseph W. Watts, who is in charge of Holy Trinity Parish, Ocean City, N. J., should be addressed at 1844 North Twenty-first Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Rev. Joshua B. Whaling, who has been elected Archdeacon of the Northwestern Convocation of the Diocese of Texas, will enter upon his duties on January 15.

The Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., was unanimously re-elected president of the New England Society of Charleston, December 21. This venerable society has had only eight presidents in its history of ninety-eight years.

Mr. John S. Vernet, a postulant for Holy Orders from the Diocese of West Virginia, has recently enlisted in the navy. He was at the time of his enlistment a student at the University of West Virginia, at Morgantown, and is now stationed at the Naval Training Station, Newport, R. I.

The Rev. Francis A. Brown, on account of Mrs. Brown's health, has resigned the rectorship of St. Mary's Church, Manhattanville, New York City, and has taken work in California for a year. Address Redwood City, Calif.

The Rev. R. Y. Barber, city missionary in San Antonio (Diocese of West Texas), has resigned his work, and will take charge of Grace Church, Chanute, in the Diocese of Kansas, on the first Sunday after Epiphany.

The Rev. William T. Walsh, who has accepted the call to St. Luke's Church, Convent Avenue, New York City, expects to enter upon his new work shortly.

Ordinations.

In the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh, N. C., on St. Andrew's Day, Mr. Theodore Stroup was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Cheshire. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. A. R. Hunter and the sermon preached by the Rev. P. S. Gilman, of St. Paul's Church, Winston-Salem. Mr. Stroup is in charge of the Parish at Reidsville and the missions at Milton and Cunningham.

In St. Mary Magdalene's Church, Fayetteville, Tenn., on Sunday, December 9, the Rev. Henry F. Keller and the Rev. Ellis Miller Bearden were advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Gailor. The Rev. C. K. Benedict, D. D., Dean of the Theological Department of the University of the South, and the Rev. Professor Charles L. Wells, Ph. D., assisted in the service, and a number of the students from Sewanee were present. Mr. Keller has been deacon in charge of the church at Fayetteville for the past six months, and Mr. Bearden is taking a post-graduate course at Sewanee.

On December 9 in Christ Church, Greenville, S. C., the Bishop of South Carolina advanced to the priesthood the Rev. R. D. Malany. The candidate was presented by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Frank A. Juhan. The Bishop preached the sermon. Chaplain Fell, of Camp Wordsworth, joined in the laying on of hands.

In St. John's Church, Globe, Ariz., on December 12, the Rev. F. M. Johnson, Jr., was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Atwood. The candidate was presented by Archdeacon Jenkins, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Fuller Swift, rector of St. Clement's Church, El Paso, Texas.

On December 4, Bishop Atwood ordained to the diaconate in Trinity Cathedral, Phoenix, Mr. Lawrence Kelly, who has been in charge as lay reader of St. Paul's Mission, Yuma.

On December 21, in the Church of the Holy Cross, Mt. Pleasant, Tenn., the Rev. James C. Mitchener was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Prentice A. Pugh, and the Rev. George I. Hiller was present and assisted in the service. The Rev. Mr. Mitchener becomes rector of the Church of the Holy Cross, Mt. Pleasant.

In the Church of the Redeemer, Brookhaven, Miss., on December 14, the Rev. Harry Perry was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. T. D.

Bratton, D. D., who also preached the sermon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. George Gordon Smeade, D. D. Mr. Perry continues in charge of Brookhaven and associated missions.

In Trinity Church, Janesville, Wis., the Rev. Henry Willmann, rector, on Sunday, December 16, Bishop Webb, of Milwaukee, advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Milo Blanchard Goodall, presented by the Rev. M. Bowyer Stewart, who also preached the sermon. Mr. Goodall is in charge of the work at St. John's, Evansville and St. Martin's Brodhead, Wis.

On St. Thomas' Day, in Christ Church, Gary, Ind., the Bishop of the Diocese of Michigan City advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Nicolo Accomando, who was presented by the Rev. W. D. Elliott, rector of the Parish. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. Mr. Accomando is in charge of the Italian work in Gary.

Deaths.

The Rev. George W. S. Ayres, Archdeacon of Buffalo, died suddenly on Tuesday evening, December 11, aged sixty-two years. The funeral was held from St. Paul's Church the following Friday afternoon, the rector, the Rev. Charles A. Jessup, D. D., officiating, assisted by the Rev. Cameron J. Davis and the Rev. Nathan W. Stanton. The body was taken to Staatsburg-on-Hudson for interment.

The Rev. George Buck, retired, died in Southington, Conn., on December 9, aged eighty-seven years. The funeral services were held from St. Paul's Church, Southington.

The Rev. John Edgecumbe, aged eighty-six, and rector of Christ Church, Cranford, N. J., for the past twenty-five years, died suddenly Sunday, December 15, while making an appeal to the congregation for charity to aid the Parish poor.

The Rev. John Henry Houghton, D. D., for twenty-five years, rector of St. Mark's Church, Denver, Colo., died recently at Cherrylin, Englewood, Colo., where he had retired a short time ago, and where he was in charge of St. George's Church.

How painful it must be to a family who have perpetuated the memory of their loved ones in seeing their same style of window, same pose, same coloring, same everything, in another person's memorial window—all that they had cherished as theirs was anybody's. Why? Because intending purchasers will ask for a catalogue and, in consequence, choose a window that has probably been placed all over the country, when by writing to me they can get not only their own ideas carried out, but a new and original one and my guarantee that their window will never be duplicated.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Wealth is not in having much, but in depending on little.—Ex.

The easiest sin to commit is often the hardest to repent of.—Ex.

When men hide their sins, they usually put them in an incubator.—Ex.

"His face was as the face of an angel:" accordingly they stoned him.—Ex.

The way to find more light is to search for it with the light you have.—Ex.

We are not made rich by what we can get, but by what we can't lose.—Ex.

Greatness is achieved not by direct and eager chase, but while we are looking for something else.

One reason why St. Paul accomplished so much was that he never tried to do anything in his own strength.—Ex.

For such as I
His grace came forth
To save me for His own;
For such as I
His love He gave
To make His glories known.

O man, forgive thy mortal foe,
Nor ever strike him blow for blow;
For all the souls on earth that live
To be forgiven must forgive.
Forgive him seventy times and seven;

For all the blessed souls in heaven
Are both forgiving and forgiven.
—Tennyson.

Peace does not mean a callous calm. Peace comes from adjustment, health of soul. Peace grows on the stalk of love, in the cluster of the other spiritual graces, "joy, patience, gentleness, meekness, goodness, fidelity, self-control." Peace is part of the Mosaic we call Christian character; a beatitude from the Holy Spirit's indwelling.

"Trust in the Lord." Faith cures fretting. Sight views things only as they seem, hence her envy; faith has clearer optics to behold things as they really are, hence her peace. "And do good." True faith is actively obedient. Doing good is a fine remedy for fretting. There is a joy in holy activity which drives away discontent.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Christianity is simply coming to Christ and staying with Him. It is nothing else. That is Christianity. "Whether we live, to live unto the Lord; or whether we die, to die unto the Lord." To come to Him is to be made alive, when we share His life and shall share it forevermore. To come to Christ is the beginning of communion, and communion is partnership, and partnership is eternal glory.—J. H. Jowett.

In life—not death—
Hearts need fond words to help them on their way;
Need tender thoughts and gentle sympathy,
Caresses, pleasant looks to cheer each passing day;
Then hound them not until they useless
be;

In life—not death—
Speak kindly. Living hearts need sympathy.

—Selected.

What can we do? We can pray. Modern knowledge is showing more and more the reasonableness of prayer. Mind is now known to touch mind, and thought to influence thought. The united direction, the sustained intention of many minds will reach other minds. We give up prayer, because we so often pray amiss, without intensity, without fervor, and there is no answer. God, in Whom are the spirits of the blest, in Whom are gathered up the aspirations and the high thoughts of countless generations—God waits, ready, if we earnestly ask, to pass on to those who need our strength, our faith, our hope.—Canon Barnett.

Nelsons, the famous Bible publishers, overstocked with new editions, turned to this country for buyers, and sold the sets for the mere cost of paper and binding. The opportunity is most unusual—the books are a real bargain—but the offer is limited, and to get the sets you must act promptly.

Famous authors, including DUMAS, KIPLING, STEVENSON, SHAKESPEARE, POE, HUGO.

The binding, paper, type and size of these standard sets are uniform, and the same price—$1.95 per set—will prevail as long as the sets on hand last.

Think of getting your favorite author—that particular writer whose books you have long desired—in size and weight that are adapted exactly to hand, or pocket, or bag—that in a word are just what your ideas of a book are for comfort and utility—and at a price lower than you have ever known, or may ever know again for good books.

"When thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness."—Isa 26:9.

"Man has tried his own way and failed. His achievements of wisdom and might are crumbling before our eyes. Hunger, cold, disease, and death inhabit Europe. Sorrow fills every home. Millions linger within prisons and as many more writhe in agony in hospital or on the battle field. It is the day of God's judgment. Man's works are being tested and they do not stand the test. The fierce light of God's truth beats pitilessly upon our secret shams.

"The hour calls unmistakably to penitence and confession. Even our days of so-called peace were filled with the spirit of jealousy, suspicion, greed, and selfishness. No individual or nation can face the fierce light of this hour without a consciousness of wrong. Our first enemy is self. Before victory must come the forgiveness of our own sins, and the cleansing of our own hearts. The guilt of sin never seemed so terrible.

"There never was such a call to prayer and never such an incentive to united prayer. We are cast down by a common sorrow, overwhelmed by a common calamity, conscious of a common guilt.

"But the day of God's judgment is also the day for new visions of His love. In all the sorrow. He suffers more than we. It was not in the days of peace and prosperity, but when the dreams of the people had proven untrue and hearts were breaking that Isaiah caught that matchless vision of Him who was wounded for our transgressions, upon whom was the chastisement of our peace, and with whose stripes we are healed. So now through the smoke of a burning world, we see the same tender face, and in the midst of the fearful roar of battle we lift a clear voice of praise and adoration.

"His judgments also are a call to hope, and not to despair. The fierceness of His wrath is to burn the dross not the gold. His holiness, which hates the sin, lays the foundation for enduring civilization. Up from the ruins of war we see the ascending walls of His Kingdom."—Fletcher S. Brockman.

The man who is not afraid of little sins will soon be a slave to big sins.—Ex.

Our Dead.

Nothing is our own; we hold our pleasures

Just a little while ere they are fled;
One by one life robs us of our treasures—

Nothing is our own except our dead.

They are ours, and hold in faithful keeping,

Safe forever all they took away;
Cruel life can never stir that sleeping;
Cruel time can never seize that prey.

How the children leave us! and no traces Linger of that smiling angel band;
Gone, forever gone, and in their places
Weary men and anxious women stand.

Yet we have some little ones still ours;
They have kept the baby smile, we know,
Which we kissed one day and hid with flowers,
On their dead white faces long ago.

Is love ours, and do we dream we know it,
Bound with all our heartstrings as our own?
Any cold and cruel dawn may show it,
Shattered, desecrated, overthrown!

Only the dead hearts forsake us never;
Love that to death's loyal care has fled,
Is thus consecrated ours forever,
And no change can rob us of our dead.

—All the Year Round.

Love Towards God.

If you love God to-day with all your heart, you will love Him to-morrow with a purer love and a larger heart, and each succeeding day of life will increase your love and deepen your appreciation of God. Then when the evening of life approaches and the eye grows dim and the pulse grows weak, you will be willing and eager to meet God face to face, for He is the God of love.—Alex. C. D. Noe, in Mission Herald.

COMMON WORSHIP.

A correspondent wishes us to "say something about congregational responses and singing," being persuaded that it is not as general and hearty as it ought to be, and having a friend that thinks that "the chants are intended only for the choir."

One would like to speak a timely word on this really important matter; though there is little that has been left unsaid to urge people to this spiritual duty.

This dear old Church of ours, guided by the wisdom and experience of all the past ages of the Church as well as by her own sure instincts, has given and prescribed responsive forms of prayer and praise as being incalculably the best method of quickening and voicing the devotion of the worshippers and of securing that agreement in thought and spiritual aspiration which is implicit in the idea of common or united worship. It is needless to insist upon that, or to show how agreeable this method is to the word of God, to the best and most cherished traditions of the Church, or to the laws of psychology which govern the working of our own hearts and minds. In the Book of Common Prayer, the very name of which expresses its purpose, she has given us the choicest devotional material of God's saints, we may say from the time of Moses, for the most part the fruit of divine inspiration, arranged and adapted for the use of congregations worshipping in unity of spirit, with one mind, one heart, one voice. It is meant to be corporate worship, not only signifying but securing the fellowship and oneness of Christ's people in His body, the Church. Herein, also, it is intended that every Christian shall exercise one of the functions of his holy and royal priesthood, offering not only for himself but for all the people the sacrifice of prayer, intercession and praise unto God. The priesthood of the Church inheres in the congregation, the body of Christ's people, the presbyterate or eldership being its instructor, its president or leader, and in part its mouthpiece, but only in part. The great corporate priesthood is meant to be conscious and articulate, offering unitedly and with intention its spiritual sacrifices, and receiving the fruits thereof, not alone individually and each one in his own heart, but in the unity and fellowship of the whole congregation agreeing together and acting together in this holy service. Hence the services of the Church are responsive without an exception, every member of the congregation being directed to take his part, to voice his confession, his petition, his thanksgiving and adoration, not only in his own person, but in the name and on behalf of the entire congregation and the whole Church; and to do this audibly and openly.

Again, one great enemy to intelligent and genuine worship, the greatest, we suppose, except the sin that is in us, is that mental inertness and emotional lethargy which is so ready to overtake us when we are comfortable, conventional, and idle. Too often these conditions meet when one is in church, especially when one has come with no better purpose than to be read to, preached to, sung to and prayed about. Unluckily, some of the accessories of our public worship may be too readily perverted to encouraging this state of mind. Having nothing to do, what is to prevent one from sinking into a physically satisfying condition of semi-somnolence? The remedy is to have something to do, something to say, something to think about that requires close attention and mental alertness, something to recall us continually to self-recollection. Here we have another purpose and use of the regularly recurring responses and those parts of the service in which the worshiper is expected to take a conspicuous and articulate part. They serve to keep him awake and attentive and to form these habits within him, and this is no small matter, as every one knows who has seriously tried to control his volatile mind and vagrant thoughts for one short hour.

Other reasons suggest themselves why the responses should be made and their proper parts of the service taken by the congregation with united voice, and that a good loud one. We say it adds to the heartiness of the service, and that is a good word. It puts heart into it, not only for one's self but for one's neighbor. Worship that is not "heartly" is a poor and unworthy offering to God and of small benefit to the soul. But heartiness and sincerity are contagious, just as inattention and indifference are. The psychology of a congregation, like that of a mob, is a curious thing. As one studies it from the vantage ground of the desk or pulpit he can almost see the contrary forces contending for the control of the composite mind and attention of the unit before him. On the one hand the earnestness and concentration of a few devout worshippers here and there is having its gracious effect on those around; on the other the careless attitude, the vacant glances, even the roving thoughts of a few spread their depressing influence about them like a cold fog and visibly benumb the spiritual activities which were being warmed into life. So the battle goes on through the whole service with varying fortunes. One notices how small a thing may concentrate or distract the general attention, warm or chill the atmosphere of devotion. The aggregate mind of the congregation seems to be in a state of neutrality, ready to be swayed this way or that by any positive influence if no more than a thought-wave. It is really very impressionable. Mark the heartfelt "Amen" which follows the prayer for a beloved sick person in a village church, or a patriotic prayer in time of war, as compared with the ordinary response to the Collects.

With this in mind the value of the responses in worship is apparent. They break the monotony which induces inattention. They convey something of the alertness and devoutness of one worshiper to those about him. They recall the careless and fortify the diffident and tone up the whole spiritual atmosphere. All of which implies and demands that they should be reverently, promptly and audibly, even emphatically, made. The General Confession, the Psalter and the Creed ought to be seasons of spiritual awakening in the Morning or Evening Service, while every "Amen" should testify that the intervening silence has not been that of lethargy and forgetfulness, but of concentrated thought and devout aspiration.

Something, too, may be said for the worshiper in surplice and stole at the desk or in the altar rails. He has his own devotions to offer, his own wandering thoughts to discipline and control. But withal he is deeply concerned that the service should be a helpful and inspiring one to the congregation, and his heart is cheered by their responsiveness or chilled by their silence or indistinguishable mumblings. He is often criticised because the service seems dull and lifeless, and by the very persons who are themselves to blame. Suppose he read or recited his part of the service with no more animation or apparent interest than the congregation puts into their part. Suppose he muttered the Commandments or the suffrages in the Litany in the same listless manner in which the people make their responses. Then there would be just ground for criticism, but until he does, the mote and the beam should be looked for in their proper places.

As to singing, every one who can sing ought to sing. If one cannot sing very well perhaps he would better not sing very loudly. If he cannot sing at all the scriptural alternatives are, to "make a joyful noise" or to "make melody in (his) heart" unto the Lord. The latter is usually preferable in this case unless the tune is a loud and triumphant one. Nowadays choirs who understand their business expect the congregation to join in the hymns at least, and select tunes that make this possible. If they are really wise and considerate they apply the same principle to the chanting as far as practicable. The congregation should appreciate the choir and be in sympathy with it, but not be overawed by it. It is their leader and helper, but not their substitute. In singing praise unto our God.

Wider!

If there is one word that we need to mark over our churches and over our missionary organizations and over our own lives to-day, it is the word urged at the Missionary Congress in London in 1888, when one told of a young artist who had just begun his work under one of the great masters. As the young artist was at work, the master stood watching him for a while, and then took up a piece of charcoal and wrote the one word over his work, "Amplius." Wideness! The power was there, but everything was drawn in and contracted and huddled upon itself. "Wider!" the master wrote over the work. And as we are considering this great purpose to-day we hear the voice of the great Master, who is speaking to us, "Amplius now; wider, wider yet!" Wider penitence for our sin, wider forgiveness of our foes, wider Christian sacrifice and Christian service. Not narrower, but wider and wider yet.—R. E. Speer.

PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD.

Mr. Editor: For some time I have been following the articles in your correspondence columns on "Prayers for the Dead." It is an unfortunate term at best, and the arguments against, strangely remind one of the arguments used against prayer in general. Arguments will not get us anywhere. It seems to me the whole question resolves itself into this: God would have us bring everything in our hearts before Him. The Psalmist says, "Pour out your hearts before Him." How can any one forget the dear ones who have passed into the nearer presence of God? If we remember "all Thy servants departed this life in Thy faith and fear" in a general way, why should it be wrong to remember one of these servants by name in the privacy of our hearts? If it be right to pray for a person at the point of departure, why should it be wrong to pray five minutes afterward? Is not God just as tender-hearted as before? Why should we keep the thought of our cherished ones away from God? I am grateful that there are already "Prayers for the Dead," so-called, in our beautiful Prayer Book, so the enriching along this line bring no terrifying thoughts to me.

S. J. HEDELUND.

Fergus Falls, Minn.

Mr. Editor: I read with interest and appreciation the eirenical letter of the Rev. Martin Damer, in your issue of the 22nd ultimo, on prayers for the dead. I am not less anxious than he for an amicable adjustment of this question, and beg to say that what I am about to write is animated by the same spirit.

Mr. Damer makes two assertions, which I respectfully question.

First. That the New Testament Church was robbed of this boon—I. e., praying for the dead.

As we have only a scant record of the worship of the New Testament Church, this is a rather gratuitous assumption. The apostles were used to prayers for the dead, and when the early liturgies come into the light we find they contain very beautiful and comforting prayers for the dead.

Second. That "the great trouble with prayers for the dead was their giving hope for future repentance."

That may or may not be the case. Personally, I hold as a pious hope that there may be such an opportunity. But none of us has the right or authority, however we may fear such to be the case, to say that any particular soul is absolutely lost, for we do not know. So charity, at least, demands we extend the benefit of the doubt.

But the whole question of prayers for the dead depends not on a future probation, but on the origin and primary purpose of prayer. Why do men pray, and why is prayer necessary for ourselves and others? Is it an arbitrary requirement on the part of God?

These are questions to which I have given much thought, trying to arrive at some solution satisfactory to my mind. I beg to state some of my conclusions, subject, however, to correction from those who are wiser and more spiritually advanced than I am.

(a) Prayer arises out of the relationship in which we stand to God, as His intelligent creatures, dependent on Him, and with capacities for knowing, loving and obeying Him.

(b) Prayer for one another arises from the fact we are members one of another, in this dependence and capacity for knowing, loving and obeying God.

(c) Prayer is for maintaining and strengthening this relationship between ourselves and God on the one hand, and between ourselves on the other, whereby we grow in grace and the knowledge of God, which is eternal life, and mutually build up ourselves. For spiritual growth is social in character. (See Bishop Butler's Sermons on the Constitution of Human Nature.)

As long, therefore, as this relationship between God, ourselves and one another exists, prayer is effectual and avaleth much in its working.

The obligation of prayer arising first from our natural creation is intensified by our new creation in Jesus Christ. Over those who are in Christ, spiritual death, i. e., absolute separation from God, has no dominion, whether in this present existence or in the next. Our relationship to God and one another remains unbroken and unaltered in the Body of Christ. They who have passed from us are as much one with us and we with them as they were when here. We continue to share in the same life organized and developed according to the same principles, mutually influencing and being influenced by each other. If prayer is available and necessary on this side of the veil, it must continue so to be on the other, as essential to spiritual growth and life.

The conclusion of Sir Oliver Lodge, which he gives us in the third chapter of the third part of his recent book, "Raymond, or Life and Death," is very apt and to the point. Whatever may be thought as to the character of the evidence upon which he formed it, I find it is entirely in keeping with what I have gathered from Holy Scripture, so I give it for the consideration of those objecting to prayers for the dead.

"The Universe is one, not two. Literally there is no 'other' world except in the limited and partial sense of the other planets. The Universe is one. We exist in it continuously all the time; sometimes aware of a group of facts on one side of a partition, sometimes aware of another group on the other side. But the partition is a subjective one; we are all one family all the time, so long as the link of affection is not broken. And for those who believe in prayer at all to cease from praying for the welfare of their friends because they are materially inaccessible—though perhaps spiritually more accessible than before—is to succumb unduly to the residual evil of past ecclesiastical abuses, and to lose an opportunity of happy service."

WATCHING THEIR FLOCKS.

Idaho is a great sheep-raising State. Its mighty mountains, snow-clad in winter, make famous pastures in summer. Its bare foothills, its clear starry skies make the old story seem very realistic when one sees these watching shepherds. Here is a letter from a clergyman from far-away Idaho:

J. B. Funsten,
St. George's Rectory,
New Meadows, Idaho.

My Dear Bishop: Here is where the shy and pensive Shepherds keep watch over their flocks by night as they did in the days of Our Lord. The town-folk call them "Sheep Herders," but I always speak of them as Shepherds. For they whom Our Lord immortalized were not different than these who feed their flocks on the Mountains of Idaho.

It is a pretty picture to see these lonely creatures in the Wilderness, when the night begins to fall, with their dogs by their side and the sheep settling down for the night; while the sighing of the pines and the eternal hush of the rugged Mountains speak of a mystery, a glory, a history, far in advance of Egyptian Pyramids. These with their silvery locks, the snow-capped Mountains, look down in pity on the Shepherds and their flocks.

The bleating of the sheep and the quiet tramp of the Shepherd, with his dog at his heels, brings back to our memories the Song the Angels sang to the Shepherds on the Plains of Bethlehem of Judea, "Glory to God in the Highest!"

Make friends of the Shepherds, for they were the first who saw the Son of God, "wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a Manger." Oh, holy crib, I wish that I'd been there to hide my face at the glorious sight of Him who inhabiteth Eternity, and felt the thrill of the Shepherds who heard the Angels sing, "Peace on Earth, Good Will to Men."

TWO STORIES.

The Rev. D. F. Hoke.

I want to tell two stories; one about Absolution and the other about Service. It not infrequently happens that a simple incident or personal experience will impress some essential truth upon the mind more effectually than a labored disquisition.

A lady of my acquaintance was the matron in a public institution in which were employed a number of Irish servants. One morning, in her hurry to take her place in the breakfast-room, she dropped her brooch, and meeting the chambermaid going up to her room she asked her to look for it, saying that it must have rolled under the dresser. Later in the day, however, the girl reported that she had been unable to find it.

The matron reported the matter to the principal. He satisfied himself that the girl had taken the brooch, but was unwilling to accuse her of the theft. "Let us wait," he said, "until the priest comes and the girl goes to confession." In a short time the priest made his periodical visit, and the next morning the missing brooch was found in the top drawer of the dresser in open view. The drawer was locked, but access was had by lifting the marble top. Doubtless having carried out the instructions of the priest, he gave her absolution and quieted her conscience. Be that as it may, he failed to require what would have been a real benefit to the poor girl, namely, that she go herself to the matron and confess her fault and ask for her forgiveness. It would have been freely given, and that would have been, for her, a true absolution.

She was a clear-eyed, graceful girl with beautiful auburn hair crowning her well-poised head. Her chosen service was to teach a class of about thirty children of from seven to twelve, mental defectives, in an institution in the poorer quarter of the city. "No," she said, "I cannot teach them much, if anything. I only try to amuse them and bring a little joy into their poor, empty lives, and perhaps a ray of light into their beclouded minds."

The writer was invited to be present at their Christmas tree. Turning at random to one little girl, he asked, "How old are you?" "Twelve." "Do you know that I knew your teacher before you were born?" She gave no answer, but lifted her vacant, watery eyes to her teacher's face, and for a moment at least they were illumined with the light of love.

Doubtless the angels looked down with gladness upon the teacher as she caught the awakening gleam, and stooped to kiss the upturned face of the defective child.

WORK OF THE CHURCH WAR COMMISSION IN FRANCE. LETTER FROM BISHOP M'CORMICK.

My Dear Bishop Lawrence:

It is good to get your Christmas and New Year's greetings.

I have been in and about Paris most of the time so far on account of three things:

First. The necessary organization of the office and the popularization of our work among Church people and others in the city.

Second. The three weeks of anti-typhoid inoculation.

Third. The arrangements as to military passes. I have had an interview with General Pershing, and the matter of the passes is in process of adjustment.

I have had several conferences with Mr. Carter, the head of the Y. M. C. A., and with members of his staff, and am co-operating with him in every possible way. He is a high-grade man, very sympathetic with us and thoroughly to be trusted.

Bishop Brent has been here for some days and is now on a Y. M. C. A. tour, which is, perhaps, the beginning of his work with them. He is in a Y. M. C. A. uniform and seems quite fit. I understand that his headquarters will be in Paris and I shall, therefore, see him frequently. Bishop Lloyd came over from London, on his way to Liberia, accompanied by Archdeacon Schofield, and spent eight days, returning to London yesterday. He preached at the American Church on December 9, and then went on a flying tour arranged by Mr. Carter for the purpose of giving him at least a glimpse of conditions. Bishop Israel is still waiting for his Base Hospital. Meanwhile he has been making very acceptable addresses to the men on the Y. M. C. A. circuit. Just now he is within the British lines visiting the Deputy Chaplain General. He seems much improved in health and spirits. He is exercising the jurisdiction over the American churches in Europe, and has sent Murray to Rome to relieve Lowrie for three months.

As to the registration, we are attempting to catalogue all the men in the service and all war workers attached to our Church, wherever we can find them. We have already something like 300 names on our list, which is growing rapidly. I am sending each one a Christmas card and am having printed some thousands of cards, announcing the services of the American Church in Paris and the fact of my having my office there. These cards we will take out to the men wherever we go.

I have formed a Chaplain Auxiliaries of about twenty of the most prominent Churchwomen in the city, and am putting them into touch with the individual chaplains and their men. Through these ladies we are accumulating and distributing large numbers of books and periodicals, and we are having 3,000 pairs of woolen socks made and sent to the Chaplains for distribution, 1,400 of which have been forwarded.

As I wrote Bishop Perry, Dr. Watson has been very considerate and has given us the use of the large room on the second floor of the Parish House, with light and heat. As soon as Bishop Israel returns, he and I together will make a substantial donation to the expenses, as both light and heat are very dear. I am looking for an extra helper in the office, who can be here when either Mr. Ross or I, or both, should be out of the city, and who can assist with the correspondence, which is becoming increasingly large.

I have made several visits outside the city to camps and hospitals and canteens, and hope next Sunday to be in one of the large troop centers, where arrangements are being made for giving the men their Christmas Communion. Last Sunday I was to have been within the lines, but the engagement was cancelled by wire for military reasons, which could not be explained. Such is war!

I have seen and conferred with the following Chaplains: Messrs. Sherrill, Taylor, Bayard, Peabody, Talbot, Rollins, and Danker, and have corresponded with all the rest. Among our clergy in the Y. M. C. A. I have seen and conferred with are Messrs. Patrick, Cate, Kinsolving, Rathbun, Cleveland, Cooke, Ferguson and Lusk, and have written the rest of them. I have also seen Mr. Van Keuren, who is with the Red Cross. I have co-operated with Dean Beekman in his Soldiers' and Sailors' Club, which is a most useful piece of work, and I have had an interview with Chaplain Pierce, who is now acting as a Major, in charge of all burial arrangements for American soldiers.

In regard to the additional Clergy coming over, I have already written at length that unless they secure commissions as Chaplains, they would have to come under the Y. M. C. A. or the Red Cross, as there is almost no chance to use men independently.

As to the American University Union, I should say that in addition to its general value as a University Club, it has the advantage of giving to the men a decent and enjoyable social centre and also of putting them into touch with really wise advisers such as Professors Nettleton, Van Dyke, Lansing and Vibbert, who may be of unusual help to a man in time of perplexity or emergency.

As to moral conditions, there is no doubt that difficulties arose at first, and to some extent continue, but matters are being straightened out and regulations are becoming stringent. Men will not be allowed in Paris on leave, and the Y. M. C. A. has been asked to prepare large recreation centres, in places like Aix-les-Bains, where the men can have a good time without unnecessary temptations. I think it might fairly be said that matters are improving and that the military authorities are quite awake to the necessity for control, and wherever necessary, for punishment.

As to the requirements of Chaplains, it is manifest that the first thing needed is a small car or other means of transportation. I think that Edwards is the only man who has a car of his own. A car is better than a motorcycle, as it gives a man a chance to carry supplies and to take helpers with him. In some cases Battalions are one hundred and fifty miles from each other, and in many cases, if not in most, portions of the Regiments are widely separated. The car question would have to be settled in America, as it is practically impossible to obtain cars here. I do not think it necessary for the Chaplains to have moving picture machines or anything of that sort, as they can best be looked after by the Y. M. C. A. We need additional Prayer Books and some more of your Service Books. I am trying to get Bibles from England, as many of the men have asked for Bibles rather than Testaments. There is always a need for readable books and periodicals.

In conclusion, the men seem glad that we are here and that the Church is officially represented. They talk freely about their home Parishes and about the services. Last Sunday afternoon, in a driving snow storm, three young aviators walked a long distance to attend the service here. Two of them were from Brooklyn and one from Philadelphia, and they were good types of hundreds like themselves. Three men have come long distances to me, in Paris, for Confirmation. When I was at the base of the ambulance service, a few Sundays ago, a fine, tall Sergeant said to me, "Bishop, are you going to give us the Holy Communion?" and when I replied "Yes," said, "I'm so very glad, as it may be my last." He was going, the next day, to an exposed position. The Communion Service seems to be that which the men really prefer.

I heard from Dr. Maxon that in his Base Hospital there were four hundred men, mostly suffering from such diseases as measles and mumps. We shall have to do what we can to keep the men in good spirits this winter and to try to brace them up and cheer them.

With regards and best wishes, believe me,

Sincerely yours,
JOHN N. M'CORMICK.

Steps Upward.

Take the guide's strong hand and go,
Though his name be sorrow;
Do not fear to climb with him
To a clearer morrow.
He can take thee where the night
Passes to divinest light.

Pain holds out a hand to thee,
Take it, never shrinking;
Lift thy feet and rise with him
Higher than thy thinking.
He who follows pain's behest
Has at length most perfect rest.

God has heard thy prayers. Be glad Thou art in His keeping;
Morning songs may sweetest be
After nights of weeping.
Sad one, thou shalt sing again
In the sunshine after rain.

Special Session of the House of Bishops, New York, April 10, 1918.

A special session of the House of Bishops is hereby called, to convene in the Church Missions Home, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, at 10 A. M. Wednesday, April 10, 1918.

The Purpose of the Call Is:

I. To act upon the proffered resignation of the Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, Bishop of Utah.

II. To consider, and, if deemed best, to proceed to fill the vacancy likely to exist in the missionary District of the Philippines.

III. To act upon any other business that may lawfully be presented at a special session.

The Bishops are invited to send to the Secretary of the House any names of persons suggested for the expected vacancy in the Philippine Islands.

Each Bishop is requested to return as early as convenient, on the slip provided, to the Presiding Bishop, the statement whether he will be able to attend or no.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop
St. Louis, Mo., January 4, 1918.

Consecration of the Rev. Robert LeR. Harris, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor-Elect of Marquette.

The Presiding Bishop has taken order for the Consecration of the Rev. Robert LeRoy Harris, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of Marquette, as follows:

Time—Thursday, February 7, 1918.

Place—St. Mark's Church, Toledo, Ohio.

Attending Presbyters—The Rev. Bates G. Burt, the Rev. H. St. C. Hathaway.

Master of Ceremonies—The Rev. George P. Atwater.

Deputy Registrar—The Rev. E. G. Mapes.

DAN'L S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop.

The Work of the War Commission of the Church in Military Training Camps.

Voluntary chaplains have been appointed in nearly all of the cantonments, and in many of the National Guard and other camps. Voluntary chaplains whose salaries are paid in whole or in part by the War Commission are appointed upon the nomination of the Bishop in whose Diocese the several camps are located. In certain of the camps diocesan or provincial committees make final appointment of chaplains and pay their salaries from their own treasury. The General Fund of the Commission is used to supplement these resources where needed.

The camps in the Southeast are being rapidly supplied with well selected chaplains.

At Camp Jackson, Columbia, S. C., the Rev. Edwin A. Penick, Rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbia, has left his parish to give his whole time to his duties as chaplain.

The Rev. Robert E. Gribben, of St. John's Church, Wilmington, N. C., has been invited to accept the position of voluntary chaplain at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C., where the Rector of Christ Church has been doing indefatigable work for the soldiers who attend his services and frequent the parish house in large numbers.

The Rev. Bertram E. Brown has been requested by the Bishop of North Carolina, Bishop Cheshire, and the War Commission to move to Charlotte as voluntary chaplain at Camp Greene.

At Spartanburg, S. C., the Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, Rector of the Church of the Advent, has been spending most of his time in serving the troops at Camp Wadsworth. The Commission has provided for an assistant in his parish in order that his pastoral work in the camp may continue.

Within the past two months these camps have been visited and local arrangements made for them by Bishop Perry, Dr. Mockridge and Dr. Milton.

The Commission has appointed Dr. Milton, with the permission of the Bishops of North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia to be official visitor at the camps at Spartanburg, Greenville, Columbia, Charlotte and Augusta. Dr. Milton spent ten days after Thanksgiving in conference with the chaplains at all of these five points arranging for services and equipment. For the four camps in North and South Carolina the Commission has provided $6,000 on account of salaries for voluntary chaplains.

The Rev. E. S. Wittell has been appointed by Bishop Guerry in charge of the work among the negro troops at Camp Jackson, Columbia, S. C.

The Rev. G. Irvine Hiller, Rector of St. Peter's Church at Nashville, Tenn., has left his parish to accept the Commission's appointment as voluntary chaplain at Camp Gordon, Atlanta. His duties at the camp began January 1.

Bishop Knight, who represents the Commission as visitor in the South and Southwest, reports vigorous work done at Camp Sheridan by the parishes in Montgomery. The Rector of Grace Church, Anniston, is active at Camp McClellan.

The Rev. Lee W. Heaton has been on duty for two months as voluntary chaplain at Camp Travis, San Antonio, Tex., under the personal supervision of Bishop Capers. The Church of the Transfiguration, New York City, has sent a member of its clergy, the Rev. Dwight Cameron, to be chaplain at Camp Kelly, Anniston, and becomes responsible for his salary.

Bishop Knight and Mr. W. D. Cleveland, of Houston, Tex., are representing the Commission and making tours of all the camps in Texas this month.

The Rev. Samuel N. Dorrance has resigned his position as Rector at St. George's Church, Central Falls, R. I., to become voluntary chaplain at Jefferson Barracks, St. Louis, Mo. The War Commission nominated Mr. Dorrance to the Church Club of St. Louis, which becomes responsible for his salary and the local arrangement of his services at the camp.

The religious director of the Y. M. C. A. in one of the cantonments writes about the voluntary chaplain who has been appointed by the Church War Commission: "I want to thank you for sending us your representative. I consider him an ideal man for the place. We are more accustomed to hear of our men only when they are subject to criticism, but I appreciate the work of your chaplain so much that I deem it a privilege to remind you of our joy in working with a man of his strength, breadth and vision."

The Board of Missions, acting upon the suggestion of the War Commission, has requested Bishop Thurston, of Eastern Oklahoma, to move to Fort Sill as voluntary chaplain at Camp Doniphan for three months or more.

The Rev. Herman Page, Jr., has been appointed by the Commission as voluntary chaplain at Camp Lewis, American Lake, Washington, on the nomination of the Bishop of Olympia.

The Rev. Charles F. Collins enters upon his duties as voluntary chaplain at Camp Pike, Little Rock, Ark.

The salaries of voluntary chaplains which have been provided by the Commission up to the present time amounts to $21,500.

The Church War Commission calls upon the Church for $500,000 for the work of the Church in 1918. The War Commission is going to trust to the patriotism and loyalty of church people without creating an elaborate campaign organization. Until January 27 there will be a quick process of education of the Church, reaching the climax on January 27, when there will be a great contribution in all the churches. In order that that contribution may be adequate work must be done throughout the Dioceses and Parishes. The Bishops and clergy have already received a foreword on the subject. Literature will go out. It is hoped that the clergy will, on each and every Sunday in January, speak a strong word so as to keep the subject before the minds of the people. Envelopes and pledge cards will have been received some ten days before the 27th, and it is hoped that, either through the personal work of the laity or through the mail, that these envelopes and cards will be in the hands of the people, in order that they may make up their minds as to their gifts before the 27th.

The Alumni and Students of St. John's University, Shanghai, have raised and placed in the hands of President Pott $11,000 as their share of the $15,000 needed for the new University Gymnasium, to be erected in memory of the late Professor F. C. Cooper.

Dr. Pott has personally secured from friends in this country $2,500, and needs $1,500 more to make good his part of the pledge to the building fund.

General Theological Seminar: The annual meeting of the Board of Trustees of the General Theological Seminary will be held on Wednesday, January 16.

On the previous evening the mid-winter reunion of the Alumni will be held in the Refectory after Evensong (6 o'clock). The Rev. C. Malcolm Douglas is Chairman and the Rev. John Keller is Secretary of the Committee of Arrangements.

Camp Chaplains in New Jersey.

The Diocese of New Jersey is fortunate in having two civilian Chaplains and one United States Naval Chaplain on the ground at the three encampments within her borders. At Camp Dix, the Rev. Karl M. Block is in charge of St. George's Chapel and Club House, address Wrightstown, N. J. At Camp Vail, the Rev. Thomas A. Conover has been appointed temporary Chaplain and may be addressed, care Y. M. C. A., Camp Vail, Little Silver, N. J. At the Fourth Naval Base, Wicksahickon Barracks, Sewells Point, Cape May, N. J., the Rev. Ernest L. Paugh, one of our Clergy, is the Naval Chaplain.

These Chaplains will be very much helped in their work if the rectors or parents of any of the young men stationed at Camp Dix, Camp Vail or Sewells Point will send them their names and their regimental company.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Oak Grove, Westmoreland County: A public meeting was recently held at Oak Grove for the purpose of organizing the Community Library, which has been made possible by the generosity of a Baltimore gentleman formerly a resident of Oak Grove, and the efforts of the Rev. W. S. Llewellyn Romilly, rector of Washington Parish.

The library contains nearly one thousand volumes. The management is in the hands of a board of six persons elected from the community.

In honor of the first President of the United States, whose birthplace is near Oak Grove, the library has been named "The Washington Library of Oak Grove."

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

The War Commission of the Episcopal Church, of which Bishop Lawrence, of Massachusetts, is Chairman, has been authorized by the Church to make provision for the spiritual care of the soldiers and sailors of our Communion in the cantonments at home, as well as for those who are already serving their country on the battlefield of Europe.

The Government provides Chaplains for the Navy and Army, and helpful work is being done, both at home and abroad, by the Army Young Men's Christian Association.

The number of Army Chaplains, however, is still very inadequate, and only a small proportion of these are Clergymen of our Church. The value of the philanthropic and religious work of the Young Men's Christian Association cannot be overestimated, but this organization is not a Church, and cannot give to our men the spiritual ministrations to which they are entitled.

It is the evident duty of our Church, whilst heartily co-operating with all other spiritual agencies, to provide her own services and the Sacraments for her own children.

Bishop McCormick, of Western Michigan, and Bishop Israel, of Erie, are, with the aid of our Chaplains and members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, doing faithful work in caring for our men abroad. They need, however, more Chaplains of the Church. The Commission is endeavoring to supply this need, and, at the same time, to place volunteer Chaplains in every training camp and cantonment in this country, who shall minister to the men who belong to our own Communion, as only they can. We expect to have two Chaplains appointed for our Diocese.

The money to support these Chaplains, and to provide their necessary equipment, must come from the Church. No money will be expended in buildings, as the services can be held and the Sacraments can be administered in the Y. M. C. A. huts.

To meet these needs, which should make their own appeal to every member of Christ's Church, the War Commission asks for one-half a million of dollars—to be provided by an offering from every congregation on Sunday, January 27.

The Commission asks, as the quota of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, for seventy-three hundred dollars.

Your Bishops urgently appeal to the Church people of our Diocese to make this offering for Christ and for our sons, on Sunday, January 27, and to give notice of the offering at every service between now and then.

Every member of the congregation should endeavor to give a dollar, or at least fifty cents, but as there may be many who cannot do this, we trust that those who are able will give as generously as they can.

Where the parish is without a minister, and there is no service for the appointed Sunday, it is hoped that the vestry will arrange, through the help of earnest men and women, to secure the offerings of the people.

Your Bishops feel that the sacredness of this appeal will be felt by all of our people. There is no community which has not sent its sons to serve the country in this great hour of need. There has been made, through the Red Cross and other agencies, liberal provision for the physical care and comfort of our soldiers and sailors. It should be a willing and a loving duty to provide for their spiritual welfare, so that they may have, in the time of danger and need, the ministrations of their own Church and the help of the Blessed Sacrament.

Your Bishops, with a prayer to God to open the hearts of His people to this call, lovingly appeal to the congregations of this Diocese to do their duty, as the sons of Virginia and of our dear Church have always done.

Send the offering, as soon as possible after it has been made, to the Rev. Joseph B. Dunn, D. D., Treasurer Diocesan War Commission Fund, St. Paul's Rectory, Lynchburg, Va.

May God strengthen and comfort the people of the Diocese in these days of stress, and enable them to do, with ready wills and loving hearts, their full service to Christ and to our country.

Faithfully and affectionately yours;
ALFRED M. RANDOLPH,

Bishop.

The Indian Mission in Amherst.

As the former rector of the churches in Amherst, I should like to commend to the consideration of the different churches the work done and the needs of the Indian Mission. The work for the past six months has been under the care of Miss Isabel Wagner, a most efficient and capable worker. She is doing a splendid work and should have the hearty support of the churches in Virginia. The need of the people for clothing is very great. As a rule many boxes are sent every year, but this year, owing to the interest which has been shown in Red Cross and other war work, the Indians have not received enough clothing to keep them warm.

Almost any kind of clothing can be used, that which is needed by newborn babies, to old men and women.

These people are a kindly simple folk, and have in them the making of splendid Christian men and women.

Though I am no longer connected with this work, I will take the greatest pleasure in answering any letter of inquiry. Everything for the Mission should be sent to Miss Isabel Wagner, whose post-office and freight and express address is Amherst, Va.

GEO. E. ZACHARY.

Emmanuel Church, Kempsville: By the will of Miss Susan Ingram, of New York and Norfolk, who died recently, the sum of $10,000 is left to Emmanuel Church, Kempsville, Princess Anne County, the Rev. R. J. Alfriend, rector.

Six hundred dollars is left to the Norfolk Protestant Hospital to maintain a room in memory of her parents. Dr. and Mrs. John Ingram.

Christmas in Roanoke was celebrated with the usual hearty services and Sunday-school celebrations. At both St. John's Church and Christ Church the Armenian and Syrian sufferers came in for special consideration and offerings.

The Rev. Claudius F. Smith, rector of Grace Church, Lynchburg, whose resignation has been reported in the papers, has decided to remain in the parish. Mr. Smith did not actually present his resignation, but it became known that he expected to do so. He changed his purpose, however, at the earnest request of the vestry and congregation, and other organizations and individuals all over the city, who expressed their appreciation of the splendid work that he is doing.

The Rev. David H. Lewis, rector of Trinity Church, South Boston, has received his appointment as Y. M. C. A. Secretary, and expects to sail for France shortly.

The Rev. George Gordon Smeade, LL. D., Archdeacon of Mississippi, was the preacher at St. Paul's Salem, on the Fourth Sunday in Advent.

Patriotic Service for Deaf-Mutes.

On the evening of Friday, December 28, the Chapel of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, was filled with an enthusiastic congregation of deaf-mutes, their children and friends, assembled for their Annual Christmas Festival.

Preceding the program of gift-giving, an inspiring patriotic service, including the presentation and blessing of a beautiful silk standard, the united gift of the members and friends of the Mission, was held. The vested choir of deaf-mute women, followed by the Rector of the Church, the Rev. Romilly F. Humphries, and the Minister in charge of the Mission, the Rev. Oliver J. Whildin, advanced up the aisle of the Chapel singing in the sign language of the Deaf, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," after which a short service of Evening Prayer was held. Hymn 194 followed, during the singing of which the flag-bearer came slowly up the aisle, entered the chancel and stood at the Gospel side of the Altar while the Dedication Prayers were said. Then came the placing of the flag, the pledge of allegiance, the salute and the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by choir and people synchronously in the silent language and orally. A most beautiful and soul-stirring address by the Rector, interpreted into the sign language by Miss Olive Whildin, a daughter of the Minister in charge, was made, after which all sang the Doxology.

It is proposed shortly to place in the Chapel a Service Flag having a star for each one of the sons of deaf-mute parents of Maryland who have been called to the colors, and it is known that the number of the stars will not be few.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop

Institution of Rector: In the presence of a large congregation on Sunday morning, December 30, the Rt. Rev. James B. Funsten, D. D., Bishop of Idaho (acting for the Bishop of Washington), instituted the Rev. Meade Bolton MacBryde as rector of Grace Church (S. W.), Washington. The impressive service, with appropriate and well rendered music; Bishop Funsten's stirring sermon, and the presence of a large number of men in uniform, gave to the occasion a peculiar solemnity which will long be remembered by those present.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop

Against Closing the Churches.

The Right Rev. William A. Guerry, Bishop of South Carolina, has given the following statement for publication:

"Of course, every good citizen sympathizes with the effort of the government to conserve coal, food and all supplies which will help us to win the war. But in this crisis it seems to me unfortunate that there should be any suggestion from representatives of the government that the Christian churches should be closed on Sunday in order to save coal.

"If this is a war of principles, or, as the President has expressed it, to make the world a safe place for democracy, it must be evident to every thinking man that you cannot make the world a safe place for democracy until you first make it a safe place for the Kingdom of God; and that there never has been a time when people needed more than now the inspiration and consolation of their religion. Therefore, instead of shortening our services and reducing their number by any plan of co-operation, it seems to me that we ought to encourage our people to go to church more frequently than they do.

"To conserve fuel by holding union services would result in fewer people attending church. Local attachments would be weakened and responsibility for attendance on one's own parish church would be undermined. The advantages to be gained would be doubtful. In this time of war I am not in favor of doing anything which would tend to decrease church attendance, which would undoubtedly result if this plan were adopted.

"It strikes one as rather inconsistent in this great national crisis when religion should mean so much to our people that representatives of the Fosdick Commission at Charleston and elsewhere should seriously propose the opening of 'movies' on Sunday afternoon. If fuel is going to be saved anywhere let it be in the 'movies' and not in the churches. People can do with less amusement, but we cannot afford to dispense with religion. I feel very deeply that it is a mistake at this time to endorse any movement which tends to undermine a man's religious convictions. While we are conserving food and fuel we need to conserve even more moral and spiritual influences in the life of the nation."

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Brunswick; Service Attended by Greek Sailors.

On Friday, December 28, a British steamer brought in seventy-two Greek sailors who had been picked up a short distance from Gibraltar, where their steamship had been attacked by a German submarine. The crew were put into small boats and set adrift upon the ocean. They were in these boats twenty-one hours without food or water, and scantily clothed, for the Germans had taken off their clothing, and were brought to this port by said British steamer. After being passed upon at Quarantine they were put ashore at Brunswick and the rector of St. Mark's Church, the Rev. R. E. Boykin, finding them about dark, immediately set to work to provide means for their relief in which he was most loyally sustained by the Greek citizens of Brunswick and others, who have done everything in their power for their fellow countrymen in distress. Saturday their company in New York telegraphed them one thousand dollars.

On Sunday morning they phoned around to know about the services at St. Mark's Church, where the local Greeks attend for ministrations, and the whole crew of seventy-two (as not one had been lost) attended services in a body. It was the usual celebration of the Holy Eucharist. After the Rector had said the Nicene Creed in its proper place, he turned to the Greeks, through an interpreter, and told them to say the Creed in their own language, which they did, and then sang a hymn of thanksgiving for their safe deliverance from the enemy and from the dangers of the sea; and our own choir sang a hymn immediately afterwards. The Rector then made an address through an interpreter to the Greeks, speaking of their safe deliverance and how meet it was that they should gather in God's house to give thanks in a body. This was the first time they had ever been in an Anglican or Episcopal church, but they did not seem at a loss to know what to do, but of course remained standing during the entire service.

There will be a celebration at midnight on January 6, the 7th being the Christmas of the Orthodox. This will be for the local Greeks, as the sailors will be leaving in a few days for New York to go back to take their places aboard ship. The Greeks here always look to us for ministrations, and so notified their fellow countrymen when they landed here in distress, where they could be ministered to both physically and spiritually.

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.

The Colored Suffragan Bishop-Elect.

The following letters have been received by Bishop Winchester in regard to the recent election of Archdeacon Demby as Suffragan Bishop.

Bishop Gailor says:

"I received your letter some days ago and was not surprised to hear that Archdeacon Demby had been elected Bishop-Suffragan. His letter to me was a model of humble and consecrated willingness for service. His going rather upsets my work, and for the present I shall not try to fill his place, but await the trend of events."

From Rev. F. C. Steinmetz:

"You have taken a great forward step in dealing with the colored people. There is no doubt in my mind that you have blazed the way toward success. I congratulate you on your pioneer faith; it is good to have a Bishop in the Church who is not afraid to lead."

Also the following from a colored clergyman:

My Dear Bishop:

I am writing to express the great joy that is in my heart, by reason of the recent election of Archdeacon Demby to the Episcopate. We all feel quite sure, in this section of the country, that you have made a very wise choice, for we know of no one who is so admirably suited to discharge the functions of that high office in the Church.

We are especially grateful to the Diocese of Arkansas and her most worthy Bishop for taking what we consider to be the grandest step that has ever been taken by the American Church, in relation to her work among the colored people of this country.

The Diocese of Arkansas has actually done what others have spoken of doing and intended to do, but yet have never had the courage to actually undertake. The name of Bishop Winchester will go down in history as that of the one man who had sufficient confidence in the negro race to actually do something. We are justly proud of the Bishop of Arkansas, and cannot but express our appreciation and gratitude.

Archdeacon Demby is a loyal and devoted son of the Church, and I predict that the Church will never have reason to regret the wise choice that she has made.

With all our hearts, we thank you for bringing this thing to pass.

FREDERICK A. GARRETT.

Trinity Cathedral, Little Rock: Since the coming of the Very Rev. Rufus B. Templeton, D. D., as Dean of Trinity Cathedral, this splendid old Cathedral Parish has taken on new life. The attendance at the various services has greatly increased; the old indebtedness has been cancelled; a new heating plant installed, and a new slate roof placed on the Cathedral. The appearance of the building has been greatly improved by the extension of the cornice and eaves, and the painting of all woodwork. Several memorials have been placed. Contract for the rebuilding of the organ has been let, and work will begin this month. This is to be a memorial to Mrs. Pierce, wife of Bishop Pierce, first Diocesan Bishop of Arkansas, by their daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Lyman, who has been the organist in the Cathedral for over thirty years.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

Aberdeen: Special services were held in St. John's Church, Aberdeen, on Sunday, December 23, in thanksgiving for the recovery of Jerusalem. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the rector, the Rev. J. W. Fulford, and many of the members of other churches in Aberdeen communed with the congregation of St. John's. The offering was for the Armenian and Syrian Relief Fund.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Church Work at the Almshouse: For forty years there has been a Newark Almshouse Committee of Church women providing for a service at the City Almshouse one Sunday each month and in Christmas week providing a feast for the inmates, now about three hundred in number. Miss Emma V. Gordon, of Grace Church, Newark, who died a few weeks ago, was the most active person in the society and a remarkable woman for her wide friendship and her fine spirit. The Rev. Wynant Vanderpool has been the chaplain of the society. During these many years by the giving of small gifts a fund of $2,500 has been accumulated, and this year at the time of the dinner it was announced that the whole sum had been set apart with the Diocesan trustees, the income to be used for the provision for the regular visitation by one of the clergy appointed by the Bishop.

Mrs. DeCatur Sawyer, long president of the Woman's Auxiliary, recently deceased, left a bequest to the Diocese of Newark of $2,000, the income to be used for the maintenance of the Diocesan House of the future, in the meantime to be used for the provision of the rent of the offices for Diocesan uses.

The Cathedral Church: On the morning of New Year's Day, at the service of the Holy Communion, the Bishops formally accepted Trinity Church, Newark, as the Cathedral Church of the Diocese, and an address was made by Bishop Stearly.

The Rev. C. W. Popham, of Belleville, has been given leave of absence to serve as an assistant Y. M. C. A. secretary at Camp Dix, taking the place of Rev. A. W. H. Thompson.

The Rev. Edgar L. Cook has leave of absence for six months from his parishes to be on the staff of St. George's Chapel at Camp Dix with the Rev. Karl M. Block.

The acceptance of the rectorship of St. Paul's, Des Moines, Iowa, by the Rev. E. N. Owen, after a very successful rectorship for nine years at Maplewood, is announced.

The Rev. Sidney E. Sweet resigns the rectorship of St. Stephen's Church, Jersey City, to accept that of St. Paul's, Columbus, Ohio. Under his energetic leadership St. Stephen's Parish, with its nine hundred communicants and seven hundred Sunday-school scholars, has been made within nine years.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The new building at Natalie was formally opened for worship by Bishop Darlington on Sunday, December 23. He was assisted by the Rev. F. M. C. Bedell, rector of Trinity Church, Shamokin, and the Rev. Frank R. Allison, minister in charge of Kulpmont, Natalie and Coal Run. A choir of twenty voices went there from Kulpmont in a huge sleigh. The Bishop made the address of the occasion. This building is one of several that have been built for use in the hard coal region. It is of wood and cost six hundred and fifty dollars. This includes no furniture. It has a basement, finished, which will serve a good purpose in the way of a place for social gatherings. This is the only building constructed for the purposes of worship in the place. Natalie, which is a coal town exclusively, is about two miles from Kulpmont. The building is known as St. Nathaniel's, Natalie.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop

The Very Rev. R. K. Massie, D. D., Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., who has been absent for some time owing to ill health, is now much improved and expects to return to his charge soon. Though it will be necessary for him to be careful, and go somewhat slowly for some time, he is assured that in time he will be well and strong.

The Rev. R. E. Abraham, rector of Holy Cross Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has accepted the charge of the parishes at Paris, Cynthiana and Nicholasville. Rev. Mr. Abraham left St. Mary's, Middlesboro, this Diocese, to go to Brooklyn in October, 1912, after faithfully serving that congregation for some seven years. A hearty welcome awaits Mr. Abraham upon his return.

An interesting service was conducted recently by the Rev. B. R. Allabough, General Missionary of the Mid-Western Deaf Mute Mission, in the chapel of the State School for the Deaf at Danville, Ky. This was Mr. Allabough's last service here, the reorganization of work among the deaf along provincial lines having removed the Diocese of Lexington from his jurisdiction. The Rev. H. L. Tracy, of Baton Rouge, La., is expected to succeed him here.

St. Mary's Church, Middlesboro, the Rev. Thomas L. Settle, minister-in-charge, has received through several of its communicants the gift of a $1,200 pipe organ, equipped with electric blower. It was used for the first time on the Sunday before Christmas.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Churches and the Coal Shortage. Churches of this city suffered severely for lack of coal. The Fifth Avenue ones, including St. Thomas, take heat from a central plant, but that plant was hampered for lack of fuel, and was able on several occasions to heat one room only, and that insufficiently. On the first Sunday of the year, in several prominent churches, people sat through the services with wraps on—and the timid worshippers returned home after the processional. St. Bartholomew's had at one time less than two tons on hand. One Baptist church closed altogether. The Fifth Avenue Presbyterian closed its Sunday-school room, gave up its week night meetings, and centered its efforts on keeping its large auditorium warm. The Brick Presbyterian, celebrating its century and a half as a leading place of worship, was able to open its church on Sunday, and again on Thursday, but was compelled to give up all other meetings, including its prayer meeting, and its noon day services.

Church for Spanish Speaking People: Attached to Calvary Church, the Rev. Theodore Sedgewick, rector, is a San Pablo Church Mission, the first Episcopal church in New York for Spanish speaking people. On the Feast of the Epiphany it launched a campaign to secure a building fund. The minister-in-charge, the Rev. V. A. Tuzzio, says there are thousands of Spanish families in the city who are not Roman Catholic. He also feels sure that the influence of a Spanish speaking church upon the Latin American situation will be great. Apart from the thirty thousand Spanish population, there are many students here from Cuba, Mexico and South America, and more are coming as result of the war. Some of them are to be educated here for work at home.

Reception of Archbishop of York: Preparations are making for the reception of the Archbishop of York in New York. Special emphasis is to be placed upon the old and the new Yorks, and in this emphasis the city will itself have some part. The Archbishop is to preach in the Cathedral, and on week days in Trinity Church. There will be a dinner by the Church Club, after the manner of that when the Archbishop of Canterbury came. The Rev. Dr. Manning, of Trinity, is to remain at Camp Upton through a good part of the winter, but has arranged for the adequate welcome to the distinguished English Churchman.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., Bishop.

Celebration of the One Hundredth Anniversary of the Organization of the Church in Ohio.

The one hundredth anniversary of the organization of the Church in Ohio was celebrated by appropriate services in Trinity Church, Columbus, Ohio, on January 5, it being within the parish bounds of the present Trinity Church that the convention was held organizing the Diocese. Services were also held the afternoon of the same day at St. John's Church, Worthington, which is the oldest church in this State. A special car took all delegates from Trinity Church after luncheon to Worthington. Bishop Leonard, of the Northern Diocese, had charge of the morning services at Trinity Church, and Bishop Vincent, of the Southern Diocese, had charge of the service at Worthington. Historical addresses were delivered in the morning by Dr. Smythe, of Gambler, and in the afternoon by Mr. Joseph Doyle, of Stubenville.

Chapel to be Built Near the University. An option has been secured on a lot near the State University in Columbus for the erection of a chapel thereon, the chief purpose of which is to serve the students of the University. The work among the students has lately been placed in charge of the Rev. F. C. F. Randolph, recently transferred to this Diocese from Erie, Pa., who also has charge of Holy Spirit Mission, Columbus, and the mission at Granville.

A joint war commission has just been organized for the two Dioceses in the State of Ohio, for the purpose of financing and carrying on the work of the Church among the soldiers in the various training camps, barracks, and cantonments located in the State. The sum of $25,000 is to be raised by this commission, a large part of which is to pay for the erection of a church and parish house for the soldiers in Camp Sherman, near Chillicothe, Ohio. The Rev. F. L. Flinchbaugh has been in charge of the work at Camp Sherman as voluntary chaplain since the camp was laid out, using the portable chapel of the Diocese for his services up to the present time. He now returns to his duties as rector of Calvary Church, Clifton, and is succeeded by the Rev. T. W. Attridge, curate of Christ Church, Cincinnati. Officers of the Joint War Commission are: Bishop Leonard, President; Bishop Vincent, Chairman, and the Rev. F. L. Flinchbaugh, Executive Secretary.

Personal Notes

Rev. W. B. Sams, vicar of St. John's Church, Bainbridge, Diocese of Georgia, after five years' service, has resigned his work and accepted the vicarage of Christ Church, Cordele, Ga., in the same Diocese, and will enter upon his new duties on February 1st.

The Rev. J. H. McKenzie, D. D., who has been ill, is convalescent, and expects to take up his duties at Howe School at the beginning of the new term in January.

The Rev. Carl I. Shoemaker has accepted the position of assistant to the Rev. Elliot White at St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, with charge of St. Michael's Chapel.

The Rev. C. R. D. Crittenton, formerly rector of St. Mark's Church, Palatka, Florida, is now rector of St. Paul's Church, Key West, Fla.

The Rev. A. R. B. Hegeman, D. D., rector of Trinity Church, Binghamton, N. Y., has resigned to accept the position of Archdeacon of Central New York. For the past few months Dr. Hegeman has been at Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, S. C.

The Rev. Walter Lowrie, rector of St. Paul's Church, Rome, Italy, sailed for America on December 12th. During his absence, the Rev. R. Irving Murray has been appointed minister-in-charge of St. Paul's.

The Rev. William E. Rambo is temporarily in charge of services at the Church of the Epiphany, South Haven, Michigan. His address is Covert, Michigan.

The Rev. R. E. Boykin, rector of St. Mark's Church, Brunswick, Ga., has accepted a call to Grace Church, Canton, Miss., and expects to leave for his new field on February 1.

The Rev. J. F. Burks, rector of Dettingen Parish, Manassas, Va., has accepted the call to the churches at Evington and Alta Vista, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia, and will take charge March 1.

The Rev. Wilson E. Tanner, rector of St. Andrew's Church, New Berlin, N. Y., has accepted the rectorship of Trinity Memorial Church, Binghamton, N. Y., and will begin his work there on Quinquagesima Sunday. He succeeds the Rev. A. R. B. Hegeman, D. D., who will become Archdeacon of Central New York.

The Rev. J. H. Randolph Ray, formerly rector of St. Andrew's Church, Bryan, Texas, is now Dean of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, Texas, having been instituted as rector on Sunday, January 6, by Coadjutor-Bishop Moore, whose successor as Dean Mr. Ray will be.

The Rev. Thomas L. Trott has taken up his work at St. Mary's Church, High Point, N. C., to which he was recently called.

The Rev. Hugh B. M. Jameson, rector of St. Peter's Church, McKinney, has resigned the charge and entered upon his duties as rector of St. Andrew's Church, Bryan, Texas, on Sunday, January 6th.

The Rev. Warren W. Way, rector of St. Luke's Church, Salisbury, N. C., accepted an invitation to preach to the soldiers at Fort Caswell, near Wilmington, N. C., on Sunday, December 30th.

The address of the Rev. E. M. M. Wright, rector of Holy Trinity Church (colored), Nashville, Tenn., is changed, from the Colored Y. M. C. A. to 1732 Heiman Street, Nashville.

Ordinations.

In the Cathedral at Faribault, Minn., on the third Sunday in Advent, the Bishop of Minnesota ordained to the diaconate Charles William Baxter, Samuel Hammon Edsall, Walter Herbert Stowe, Edward Fairbanks Cray, Ian Robertson, and, acting for the ecclesiastical authority of Colorado, De Forest Bardsley Bolles. The Rev. Dr. G. C. Tanner presented Mr. Edsall and the Rev. Dr. F. F. Kramer the other candidates. The Rev. H. M. Ramsey preached the sermon, and the Rev. Dr. J. K. Young read the Litany.

On St. Thomas' Day, December 21, in St. Peter's Church, Hazleton, Pa., the Bishop of Bethlehem advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Herman J. Knies, presented by the rector, the Rev. A. E. Clattenburg, and the Rev. Percy C. Adams, presented by the Rev. S. N. Kent. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Kent, Warden of Leonard Hall, and other Clergy present and taking part in the service were the Rev. Messrs. John Porter Briggs, W. H. Zeigler and J. P. Ware. The Rev. Mr. Knies is in charge of St. John's, Scranton, and the Rev. Mr. Adams is in charge of St. David's, Bangor.

In St. Luke's Cathedral, Orlando, Fla., on St. Thomas' Day, December 21, the Rev. Robert Dickey Tracy was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., who also preached the sermon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. F. E. Alleyne, and the Very Rev. James G. Glass assisted in the service. Mr. Tracy will continue in charge of mission work near Miami, his principal mission being at Buena Vista.

In St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Michigan, on December 26th, the Bishop of Michigan ordained to the diaconate Mr. Henry Midworth and Mr. Edgar L. Tiffany.

Patriotism consists not in waving a flag, but in striving that our country shall be righteous as well as strong.—James Bryce.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The War Commission of the Church is appealing urgently to all the Dioceses to organize effective response to the call for $500,000 to finance the work of the Commission on behalf of the more than 65,000 men of our Church now in the military service of the nation. It is the purpose of the Commission to carry the spiritual ministrations of the Church to all the great centers of army and navy activities both here and abroad.

January 27th, the last Sunday of the month, is the day when all our congregations in the United States are asked to make offerings for the War Commission's work.

The following synopsis of the proceedings of the recent annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches is an encouraging record of the manner in which the Christian forces of America are co-operating for spiritual service in this time of war.

The Executive Committee said:

"This is a time of heart-searching and revaluation of present forces and organizations, a realignment of churches in the interest of economy, efficiency, unity, the glory of God and the greater good of mankind.

"The Christian churches of America, with the nation, face world problems to-day. To meet these problems there must be thrift, co-operation, nationwide and world-wide vision, and greater unity of life and action.

"Groups of denominations, constituting one family, by reason of history, policy and doctrine, might well seriously and promptly consider the present-day providential call to unite, and thus meet the shortage of ministers, overcome administrative duplication, overlapping of territory, and overlooking of the needs of great sections of our land and of nations abroad."

Dr. William Adams Brown reported for the General War-Time Commission of the Churches. He gave a brief account of the plans of the Commission's work and the things which they had already accomplished, matters that were pending, lessons learned and the things hoped for.

Among the things accomplished he referred to the survey of religious conditions in the camps and cantonments, which was being furnished to different agencies at work; to the buildings that were being put up co-operatively in the neighborhoods of some great cantonments by the different denominational boards of Home Missions; to the work that has been done in community organization for the local church; to the activities for increasing the number of chaplains and improving their status, and defining the functions of camp pastors, bringing them into relation one to another and to the other forces that are at work in the community; to the preparation made for the religious care of interned aliens, for the welfare of negro troops and for improving the moral conditions of our soldiers here and abroad. He laid stress on what had been done to bring about personal contact between leaders in the various agencies and to remove misunderstandings between them. He expressed the hope that the result of the Commission's work in the future would give both Church and public a greater vision of what the Church as a whole is doing, and so prepare the way for the better and more efficient Church which must face the task of reconstruction after the war.

Dr. Macfarland in his report said that largely owing to war conditions, various committees of the Council have entered into co-operation with committees of denominations not included in the Council's constituency, notably the Southern Baptist Convention, and the Lutheran bodies. The special committees appointed from time to time during the year included one on the Interest of the Negro Churches and People, the Committee on the Anniversary of the Protestant Reformation, and a Special Committee for Religious Work in the Canal Zone. The American Huguenot Committee had had reasonable success in securing funds for the French and Belgian Home Mission Work, and the work of Rev. Henri Anet, of the Franco-Belgian Evangelization Committee is highly commended.

The most important action ensuing from the special Washington meeting of the Federal Council was the ultimate appointment of the General War-Time Commission. The work of the Washington office was reviewed in its relationship not only to the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, but to the General War-Time Commission and other Commissions.

The war relief movement had been continued in co-operation with the various war relief organizations until the time of the Washington meeting, when it was merged mainly into the American Red Cross Campaign. The co-operative relationships of the Council had been increased during the year, especially in relation to the government departments and organizations doing war work.

The section of the report entitled "International Relationships" was of unusual importance, and a new committee was reported to take up the question of co-operation between all the religious organizations doing evangelical work in France and Belgium. The report contained interesting correspondence with French Protestant bodies, with religious leaders in Holland, relative to closer co-operation with the evangelical forces in that country, and various messages of a fraternal nature from Great Britain, France, China and other parts of the world. Correspondence from Australia reported the organization of a Federal Council in that country.

Rev. Charles Stelzle, Field Secretary of the Federal Council, reported on the various publicity campaigns which he has conducted in behalf of temperance movements related to the Federal Council—the "Strengthen America" campaign, which will make use of the daily newspapers of the country for an entire year, the campaign conducted in the Washington newspapers while the Senate was discussing war prohibition, and the campaign of paid advertising in the labor papers of the United States. He also referred to the labor temperance mass meeting of working men and open forums conducted by him during the past year in various parts of the country. Studies had been made of cities of 100,000 population, or over, which have been dry for a year or more, for the purpose of finding out how prohibition had worked out. The plans for the Campaign for the Conservation of Human Life, to be carried on during the next three or four years, were also outlined by Mr. Stelzle.

Upon the recommendation of the Commission on Temperance, the following resolution was adopted by the Executive Committee: "The Council reaffirms its conviction that total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State and nation is the path of wisdom and safety and commends the efforts of those individuals and temperance organizations as well as the attitude of those labor unions, manufacturers and business men, that encourage total abstinence and favor prohibition. The Council holds that the people of the United States should be given the opportunity to pass upon the question of national prohibition in accordance with the methods provided in the Federal Constitution.

"We recommend that the Temperance Commission be authorized to consider the immediate necessity of co-operation in temperance work in countries abroad and of advancing the temperance cause in missionary lands and that the Commission be authorized to confer with the Administrative Committee on this subject.

"We recommend that the Council reaffirm its position urging the imperative necessity of the prohibition of the liquor traffic for the period of the war, as expressed on pages fifteen and sixteen of the minutes of the special Washington meeting of May 7, 8, 9, 1917."

It was also voted that the substance of this resolution be telegraphed to Congress.

The Business Committee of the Executive Committee especially emphasized and commended the closing words of the report of the General Secretary: "Let us not forget that in this hour the Church of Jesus Christ has a task all its own. Most of the things we have been doing are but the preparation for our task, which is yet before us—to bring the nation to the sense of the infinite and the eternal; to bring the Church herself to the profound consciousness of her impotence to heal the nation with the virtue that goes out from her, as she stands in the plain, with her Master, unless with him she has continued in the mountain during the night, and entered into the consciousness of his unceasing prayer. Let us not forget the nation's soul."

A resolution regarding the organization of the churches for the promotion and study of Christian friendship was adopted, as follows: "Resolved, That the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America earnestly urges—

First. That each constituent body of the Federal Council which has not already done so shall form, as soon as possible, a denominational commission for effective co-operation with the World Alliance for promoting international friendship through the churches.

Second. That each denominational Commission which has already been established for co-operation with the American branch of the World Alliance

First Sunday after the Epiphany:

One of the greatest results of the modern study of the Bible and one not at all connected with any rationalism is the recovery of the prophets, or perhaps discovery. We have come to see that the prophet was the inspired conscience of his time, and this without at all ceasing to point his finger to the future; but rather the more. The rose bud growing on its bush does not the less tell of the full-blown rose to be because of having a life of its own related to its existing environment. Moreover, the prophets thus understood not only blazed the way for the Christ, but bring us to-day a social message addressed to nations; supplementing the New Testament, which speaks to individuals and to the Church. The New Lectionary, therefore, has undertaken to weave the prophetic teachings into the Old Testament narrative, so that the two mutually explain and illumine each other. Our first lesson this morning is Amos' appeal for justice and righteousness against ritualism; and a prediction of the Assyrian captivity. For a New Testament correlative we have selected from Hebrews a passage which shows that the priestly conception of religion (attacked by Amos), when interpreted through our Lord Jesus Christ, who actualized the true idea of sacrifice, comes out at the same point: "forget not to do good and to share with others; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased."

The general relevancy of Amos to the Epiphany session has already been pointed out. This particular chapter (and the same is true of the second lesson) follows the line of Collect, Epistle and Gospel for the day. St. Paul appeals for the true idea of sacrifice shown in a renewed mind and consecrated body; the Boy Christ gives a concrete illustration of this ("Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"); and the Collect prays for the actualization of the same in our own experience (Cf. Gen. 22 and Heb. 10, same Sunday, Table I).

The New Testament Sunday evening lesson gives the evening congregation an opportunity to hear the connected story of the visit of the Magi, the Martyrdom of the Innocents, and the Flight into Egypt and Return, summing up Christmas and Epiphany teachings. The First Lesson is one of Balaam's beautiful prophecies of the future victory of God's Church in its triumph over opposing forces, a prophecy coming just after Balaam's experiencing the futility of offering to God rams and bullocks instead of a surrendered will (Cf. Mich. 6:1-8; in Saturday morning's lesson).

For week days we give in the morning further selections of both Amos and Hosea, prophetic of the coming captivity, paralleled by a course reading of St. John's Gospel begun, the Gospel which is peculiarly appropriate throughout to the season of manifestation. In the evening the Old Testament selections bear on Amos' theme of the misuse of religious aids; while the Epistle to Galatians deals with the theme of Sonship to God, suggested by the story of the Boy Christ in the Temple.

Neglect of God's House.

Neglect of God's house marks decline in religious life and is one of the characteristics of the backslider. Those who are wilfully guilty of it will be found to be in spiritual deadness or decline. If we wish the religious life of ourselves and our households to be strong and expanding, we will be careful to maintain our places in God's house. Where God records His name, God will be present, and so will be His people.

The best and worthiest and most substantial life of our own people and nation is found in those who delight in God's house and worship and who are found regularly in the services of the sanctuary. It is a matter of the gravest concern when an individual neglects God's house or when there is a tendency toward a general neglect of this holy and important privilege and duty.

It is not a question as to whether a certain minister is liked or not. It is not a question as to whether the church is beautiful and its music artistic and its services delightful. These are matters of secondary importance. The prime essential is that the soul shall meet God in the way of His appointment and worship Him, in company with other Christians, in the sanctuary. Where God is thus worshipped, every good element in life flourishes, and all that is desirable for human welfare finds advancement. Where God is neglected and His sanctuary is despised, there is threatened dark disaster, and swift judgment is on its way to execute the Divine displeasure. It cannot be well with those who part company with God.—Herald and Presbyter.

One cannot read the Old Testament without being conscious of a new and deep impression of the familiarity with which the patriarchs and prophets approached Jehovah. To them He was a partner in all their affairs; a Father Whom they never hesitated to take into their confidence about little things; the God Whom they importuned with reiterated and vehement earnestness about the things which pressed upon their hearts. To Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, David, etc., God was not an abstraction, but a reality. He was a real Collect For First Sunday After Epiphany.

O Lord, we beseech Thee mercifully to receive the prayers of Thy people who call upon Thee; and grant that they may both perceive and know what things they ought to do, and also may have grace and power faithfully to fulfil the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

person, Who took an abiding interest in all their plans and doings, to Whom they at once turned when most sorrowful for sin, confident that He would pardon them; with Whom they pleaded for their friends, that they also might be forgiven; in a word, one Who had to do with their entire daily life.

We live to-day at a great disadvantage, because we keep God at a distance. He is indeed practically not much in the thoughts of many men and women. They arrange the details of their homes, their business and their life without reference to the Divine Being, in Whose hands are the issues of life, and Who, at any time, can lay an arresting hand on these activities and summon us to another world.

The Sunrise Never Failed Us Yet.

Upon the sadness of the sea
The sunset broods regretfully:
From the far, lonely spaces, slow
Withdraws the wistful afterglow.

So out of life the splendor dies;
So darken all the happy skies;
So gathers twilight, cold and stern,
But overhead the planets burn;

And up the east another day
Shall chase the bitter dark away;
What though our eyes with tears be wet?

The sunrise never failed us yet.

The blush of dawn may yet restore
Our light and hope and joy once more.
Sad soul, take comfort, nor forget
That sunrise never failed us yet.

—Celia Thaxter.

What Is a Church For?

Many of our modern churches resemble the Mother Church (in Jerusalem) in that we are loath to heed the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel." It is easy to make ourselves believe that church attendance is an end in itself. It is pleasant to think of church services as expressly given to contribute to our comfort and entertainment. Beautiful singing, eloquent preaching, impressive rituals, and spacious edifices have their uses; but when these are conceived as a goal in themselves, church attendance may become the quintessence of selfishness. Christians are called together in the church service in order that they make disciples of the community, the State, the nation, world.—Edgar De Witt Jones.

Lines.

"If all my years were summer, could I know What my Lord means by His 'made white as snow?'"

If all my days were sunny, could I say
"In His fair land He wipes all tears away?"

If I were never weary, could I keep Close to my heart, "He gives His loved ones sleep?"

Were no graves mine, might I not come to deem
The life eternal but a baseless dream?

My winter, yea, my tears, my weariness,
Even my graves may be His way to bless.
I call them ill, yet that can surely be Nothing but good that shows my Lord to me."

D' Angiolo Bambino.

W. H. Morse, M. D.

"Shut your mouths and hold your tongues, or I'll break every bone in your bodies!"

Andrew Duro came in from the factory to find his two children and some of the neighbors' children at play boisterously in the kitchen. Mrs. Duro, at the stove preparing the supper, was laughing at the little ones' antics. This nettled the husband and father, and the next instant a blow from his hand sent his boy across the room, crying. The neighbors' children hurried out of the door, frightened at the angry man's behavior.

"Fine way for a tired man to come home and find bedlam loose!" he said. Then, to the boy: "Here! You stop that howling, and go up to your room! And now! Isn't supper ready yet?"

The boy left the room. The woman, knowing by experience better than to reply when her husband was angry, hurried to put the food on the table. When she and the little girl had sat down with him at the meal, his temper was still aflame.

"What, no meat!" he exclaimed. "Where is that meat?"

"Mr. Clark would not let Joe have any," the woman said. "He says we must pay what we owe him first."

"What! Don't believe it! I'll see!" Duro returned.

Leaving the table, he called up the stairs to the boy:

"Here, Joe! You go to Clark's market and get two pounds of steak!"

The boy came down, hesitated, and looked at his mother. The father started to strike him, and evading the blow, he went out. The woman and girl continued their meal, while Duro walked back and forth waiting for his son's return. Several minutes passed, and Joe did not come. Then Duro seized his hat and rushed out into the rainy night.

"Where is my meat?" he asked, as he entered the market.

The marketman looked up from his desk.

"Andrew," he said quietly, "your bill is too high now. Let me have something on it, and you can have the meat."

Duro brought his fist down on the desk threateningly, but before he could speak the marketman was on his feet.

"See here, Andrew! None of that!"

he said. "Don't come in here that way. Your anger can't go down here as it does at your house. Be careful. You treated your family like a brute when you came home just now, so the Hall children tell me. Be decent."

Duro, confronted by the stalwart butcher, turned on his heel.

"This ends your getting my custom!" he said. "I'll go elsewhere!"

He did so. He left the market and went to the saloon.

It was two hours later. Mrs. Duro, sitting sewing at the table, looked at the clock frequently, while the little girl studied her lesson. The husband and boy had not returned, and a dread was in her heart that the man had found Joe at the market and had punished him again, perhaps beating him insensible. How she did wish that Andrew would control his temper! They were Italians, and might have been as respected as any family had it not been for it. As it was, people looked on her and the two children in pity, and on Duro with fear.

Eleven o'clock. There was a noise at the outer door.

"Here they come!" the woman said.

The child, dreading her father's anger, slipped away to bed. The woman waited. No one came. She went to the door. There was a basket there, and—she took it in. A tiny cry. She took it to the light, and there, warmly wrapped, a baby lay. She called the little girl, Agnes. They examined the infant's clothing, and to the blanket they found a small card pinned. On it they read these words, in their own language:

"The Angel Baby, a Protestant, Episcopalian, Italian."

They were still busy over the basket when Duro returned. He had drank just enough to make him silly, and when he saw the foundling he declared that the angels had sent it, and that it was "good luck" for them to keep it. Agnes joined her father in the same wish, but Mrs. Duro demurred. She was too wise, however, to argue, and after giving the baby some milk, took it up to their room, Duro carrying a lamp. They had to pass through the boy's room, and there he lay in his bed asleep, having climbed in from the shed roof when he was sent out for the meat.

Andrew Duro went to work the next morning whistling. His Sicilian superstition had pronounced the foundling "lucky."

"Yes," he declared, when he came home to dinner, "we are going to keep the baby. It is ours."

The neighbors shook their heads, and said that the Duros had all they could do to support their family, and that Andrew, in his angry fits, would be sure to maltreat the foundling.

"Foundling!" Duro repeated. "No foundling! D'Angiolo Bambino! The angel child! The angels brought her. It is ours."

From that night the man behaved. The baby, whom they called Angela, was idolized by him, and loved by his wife and children. He abandoned the saloon, paid his grocery and meat bills, and kept declaring that the angels brought the infant. The selectmen, in their wisdom, merely said that if the man was known to give way to his anger, the child would be taken to the almshouse.

When Easter came the entire Duro family went with the baby to the nearest Episcopal church, in a neighboring town, and had it baptized. It was not long after this that Duro found employment in that town and removed there. From that time they were identified with the Episcopal church, respectable, hard-working people. It was the year 1908.

On the first Sunday in Advent, 1917, the bishop made a special visit to the church for confirmation. There were two candidates brought forward by the rector—Joseph Duro, who was to sail for Naples as a volunteer in the Italian army, and Angela Duro, a black-eyed little girl of nine.

"Joe felt that he could not go without being confirmed," the rector said, "and asked to have his little sister confirmed with him. I vouch for Joe. He will do Christian work in the army. As for the little girl—he regards her as his inspiration."

Red Cross Membership.

Bishop William Lawrence.

A word to men. A New York man is just dropping his business, which has brought him in $20,000 a year, to go to Europe for the Red Cross; no salary. "He does not talk about it; why do you mention it?" you ask. "Lots of men are doing the same thing. Some men are giving up bigger incomes, and thousands of mechanics and laboring men are dropping their wages and enlisting in the army and navy."

I mention it in order that every man in the country may feel that he is on call when his country wants him. Soldiers and sailors are ready to give their lives. All honor to them. The time, money and life of every citizen belongs to his nation. All honor, therefore, to those citizens who consecrate their time, and life in all sorts of war interests at home and abroad. Through the Red Cross opportunities of service are given to thousands of men who without the Red Cross would not know where to put their time and energies in the country's service.

A word to women. What an anxious, restless and unhappy mass the women of this country would be if they did not have some definite work to do for the boys and men in the camps and trenches and hospitals! In every village, town and city groups of women are gathered together making bandages for the soldiers. Out upon the farms and plains lonely women are knitting sweaters and muffers. As their fingers work, their minds move also, with the thought of what they are doing for those who are fighting to defend their homes. No one can calculate the steadiness and sincerity which the Red Cross work gives to millions of women.

A word to the boys and girls. Whether you are at school or at work, you can do something for the soldier and sailor and the Red Cross. You can save your pennies and nickels up to one dollar, and become a member of the Red Cross. Lots of you can make it five dollars. You can go after the men and women of the town and get them to join the Red Cross.

In passing twenty people in the street to-day, you pass one Red Cross member. When you have lifted the membership from five million to fifteen million, you will meet one Red Cross member in every seven people that you pass. Why not make it five? One out of every five people in the country, men, women and children, Red Cross members. Twenty millions of members will do it. Why not try?

Peace and Trust.

Eugenie Du Maurier.

Oh, for the peace of a perfect trust, my loving God, in Thee;
Unwavering faith, that never doubts
Thou chooseth best for me!
Best, though my plans be all upset; best,
though the way be rough;
Best, though my earthly store be scant:
in Thee I have enough.
Best, though my health and strength be gone, though weary days be mine,
Shut out from much that others have:
not my will, Lord, but Thine!
And even though disappointments come,
they, too, are best for me;
To wean me from this changing world,
and lead me nearer Thee.
Oh, for the peace of a perfect trust that looks away from all;
That sees Thy hand in everything, in great events or small!
That hears Thy voice—a Father's voice—directing for the best,
Oh, for the peace of a perfect trust, a heart with Thee at rest!

Thrifless and Shiftless.

It is so easy for most of us to be poor. We have never thought we could be rich and were not content in believing we could get a few dollars ahead. We have never learned the lesson of thrift. Recently we heard this story which carries its moral in an age when a man must save, grind, or starve:

"When an old uncle of mine died and left me a little bequest of $545, my first impulse was to 'even it off'; and if it hadn't been for an old friend of my father's I think I would have succeeded in neatly paring it down into zero.

"What are you thinking of doing with that money?" he asked casually one day.

"Well," I replied, "I think I'll just take that $45 and go for a little lake trip, and then I'll have $500 to put in the bank."

"Why $500?" he said. "Why not $545?"

"Oh," I replied, "you might as well have an even amount."

"Do you suppose you could spare me $5?" he asked, suddenly.

"Why, yes," I replied a little surprised that he should ask to borrow money of me; but I handed it to him.

"All right, then," he said; "here's $5"—handing me back that same bill. "If you'll just put this with that $545 you'll have $550, and that's a nice even amount. Now, if you'll put that in the bank, in three months it will have earned $5.50 more; and surely in the meantime you can scrape together $44.50, and then you'll have an even $600 instead of $500."

"Well, what could I do with $600?" I asked, not very much impressed, as the difference didn't seem worth the trouble.

"One thing you could do," replied the old gentleman, "would be to ask your banker to buy a $1,000 bond for you, or rather, to lend you the extra $400, keeping the bond as security, and then it wouldn't be long before you would have $1,000, which for 'even amount' is a little better than $500."

"Then with pencil and paper he showed me carefully just how long it would take.

"Of course, you don't have to do it if you don't want to; but I have noticed," he went on thoughtfully, "that this business of having a little by you is pretty much a matter of the way your mind works. Some people always want to even things off in money matters, others want to even up. And once you get started at it, thinking up isn't much harder than thinking down. For instance, if I showed you thirteen cents, you might say, 'I can spend three cents for popcorn, and then I'll have a dime'; or you could say, 'If I put two cents with that I'll have fifteen cents.'"

"It's the downhill people, the people who follow the path of least resistance, the people who slice off a little, who never get anywhere in life."—Selected.

Evelyn Chambers' Day.

Evelyn Chambers turned her head sleepily—blinked, then, with great suddenness, opened her eyes full wide, almost at the same instant throwing back the clothes and landing upright on the floor.

With an ecstatic little squeal she pounced upon a shimmering blue kimono draped over the footboard. "Oh! oh! oh!" she exulted, holding it against the fresh rosinness of her cheeks. Next moment, on the floor, she was pulling on new pumps over a pair of delicate silk stockings. "Exact!" she approved, satisfiedly, and crossing to a window picked up a parcel from the table and shook out a length of sheer white. "Everything's just as I wanted," she nodded happily. "Wonder if I got that purse I've been hinting about?"

Wrinkling her pretty brow she gazed searchingly about the room. "Uh-ha," she laughed, and sprang toward the mantel where it lay; half concealed, behind a tall vase. Opening it, she took out a five-dollar gold piece.

As she crossed to the dresser her eyes were very bright. "I don't know how mother ever coaxed that five dollars out of father," she said, "together with the muslin. But I suppose he knew if he gave me the muslin, I'd just have to get it made. Mother got the pumps and kimono and stockings with her egg money, I know."

Dexteriously she coiled her hair about her shapely head. "I love birthdays," she confided to the girl facing her from the glass. "Let's see—what'll I do this one?" for from the time she was a wee tot, the birthdays had been in a very special way hers—days in which she might do whatever she pleased, within the bounds of reason.

She had fallen into the habit of making no birthday plans beforehand. Along up to eleven or twelve years she had gloried in planning parties—out of town trips—picnics; but from that time on she had left planning to the whim and mood of the day.

Her hair finished, she stood looking out across the clean, clear morning with the glorious wonder of spring all about, thinking—wondering—planning. "I believe," she decided at length, "I'll have a party. Mother always has something extra cooked up, and there's plenty of time to do a little more. I haven't had a party, now, for ages; not since I was a little tot." The light in her eyes deepened slowly; the pink in her cheeks changed to red. "And I won't do a single grown-up thing," she declared. "We'll just be kiddies again."

With girlish abandon she stretched her arms high above her head. "I don't feel a bit like seventeen!" she laughed joyously. "I feel just like seven, instead."

Swiftly she finished dressing and flew, as if on air, down the stairs through the hall, and into the sun-filled dining room where her mother was just pouring her father's coffee.

Pausing behind her chair she kissed her, half carelessly; then turning to her father she greeted him in the same manner. "You dears!" she laughed. "I'd like to say, 'thank you' a million times over. What's the best way to begin?"

The tired face of her mother brightened a moment. "Were they all right, dearie?" she inquired anxiously.

"To a dot." Evelyn sipped her coffee daintily. "But you didn't answer my question."

"That's for you to decide," said her father a little dryly.

"By having the best birthday of all," smiled her mother, pushing aside her untasted toast.

Evelyn dimpled. "I'm going to have a party," she confided jubilantly, "and invite all the girls and boys in the class. There's twenty-four, if they all come, and I guess they all will. I'm going to 'phone them to come early, and that we'll just be kiddies and eat cookies and candy and ice cream; and dance on the lawn and play drop handkerchief, if we want to; or dolls!"—she giggled, "or any other old thing. And maybe," a stray breeze from the open window caught a few loose strands of gold and waved them about her cheeks, "we'll even make mud pies. How I did love mud pies! and we'll have tea out under that first row of maples." She drew a long breath.

"It's quite an undertaking," commented her father, rising a little stiffly, "to cook for twenty-four. Did you think of that, my girl?"

"Evelyn will help, I know," countered Mrs. Chambers quickly. "I'll get right at the baking in ten minutes."

"And then, at the same time," said Mr. Chambers, "it costs quite a penny to provide candy and ice-cream for twenty-four."

A queer, tense little silence settled for a moment about the room.

"I've three dollars more egg money," announced Mrs. Chambers. "That will go quite a way."

"I thought you were saying that for a hat," said the man, and went out abruptly, closing the door with considerably more force than was necessary.

Evelyn chuckled. "I guess you had hard work to get that dress, and that five dollars out of dad," she said. Then, with the quick changefulness of youth, "Didn't you used to have birthdays, mamsie, too?"

Raising a thin hand Mrs. Chambers tucked a gray lock behind her ear. "You forget, dearie," she replied gently, "that I lived in an asylum until I was fourteen, when I went to work for my board. Not but that they were good to me, and all that, but there wasn't any such things as birthdays or—home. I said then that if I ever had a girl she should be a girl."

Evelyn gasped. For the first time she sensed—though dimly—the difference between her mother's youth and her own. "And you never—never had a party, or a present, or—or—any kind of a jollification?" she cried aghast.

"There, there, child." Her mother was moving briskly about. "It's all gone now, an' I dare say it's just as well. We must get to work. Better get at your telephoning, and find out how many can come so I can plan the baking."

"My best white's a little soiled," frowned the girl.

Unconsciously her mother drew a tired breath. "Then, I'd best wring it out, first thing," she decided, "so it can be drying. And when you go for it look in my closet and see what's the best thing for me to wear, and if it needs washing or pressing."

Evelyn skipped gayly from the room, but her face was grave and there were little lines between her eyes. "I suppose," she thought soberly, "it is a lot of work, and mother looks awful old, somehow, to-day." Opening the closet door she glanced ruefully at the two worn skirts hanging lonesomely there. "They're both horrid," she muttered. "Mother ought to have something new."

Another moment and the threadbare skirt dropped to the floor and with wide, bright eyes she stood staring into the spring day; but all she could see was the rows upon rows of dainty blue and pinks and whites that hung in her own closet.

A queer little lump got into her throat. "Praps, though," she evaded, "she doesn't care about 'em now. Praps folks don't after they get over being young." Then—next breath—"And to think—just to think she never had a birthday present!"

"Evelyn!" It was her mother's voice. "Hurry, child!"

"Coming." Leaving the skirt where it lay in a little heap, Evelyn crossed to the window for a moment dropped to her knees—Evelyn was just learning how to pray. Then—her eyes clear—she ran down the stairs.

"Changed my mind, mamsie," she cried brightly. "Guess I don't want a party, after all."

In wondering amaze she watched the quick relief fill her mother's eyes, and then, in womanly understanding, passed it by. But her head lifted with an added grace; and a new and deeper beauty crept into her eyes. "Mother," she said, "it's my day and I'm going to—give it to you. You're not going to do a stroke of work to-day. And every one of those presents are yours. You need a kimono, because after this I'm going to be house-girl every Sunday. That's your birthday present for last year. And you need a white dress and a new purse, and a—a gold piece. And we'll change the pumps. No—no"—as she caught the quick denial in her mother's eyes. "You always let me have my way on birthdays, and you'll!"

She caught her breath with a quick, incredulous gasp. "Why, mother," she choked, "you look—ten years—yonger! What—what?" Then, with a sudden glow, "By next week you won't be more'n six." Next minute she was at the telephone: "Oh, Aunt Janie," she cried, "can't you come over in your runabout and carry mother off for the day? . . . What? . . . Yes." A little singing note crept into her voice. "It is my day—the very, very dearest day of them all."—Lucy D. Stearns, in The Congregationalist.

"Go it while you are young," and you will not "go it" when you are old. The chances are that you will not "get there," and if you do, that you will not be able to go. A man must "bear the yoke in his youth" if he would have a free neck when he is old.—Ex.

For the Young Folks

A Rainy-Day Game.

A little soap and water
And a little pipe of clay
Will make the time go faster
On a rainy day.

Bubbles in the bowl of water,
Bubbles in the air,
Bubbles on the mantelpiece,
Floating everywhere.

Molly had a clay pipe,
Dickey had another;
Nothing could be better for
A sister and a brother.

Marigold.

You would think this was a flower, wouldn't you? It was, and it wasn't. Marigold was as pretty as a flower, any time, but he was just a noisy, chattering, foolish pet of a very lonely little girl who lived away out in a thinly settled neighborhood, and had no playmates. All her brothers and sisters were grown-ups, some married, and all gone from the old home.

Lorena was a very quiet, thoughtful child, shy, and with little to say to any one except her pets; but she was very fond of animals and fowls and played with them all day long. She understood the wants and needs of her pets and was tender with them. They were equally fond of her.

Lorena had two dear little white kittens, a dog, and a young rabbit. One bright day Bunny got out of her pen and the dog caught and killed it. Her grief was intense, though quiet. And it was a long time before she felt she could trust Prince again.

A married sister was visiting her mother the day of the rabbit's tragic death. "Never mind, Honey," consolingly, "your brother is going to town to-morrow, and I'll send by him an egg to put with yours for the little white bantam to sit on. If it hatches you'll have a pet even Prince will not bother." And that was all big sister would say. Lorena wondered and wondered, but though mamma shrewdly guessed, she knew the pleasure would be all the greater for a little mystery.

So the next morning Lorena's brother came with the largest, whitest, smoothest egg she had ever seen. Every day, and several times during the day, she would go to see if the hen had hatched out the wonderful egg. At last the time was up. The white bantam, all fluffed up with pride and achievement, led her changeling offspring out of the henhouse—and a strange looking baby it was for the little white mother to carry! Just a soft, downy, golden gosling! Lorena was almost as delighted with it as was the fussy little hen, and in a short time it took to following its mistress about, and finally deserted the poor foster-mother. From the color of its garments she called the gosling Marigold, and kept to it even when he was a fine gander. He followed her all over the place, chattering wildly every time she looked at him.

The farmhouse was old and in need of repair. The back porch had sheered off from the main part, leaving a two-inch crack by the door of one room. Lorena went over the house to hunt her pet, who was lost. She could hear his voice with a note of distress; it sounded almost at her feet, and almost was, for Marigold, in search of his mistress, had missed his footing and fallen through the two-inch crack of the veranda. He was lying on the sill on the flat of his back, feet in air wildly paddling—and squeaking pitifully. He was badly frightened and nearly exhausted. It took the combined efforts of Lorena and her mother to get him out. And then how he did talk; jabber, jabber, jabber—legs wide apart, neck stretched out, tail fluttering, he poured out a stream of gratitude and self-gratulation for long after the rescue. He was not injured, but was rather silent the remainder of the afternoon.

The next morning Lorena, the gosling following, stepped through the room on to the porch and turned to see that her pet got safely across. When he came to the crack, he stopped, looked at it, started as if to turn away, looked again—turning his head from side to side, and wagging his absurd tail—then backing and fluttering his wings, jumped across the chasm, landing beyond danger. Flirting his wings and tail and poking his head in advance of his body, he made a rush for his mistress, and told her how scared he was, and how smart, to thus get over safely! She was of his opinion, and hugged him ecstatically. Thereafter, when he wished to go on the porch, he either jumped the crack or would back away and patter off to another room that entered on the porch, without a crack, and go out that way.—The Child's Hour.

A Four-Footed Rescuer.

Nan stood still in the snow and laughed at the funny picture made by her brother Keith, and Maggie, the old horse, for both boy and horse were on snow-shoes.

"I thought I could make her some. I've seen pictures of horses out West with snow-shoes on. She can pick her way around pretty lively already," explained Keith.

"Of course she can! Maggie can do 'most anything when she gives her mind to it. Doesn't she look wise over it! Keith, if you're going up to the camp with supplies this morning, I'm going, too."

"That's just what I want you to do, Nan. Have you noticed there hasn't been any smoke from the cabin this morning?"

He pointed to the little cabin in plain sight on a shelf of the mountain high above them. His father had been up there four days now, cutting timber.

Nan looked startled as her eyes followed Keith's. "No, I didn't notice," she said, "and I hope mother didn't. I'll have the baskets ready by the time you've hitched Maggie into the sled."

The look of the cabin increased their uneasiness as they drew near. When they stepped inside and saw that it was empty Nan turned a pale face to her brother.

"The bunk hasn't been slept in and the fire has been out for hours! O, Keith, if he has been up in the timber all night, hurt by a tree or something!"

The timber was some distance farther up and hard to reach. It would take them some time to get to it.

"Come on!" Neither turned from the door and seized the horse's head. "We must take Maggie. We couldn't carry him ourselves if—"

He left the sentence unfinished as he tried to turn the horse around. To his surprise, Maggie jerked away from him and planted her snow-shoes defiantly in the drift.

"O, dear, if she's going to have one of her contrary fits we can't do a thing with her! Do come, Keith, and leave the old thing alone," called Nan, who was already on her way to the timber.

"We've got to have her, I tell you. Come on, Mag, what's the matter with you?"

At this moment Nan, who had stopped to listen, came running back.

"O, Keith, she hears something!"

Maggie had broken away altogether by this time. She made a quick bolt for the cabin, started to go in and found herself wedged fast in the doorway. Then she threw up her head and gave a loud whinny, which was answered by a faint voice somewhere near at hand.

"Come on, Nan!" shouted the boy, as he dived under Maggie's nose into the cabin. "Father's here somewhere."

The place was only a shack, but a glance showed beyond doubt that no one could be there, and for a moment the searchers stood completely puzzled. Then Maggie whinnied again, and a voice, the voice of their own father, answered feebly, "Hello!"

With sudden thought Keith seized an ax and in a minute had torn off one of the rough boards that formed the back wall of the cabin. There, under a ton or two of snow that had slid down against the cabin from a sharp slope behind it, lay his father, stiff and nearly insensible, but otherwise unharmed. The projection of the cabin roof, which ran down almost to the ground at the back, and saved him from being crushed by the snowslide and the crevices in the board wall, had admitted air enough to keep him alive.

"I should have been done for, though, in a little while," he said later, as he sat by the fire with a bowl of hot sup Nan had just made. "It happened last night and I held out pretty well till this morning. I must have gone off in a stupor, so that I didn't hear your voices at first, but I roused up enough to call after you, and of course Maggie heard me. Her old ears are quicker than yours or mine, and she always knows my voice. It was her whinny that finished bringing me to my senses."

"We shouldn't have noticed a sound if Maggie hadn't heard you," declared Keith. "We should have gone up there and left you under that snow."

Nan was searching for the biggest apple in the basket for the old horse at the door.

"Next time we're in trouble," said the girl, rather shakily, "we'll ask Maggie's advice the first thing. Won't we, old girl?"

But Maggie didn't seem interested. She just munched her apple contentedly there in the doorway.—Mabel S. Merrill, in the Continent.

The Naughty Sun.

Dorothy H. Gilles.

Last night I stayed up very late,
I saw the sun to bed.
He drew a blanket made of clouds
About his sleepy head.

And, peeping o'er the eastern hill,
In dress of silver white,
His dainty, little mother, Moon,
Was wishing him "Good-night."

But though I watched, and watched, and watched,
When nurse went downstairs,
I never saw that naughty sun
Kneel down and say his prayers.

The Despised Seed Onions.

"I've done set out all the large ones, father," said Harry. "I'm going to throw all those little old things away—I've got the bed full."

The little old things Harry was speaking about were small onion sets. Harry lived in the country and had been helping his father in the garden by putting out the onion bed.

Mr. Byrd stood looking down at the small sets for a moment before replying.

"Looks like it's a shame to throw all those away just because they are little," he said at last. "If they were put out carefully and tended like the larger ones they would make big, fine onions. Of course, they're troublesome to put out, but it seems to me they ought to have a chance to show what they could do in the way of growing. It just doesn't look right to throw them away because they are little."

Harry looked at his father, then looked down at the tiny onion sets.

"I guess I could rake up another bed for those, father," he said slowly. "I didn't think about them wanting a chance to grow or anything like that."

"Suppose you do that," returned Mr. Byrd, "and whatever you raise you may have for your own, to sell or do what you please with."

Harry, looking at the slender little sets, had grave doubts about their growing into anything big enough to sell, but he made up his mind to give them a chance, so he set about to make the best bed for them that could be made by a small boy, and when it was finished he carefully put out the little onion sets—not one was thrown away. He was a very tired little boy when the last one had been planted, but his father came by and said it was a very fine looking bed, indeed, and so Harry almost forgot how his knees and back hurt. He felt very proud of the work he had done, even if the little sets refused to come up and grow for him.

Six days later Harry went down to the garden one morning to see if there was any sign of growing things in his onion bed; there had been a warm, gentle spring rain during the night, and Harry gave a little cry as he looked. His onion bed was covered with tiny green shoots—not one little set had failed to come up. He ran back to tell his father the wonderful news.

"And will they keep growing, father?" he asked.

"If they are worked, they will," said Mr. Byrd heartily.

"Then you can just bet they'll grow," answered Harry.

And they did grow, for never was an onion bed better tended.

There came a day at last when

Harry's father said the onions were ready to be taken up. And when they were all up and measured, there were five bushels.

Harry's face fairly beamed with pride.

"Just think, father," he said, "I was going to throw them away 'cause they were so little."

"Little opportunities, like little onions, often grow into big ones," returned Harry's father. "Always remember the lesson of the little onions, my son, and do not forget, among other things; that kind acts, however small they seem, may be seeds that will grow into something big and fine, so plant as many little seeds of kindness as you can."—Ex.

The Presentation of Christ in the Temple.

The Blessed Virgin Mary was a Jewish maiden; so of course our Lord was taught to follow the Jewish customs. St. Mary and St. Joseph took Him to the Temple for the Presentation, which was the way Jewish male children were offered to God.

It was also the rule to bring a sacrifice along with the child; so Mary, being poor in this world's goods, brought two young pigeons as a sacrifice.

There was in Jerusalem an old man, whom God had told that he should not die until he had seen the Saviour of the world. He was a good man, and his name was Simeon.

So, when our Lord was brought to the Temple, God the Holy Ghost led the old man to the Temple also. When Simeon saw Jesus he took Him up in his arms and blessed God, and said he was now ready to die; for his eyes had seen the Saviour, whom God had sent into the world to give light unto all people.

Then Simeon spoke to Mary, and told her some of the wonderful things he knew our Lord was going to do; how He would save His people, and how she would suffer greatly because her Son suffered.

Then an old woman, a prophetess named Anna, who stayed in the Temple fasting and praying, came in where Jesus lay in the arms of old Simeon. And she also gave thanks to God, seeing that our Lord was that Saviour whom God the Father had promised to the world.

Now, after all these wonderful things had taken place, Mary and Joseph took the Holy Child and went to their own city of Nazareth. So you see, no matter how great and how kingly Jesus Christ was, He was not too proud to go back to the little town where His mother and her husband belonged, and grow up as a good and obedient boy should. We are told that He minded His mother and Joseph, and grew to be a strong, beautiful Boy; and that His mother's heart was made glad because He was so sweet and loving and thoughtful.

Perhaps the lesson for us, in this great story of the Presentation of our Lord, is that we must each one offer himself to God when we are little. God needs even little children, and loves them tenderly and deeply.

We read in the Bible about how dearly our Lord Himself loved little children; and we believe that in Heaven the spirits of children who have passed beyond do follow Him and love and serve Him always.

None of us is too little to say to God, "I want to be Thine, and I want to do what Thou wouldst have me do."

Dear God, teach me the work that is mine to do for Thee in this great world!"—Shepherd's Arms.

Great-Grandma's Sunday Shoes.

"What a funny little block of wood! The top of it's all prickly with little points."

Eric turned it over and over in his hand, curiously.

"And see what a funny little sofa this is Eric Bunce!"

"Sofa? It's just a bench, made out o' nothing but pine wood!"

"Well, it's got a cunning, deep-down seat in one end, with leather over it. I guess the other end's a table. It's queer."

"Everything's queer up in this old attic. Let's go and ask great-grandma. She knows everything."

"An' maybe she'll say, 'It reminds me.' An' that'll be splendid. I do thing great-grandma's 'reminds' are just as nice, Eric Bunce!"

"So do I, Annis Em'ly! Come on!" And away the children scampered to great-grandma's sunny room.

"A bench, dearie?—bench?—bench? Why, that must be father's old shoemaker's bench, that old Uncle Nehemi! Marlin used to sit on when he came round shoemaking. Oh, yes; and that's the old block of shoe-pegs you've got in your hand, Eric. Bring it here, dearie. See, he used to cut off a slice, and then break off the pegs like matches. That's the way shoe-pegs were made when I was a little girl. The shoemaker came round once a year, and stayed long enough to make up shoes for the whole family."

"Oh, my! How funny," laughed Annis Em'ly. "Just the way mother's dressmaker does! Did he make your boots, too, great-grandma?"

"Everybody's. The men-folks had heavy cowhide boots, and we girls had calfskin ones that we thought were nice enough for anybody. Uncle Nehemi made them very daintily, we thought."

Great-grandma's tone had a hint in it. Annis Em'ly—she was named for great-grandma—tucked her feet up under her petticoats hurriedly, and wished she hadn't complained because her new boots were so homely.

"Tell some more, please do," she said hastily. "Tell 'bout how they buttoned 'em or laced 'em."

"Laced always. Uncle Nehemi used to make his own lacings out of leather. He cut off thin strips, and then rolled them hard between boards to make them round. We children always used to be standing round, watching him do everything. It was a great treat. And that reminds me!"

"Oh, goody! A 'remind'!" shouted Eric. And Annis Em'ly ran to call the other children.

"Come, quick!" she cried. "Great-grandma's 'reminded'!"

Great-grandma took off her spectacles to laugh. She shook so hard they would tumble off.

"That reminds me what happened to my Sunday boots once. I didn't laugh then! Oh, dear me, no! How I cried! It meant a good deal to lose your Sunday boots in those days. You see, in summer we children always went barefoot. And Sundays we carried our shoes and stockings in our hands, and put them on under Deacon 'Bial Peters' big oak, and then took them off again to walk home. Church was three miles away; and it would have worn them out too much to wear them all the way—dearie me, yes! Well, this Sunday we got there early, and thought we'd leave our shoes under the oak and run down to the cranberry creek for a wade. Mother never allowed us to on Sunday, but we went."

Great-grandma's sorrowful gaze rested on Annis Em'ly with a dreamy look, as if she thought Annis Em'ly were her own long-ago, naughty self.

"We went. When we came back Deacon 'Bial's old ram was just chewing up my second shoe. Oh, dearie me!"

That was the end of great-grandma's "remind." There wasn't any moral.

"Great-grandma never says morals. She looks 'em!" Eric said.

"She wasn't laughin' when she got through. She looked sorry," Annis Em'ly said thoughtfully. "Most a hundred years is a long time to stay sorry in, Eric Bunce."

"Well," Eric said wisely, "then you must mind your mother!"—Annie Hamilton Donnell, in Zion's Herald.

An Able Helper!

A little ragged boy named Jim, belonging to a mission school, received one day a card, on which were printed the words, "Mighty to Save." He put it in the pocket of his ragged jacket, carried it home, and at night, before going to sleep, he tried to spell it out; but he could not understand it. He resolved to ask his teacher about it next Sunday, and he did so. Jim was a weak-minded little fellow. The rude boys in the court called him "Soft-headed Jim." Yet he was trying to be a Christian, and was a good-natured boy.

His teacher tried to show him that "Mighty to Save" referred to Jesus, and that the meaning of those words was that He would put His arms round us, and would always help us when we were trying to do right. Jim made up his mind to try and do some good at home, and hoped that the one "Mighty to Save" would help him. So when he woke the next morning he was thinking how he would begin. His father and mother were both drunkards. They lay there, sleeping heavily. His little brother Tom, whose legs had been broken by his father in one of his drunken sprees, and who, after weeks of suffering, was just able to sit up, was leaning on his elbows, longing for something to eat.

"Jim," said little Tom, "I'm awful hungry. Couldn't yer get me something to eat?"

"I wish I knowed where to get it, Tom," said Jim. "I've just got 'quainted with one that can help."

Then he went over to the other corner of the room, and, kneeling down, he offered this simple prayer: "Oh, dear Jesus, mighty to save, will yer show a poor feller how to get a few crusts of bread, or somethin', for his little brother, who is sick and starvin'?" Do, dear Jesus, and do it quick. Amen." Then he ran out of doors and got into the street. The pavements were covered with snow. A lady opened the front door of one of the houses and said to her little girl: "Who can we get to clean the snow off the pavement?"

For Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Asthma, Sore Throat, Coughs, Bronchitis, Colds, Catarrh.

Don't fail to use Cresoline for the above ailments, and often fatal affections. It is recommended.

It is a simple, safe, effective and drugless treatment. Vaporized Cresoline stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves Spasmodic Croup at once. In asthma it shortens the attack and insures comfortable repose.

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresoline relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria.

Cresoline's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use. Send postal for Descriptive Booklet.

"Oh, ma'am, can I clean off the snow?" said little Jim.

"You? Why, you are such a little fellow!"

"Yes'um, I'm little, but I'm strong. And Him that's mighty to save is going to help me."

The lady did not know what he meant.

"Come into the hall, my boy," she said. "It's too cold to stand talking here?" While Jim was warming himself by the stove she asked him what he meant by what he had just said. In a simple, earnest way Jim tried to explain his meaning. While he was speaking the lady's heart was touched, and her eyes were filled with tears. Then she went into the kitchen, and returned with a lunch.

"Eat this, little Jim," she said, "and then you can clean the pavement."

"I will clean the pavement first, ef you please, ma'am. I'm in a hurry to get back to poor Tom."

The pavement was soon cleaned, and Jim returned to the door. There he received a package, which the lady said was to pay for his service.

Jim ran home as fast as he could go. Tom saw him enter the room, carrying a bundle. "Oh, Jim, have yer got something for me?" he asked.

Jim opened the box, and as he saw the nice things in it he had to shout for joy. As for Tom, tears and smiles were chasing each other over his pale, eager face. He clasped his hands for joy, and asked: "Oh, Jim, where did you get all these good things?" And then his voice grew sad, as he added: "Jim, yer're a good brother, an awful good brother, and I love yer; but yer didn't steal them, did you? Remember the commandment yer learned at school, and taught me."

"No, little Tom, I'd starve 'fore I'd steal; an', Tom, much as I love yer, I'd rather you'd starve, too, 'cause then we'd go up there, you know," said he, pointing upwards. "Eat away, Tom; Him that's mighty to save helped me to get these."

"Where does he live? Is he an angel?" asked Tom, while eagerly devouring one of the nice sandwiches which Jim had brought.

"He's better and stronger than all the angels. He's the king of heaven," said Jim, reverently.

"Why, Jim, where could you a seen Him?" asked Tom, in a great wonder.

In answer to this Jim explained about the one mighty to save; how he had gone to Him and prayed for help, to find bread for his starving brother. "An', Tom," said he, "I'll never be afraid of nothin' while I live—no, nothin'."

"Not of pa knockin' yer over the head, and throwin' sticks, and the poker, and the ugly iron chair at yer? Oh, Jim, ye'll be afraid of that, won't yer?"

"No, never. Why, Tommy, didn't I tell yer that the arms of Him that is mighty to save is aroun' me? If father shu'd kill me," and his voice sank lower, "it wouldn't be me layin' here with the blood spurtin' on the white face and the rags, I'd—I'd be—oh, Tommy, I'd be in the arms of Jesus. Just think of that! ain't it comfortin' to think of Him that's mighty to save?"

The boys thought their parents were fast asleep, but they had been awake for some time, with their eyes shut, listening to all the little ones were saying. Tom lay back on his bed, feeling very comfortable after eating three nice sandwiches.

Jim said: "Let's save these big slices, with the nice meat 'tween 'em, for father and mother."

"I'm willin'," said Tom, "but they'd rather have somethin' to drink."

"Poor father! poor mother!" said Jim.

"Does yer pity 'em, Jim?" asked Tom.

"Pity 'em and love 'em too," said Jim.

"How can yer when they are so cruel to us, beatin', and jawin', and poundin' everythin' aroun'?"

"I do, 'cause I ought," said Jim; "an', Tom, mebbe Him that's mighty to save will do somethin' for them. I'm prayin' for them."

"He wouldn't for them, Jim; they're too bad."

"Teacher said He'd save to the uttermost. I can't remember all she said; but I think they's the uttermost, an' ef Him that's mighty to save 'ud put His arms about 'em He'd lift 'em up. But, Tom, I'm goin' out now to get somethin' for father and mother with the money that kind lady gave me."

Before going out he noticed that his father and mother had turned their faces to the wall, but he didn't know that they were weeping bitterly. While the boy was out buying some coal and coffee and milk and sugar, they lay there thinking of their wicked lives, and of those wonderful words, "Mighty to save."

Jim came back. The hot coffee was soon ready. He and Tom had drank a cup of it, and were waiting for their father and mother to wake up.

"I wish they'd wake up, Tom."

"Mebbe they'll pound you when they do."

"I ain't 'fraid, yer know, with the mighty one to help me."

"Jim! little Jim!" his father called.

Chamberlayne: Died at the Columbia Hospital, Columbia, South Carolina, Saturday, December 15th, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, LEWIS PARKE CHAM-BERLAYNE, youngest son of the late
Captain John Hampden and Mary Walker (Gibson) Chamberlayne, and beloved husband of Bessie Mann Chamberlayne.

Fitzhugh: Died at the residence of her nieces, Misses Buckner, near Gainesville, Prince William County, Va., December 22, 1917, VIRGINIA A. FITZHUGH.
The deceased was a native of Fredericksburg, Va.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Slaughter: Died suddenly at her home in Danville, Va., December 12, 1917,
MATTIE CARTER, beloved wife of S. J.
Slaughter, and daughter of the late Jesse
T. and Nettie Carter.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Watters: Entered into Life Eternal
January 2, 1918, at 8:30 P. M. from the Home for Incurables, Washington, D. C., LYDIA GATES WATTERS, wife of the late Rev. Paxson Watters. Funeral in St. James Church, Wilmington, N. C.
Interment in Oakdale Cemetery, Wilmington.

Wickens: Entered into the rest that remaineth to the people of God, CEDRIC
A. H. WICKENS, the only son of his mother, and she a widow, aged twenty-two years, a soldier in the British army, died of wounds November 7, 1917, at Jerusalem on the battlefield. Cedric was the loved nephew of the Rev. Edwin Wickens, of All Saints Hospital, Fort Worth, Texas, who has been and now is a missionary of over forty years standing in Texas. Cedric was universally beloved for his uprightness and truthfulness. A devout Churchman, baptized, confirmed and communicant. In all things he loved God, was devoted to his poor mother, and a brave soldier to his country. While only a private, yet the king of England (George) and the Queen Mary sent loving messages to the distressed mother. May he rest in peace and light perpetually shine upon him.

MRS. ANNA THORNTON MURRAY.

In Leesburg, Va., Monday, November
26, 1917, ANNA THORNTON MURRAY, widow of Judge Stirling Murray, of Leesburg, and daughter of the late Dr.
Thomas Miller, of Washington, D. C. A beautiful life, full of deeds of love and kindness, closed in full assurance of faith, relying on the saving grace of the Lamb, that was slain. Many beautiful tributes have been paid to the character and influence of this lovely Christian woman from the Sons of the Confederacy, the Loudoun Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, of which she was the only president, and we append the tribute of the King's Daughters, showing her loyalty and devotion to the Church of which she had been a devoted and consistent member all her life:

"The St. James Circle of King's Daughters desires to put on record an expression of its deep sense of loss in the death of its first and only president, Mrs.
Stirling Murray, which occurred in Leesburg, Va., Monday, November 26, 1917.

"Seeing the urgent need of a new church, Mrs. Murray, in the year 1888, was instrumental in organizing one Parish society, its object being to assist in building the church and to bring the young members of the congregation into active service. The society flourished, thousands of dollars were added to the building fund and the work of the King's Daughters became a power in the community.

"When the new St. James was finished and paid for, our President found another great need, this being a Parish House. In this cause she became most zealous, and the first large contribution in money came from her. As her representatives we should do all in our power to carry out this her earnest desire.
When the house is built it will now be a memorial to her as well as to all those of this Parish who, having finished their course on earth, do now rest from their labors.

"Mrs. Murray will be sorely missed in this community, where she was always ready to help the poor and afflicted and the old soldiers of the Lost Cause, but in St. James church her loss will be most keenly felt, for the welfare of the church was ever the object nearest her heart.

"To the members of her family our society will tender its sincere sympathy, with the hope that in the general resurrection they, with our beloved president and the King's Daughters, may together behold the King in His beauty."

A HEALING SPRING AT YOUR DOOR.

Here is a very unusual and peculiar offer—one that you rarely meet with. It evidences the greatest faith on the part of its maker and inspires confidence. It is made by an earnest and enthusiastic man, who not only thinks, but knows from personal experience that he is right. He proposes to give you the equivalent of a three weeks' visit to a Mineral Spring of most remarkable restorative powers and make no charge if you are not benefited. His offer has been accepted by several thousands of sufferers in all parts of the United States, and his records show that only two in a hundred on the average report no benefit.

If you suffer with dyspepsia, indigestion, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney, bladder or liver disease, uric acid poisoning, or other condition caused by impure blood, take Mr. Shivar at his word and sign and mail the following letter:

Shivar Spring.

Box 64-H, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Spring Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case, you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

the program of the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill, as set forth in the report of the Pittsburgh Congress, and to take steps, as soon as may be practicable, to form a committee for its promotion."

Manhood.

The principal effect of Christian faith upon man's moral life is to be found neither in the scruples which it induces regarding certain sins, nor in the positive duties which it enjoins, but in the transcendent value it places on personality. The New Testament is a treatise upon self-respect. The central theme around which all its harmonies are composed is the spiritual nature, the permanent continuance, the infinite value, the boundless possibility of man. The great affirmations of the Christian Gospel that God created men and loves them, that they are immortal and that God needs them to perfect His work, merge their influence in raising man's valuation of himself.—H. E. Fosdick.

The Second Look.

What may be called the "second look" may save many a thoughtful person from a mistake or may open the road to happiness. When he has his first glimpse of autumn's glowing leaves falling to the earth, he may feel regret at what seems merely the death of the leaves. A second look shows him that the leaves are forming a winter coverlet for the wild flowers which, because the leaves have fallen, will blossom anew in the spring. When one greets a new acquaintance, at first glance the stranger may seem reserved, proud, or self-conceited, yet the second look—a longer acquaintance—discloses more pleasant characteristics, and often leads to a valued friendship. In the same way, some persons at first look upon the Christian life as hard, dull and unpromising, whereas the deeper knowledge which the second look gives, shows one's Christian friends to be cheery, useful and winsome, and discloses the joy of serving Christ. So we may treat all experiences of life: the first glance attracts the attention, the second look sees beneath the service to the vital fact below.—Anon.

Delayed Kindness.

Dr. Johnson wrote to Chesterfield: "The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labors, had it been early it had been kind, but it has been delayed till I am indifferent and cannot enjoy it, till I am solitary and cannot impart it, till I am known and do not want it." There was a time when the praise and patronage of Chesterfield would have been balm to the sore and sad heart of Dr. Johnson. But Chesterfield waited until Dr. Johnson's position was established and his reputation made. How like to Chesterfield we are in kindly words and kindly deeds! We put them off until they are meaningless or valueless. Let us deal more sensibly with our fellow men. Let us cheer the man who is struggling to get his feet on the first rung of the ladder of fame. Let us help the man who is down and out, and who longs for another chance to make good. Let us interest ourselves in the young men and women who are just starting out in life that we may cheer them in their hours of gloom and discouragement. "Had it been early, it had been kind." Let us make haste with our kindness.—Watchman Examiner.

How painful it must be to a family who have perpetuated the memory of their loved ones in seeing their same style of window, same pose, same coloring, same everything, in another person's memorial window—all that they had cherished as theirs was anybody's. Thoughts For the Thoughtful Love anoints every gift with its own blood.—Ex.

Singing in sorrow is the sign of God's saints.—Ex.

It costs more to be proud than it does to be generous.—Ex.

The mistakes of love are better than the perfections of selfishness.—Ex.

Men who have lost their innocence cannot preserve their courage.—Lord Clarendon.

It is one thing to be overtaken by a fault, and another thing to overtake it.—P. Henry.

It is only human nature to judge your adversary in his worst suit of clothes.—Burroughs.

God still loves a cheerful giver as much as He did when the widow gave her two mites.—Ex.

God needs intelligent service as much as He needs a loyalty that is willing to go to the stake.—Ex.

To live is only the first act of life; the second act of life is that of out-living ourselves.—Lacordaire.

"Here is a small word which may help greatly: God always answers prayer. He has three answers to prayer: 'Yes'; 'No'; 'Wait.'"

The gladness most worth having is that which is at hand, growing by today's highway. Pluck it; it will be a present delight and a future treasure in memory's store.—Bishop Charles H. Brent.

Some one illustrates meekness by saying that it is like one of those fragrant trees which bathes with its perfume the ax that smites into its wood. The meek man gives back love for hate, kindness for unkindness, sweetness for bitterness.—Emma C. Fisk.

We must take time to speak to Him of our work and His work; of our need and responsibility; of our sorrows and of our joys; of our defeats and of our victories. That is the practice of this fellowship, and we need to take time for these things.—Campbell Morgan.

And Christ, whom I would serve in love and fear,

Went not away to rest Him, but to do

What could be better done in heaven than here,

And bring to all good cheer.

—Walter C. Smith.

Christianity centers in an allegiance to a person. Christians do not worship a memory, they follow a living leader. The men and women who have best served their kind have done it to lay some offerings at His feet. In the annals of the heroism of our race there are no chapters to compare with those that chronicle the deeds done on this earth for the love of Christ.—Silvester Horne.

"Once it was my working,

His it hence shall be;

Once I tried to use Him,

Now He uses me;

Once the power I wanted,

Now the Mighty One;

Once I worked for glory,

Now His will alone."

If one sign surer than any other be chosen to mark the progress of the Divine life, it is when sanctity prevails even in the minutest points of character, and in ordinary ways. The least look, the faintest expression, the casual act, may tell more of the secret power of Jesus in the soul than world-faded acts of self-devotion.—T. T. Carter.

Never yet did there exist a full faith in the Divine Word (by whom light as well as immortality was brought into the world), which did not expand the intellect while it purified the heart; which did not multiply the aims and objects of the understanding while it fixed and simplified those of the desires and passions. In our present state it is little less than impossible that the affections should be kept constant to an object which gives no employment to the understanding, and yet cannot be made manifest to the senses. The exercise of the reasoning and reflective powers, increasing insight, and enlarging views, are requisite to keep alive the substantial faith of the heart.—S. T. Coleridge.

The Old Pastor's Dismissal.

"We need a younger man to stir the people,
And lead them to the fold,"
The deacons said, "We ask your resignation,
Because you are growing old."

The pastor bowed his deacons out in silence
And tenderly the gloom
Of twilight hid him and his bitter anguish
Within his lonely room.

Above the violet hills the sunlight's glory
Hung like a crown of gold,
And from the great church spire the bell's sweet anthem
Adown the stillness rolled.

Assembled were the people for their worship;
But in his study chair
The pastor sat unheeded, while the south wind
Caressed his snow-white hair.

A smile lay on his lips. His was the secret
Of sorrow's glad surcease,
Upon his forehead shone the benediction
Of everlasting peace.

"The ways of Providence are most mysterious,"
The deacons gravely said,
As wondering-eyed and scared, the people crowded
About their pastor—dead.

"We loved him," wrote the people on the coffin
In words of shining gold;
Above the broken heart they set a statue
Of marble, white and cold.
—Christian Advocate.

O grant that nothing in my soul
May dwell but Thy pure love alone;
O may Thy love possess me whole,
My joy, my treasure and my crown;
All coldness from my heart remove,
May every act, word, thought, be love.

Nothing More.

Simon of Cyrene bore
The cross of Jesus; nothing more.
His name is never heard again,
Nor honored by historic pen;
Nor on the pedestal of fame
His image courts the loud acclaim.
Simon of Cyrene bore
The cross of Jesus; nothing more.

And yet, when all our work is done,
And golden beams the western sun
Upon a life of wealth and fame—
A thousand echoes ring the name—
Perhaps our hearts will humbly pray:
"Good Master, let the record say,
Upon the page divine, 'He bore
The cross of Jesus'; nothing more."

New Every Morning.

Every day is a fresh beginning,
Every morn is the world made new,
You who are weary of sorrow and sinning,

Here is a beautiful hope for you—
A hope for me and a hope for you.

All the past things are past and over;
The tasks are done and the tears are shed;

Yesterday's errors let yesterday cover;
Yesterday's wounds, which smarted and bled,

Are healed with the healing which night has shed.

Yesterday now is a part of forever,
Bound up in a sheaf which God holds tight,

With glad days, and sad days, and bad days, which never

Shall visit us more with their bloom and their blight,

Their fulness of sunshine, or sorrowful night.

Let them go, since we cannot re-live them;

Cannot undo and cannot atone;
God in His mercy receive, forgive them!
Only the new days are our own;
To-day is ours, and to-day alone.

Here are the skies all burnished brightly,

Here is the spent earth all re-born,
Here are the tired limbs springing lightly

To face the sun and to share with the moon

In the chrism of dew and the cool of dawn.

Every day is a fresh beginning,

Listen, my soul, to the glad refrain,
And spite of old sorrow, and older sin-
ning,

And puzzles forecasted and possible
pain,

Take heart with the day and begin again.

do not know that I ever asked Him for glory or honor, and I hope I never shall; and I very seldom ask Him for material things apart from the King-

No. 3

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND AND THE OLD PENSIONERS.

Through the courtesy of the Secretary of the Church Pension Fund we are publishing in this issue the Minutes of the Meeting of the Trustees held on December 18 ultimo, so far as they refer to the distribution of the assets of the Fund among the various interests committed to their keeping. Mr. Sayre, fearing that these resolutions would seem too long or too technical for publication in the Southern Churchman, has also very kindly furnished us with a brief summary or explanation of the action of the Trustees. This we append to the more lengthy report, but are giving both as containing matter of general interest to the Church.

They will be read with a distinct feeling of disappointment and regret by many who are interested in the fate of the old pensioners upon the General Clergy Relief Fund and the Diocesan Funds, which have been merged with the Church Pension Fund. The resolutions show the full purpose of the Pension Fund to meet all the obligations assumed when these older Relief Funds were taken over, and the large amount of money segregated to guarantee their payment would indicate that these obligations were very considerable. No estimate of the amount required is given, and perhaps it has not yet been actuarially computed. Of course, however, a large portion of the amounts paid on this account will be returned when the last of these old pensioners shall have passed away and the funds of the old Relief Society, and perhaps others, shall revert to the Pension Fund.

But the Trustees of Pension Fund seem to have found no way, with the means at their command, to increase the meagre relief formerly paid these veterans whose day's work was done before March 1, 1917, and their dependents, or to place them on a more nearly equal footing with those who shall come after. It is this that will cause a pang of regret in the heart of the Church, and make her feel that in her zeal and liberality in creating a great system for pension relief in the future she has been less than generous to those whose present claim was the first upon her consideration.

For it can hardly be said that all the promise that the Church held out to these veteran disabled clergy and their widows and orphans have been fulfilled in the guarantee of the Pension Fund that the grants that were being paid them on the first of last March should be continued. This guarantee will be made good, for the Fund is abundantly able to care for it; and it may be said that this is a better asset than the unassured annual grant of the General Clergy Relief or of diocesan societies, but of this we are not sure. During the fifteen years in which the Rev. Alfred J. P. McClure served with such faithfulness and with such remarkable results as the Secretary and Financial Agent of the old Relief Society, the receipts of that Society from all sources increased from about $63,000 to about $184,000 a year, and were still increasing as were those of the diocesan societies. A thorough system of co-operation between this general Society and those of the various dioceses had been established. All proper beneficiaries were known and listed, and sympathetically ministered to as far as possible. The increase in their number would have been only the normal increase incident to the growth of the number of clergy in the Church, which is very slow. The vested funds as well as the annual contributions for their relief were steadily growing. The royalties on the prospective new Hymnal would in a few years have added to them very largely. To be sure, the whole system of pension relief dependent upon voluntary offerings and the interest on comparatively small invested funds was entirely unsatisfactory, in that it afforded inadequate relief and lacked the assurance of stability; hence the splendid scheme of the Pension Fund as a substitute for it in the future. But the fact remains that for the pensioners then receiving aid the old system was full of promise that the relief afforded them from year to year would grow with the ever growing liberality of the Church and its realization of its duty in this regard. This hope was destroyed for them at a blow when the Pension Fund came into being. So far as they were concerned the streams of the Church's generosity were cut off or turned into other channels. A tax bill to meet future claims takes the place of the old appeals based upon past services. Mr. McClure's splendid work in bringing the Church to an apprehension of its duty toward them was suspended. The old societies which so lovingly, however inadequately, looked after their welfare were merged into or co-ordinated with the new system which has its eye fixed upon the future only and whose efforts are to provide beforetime for pensioners who are yet to be. They are assured, as an incidental measure, of just what they happened to be receiving a year ago, and that this will never be any more. The fact that this small grant is only worth sixty per cent of what it was even a year ago makes no difference, there is no one now to investigate their need or to plead their cause. Their claim has been adjudicated, and a cast-iron system, wonderfully adapted for its acknowledged purposes of providing for future pensioners, has absorbed all the sources of supply but can afford them no further relief.

We are not trying to place the blame for this. The Pension Fund is working under its charter and the canon of the General Convention, and we doubt not is meeting strictly every obligation which they impose. But somewhere the Church has made a serious blunder—has done an unintentional injustice to veterans in her service whom she loves and honors.

Mr. Sayre asks that attention be called to the very successful operation of the Church Pension Fund during its first fiscal year. But the ten months between March 1, 1917, and January 1, 1918, over 80 per cent of all the possible pension assessments were received at the New York office. "The Trustees think," he continues, "that this is a remarkable record for the first ten months of a new system, and that it shows how cordially the Church is supporting the pension plan of the General Convention. They feel that they can look forward with confidence to the time when the payment of the pension assessment will become practically automatic in every parish and other organization served by a clergyman of our Church and when, therefore, the intent of the General Convention that every clergyman in active service should be covered by pension protection shall be fully carried out."

Which makes us regret all the more keenly that those who have served the Church so faithfully in the past, and as a rule on salaries so much smaller than those which are now paid, should be forever barred from receiving any benefit from a system otherwise so admirable as well as successful.

The Southern Churchman Greatly Improved.

From The Witness.

It is a pleasure to note the great improvement recently made in the Southern Churchman. It is printed on a much better quality of paper than heretofore, and more attention is being given to its mechanical make-up. It will be strengthened at an early date in every department, and its usefulness enhanced by a larger corps of editors. In order to meet the increase in the cost of publishing the paper, the rate of subscription will be advanced on January 1 to $3 per year for the Laity and $2 per year for the Clergy. To branch out so extensively in the face of war prices shows a strong faith on the part of the publishers in their subscribers and advertisers, and in the field from which they must draw their support. The Rev. Dr. Goodwin, who is the editor, is making the Southern Churchman a first class family Church paper, and we are glad to speak a good word for it. We congratulate the publishers and wish them every success in their new undertaking.

We beg to thank our vigorous young contemporary, The Witness, for such a kindly notice; and to add our congratulations and good wishes to those of the Bishops and others which appear in its first anniversary number. In a short year, and that a trying year for even well-established publications, The Witness has won a deserved and recognized place among our Church papers. Of its goodly editorial staff three have been consecrated Bishops within the year, and a fourth awaits consecration. We don't know how the publishers manage it, but it is still published, at Hobart, Indiana, at one dollar a year.

Have we ever sacrificed any wish, any ambition for Christ's sake? Have we ever sacrificed any time for Christian work? Have we ever promptly refused a profitable business proposition in order to do a definite Christian service? Have we actually ever sacrificed any money for a good cause? Have we ever really denied ourselves something that we very much wanted to take the money for some one else more needy than ourselves? If not, we do not and cannot know the meaning of this word "love."—Edgar De Witt Jones.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered, at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

The High Call. By (the Rev. Dr.) Ernest M. Stires, rector of St. Thomas' Church, New York. E. P. Dutton & Company. Pp. 180. $1.50 net.

There is a deep significance in the practical unanimity with which the Clergy of the Church have been speaking to their people on the war and the various issues connected with it. From its beginning many of them found it difficult, and some impossible, to observe the request of the President and maintain an attitude of neutrality. It was so manifestly a conflict between right and wrong, between principles allied with the Kingdom of God and those which were earthly, sensual and devilish, that one could not mistake it or remain indifferent to it. When America took her stand at last the Clergy did not wait for the advice of Bishops or the action of Councils, but with one accord and as in duty bound made it their business to impress upon their congregations the righteousness of our cause, the moral and religious considerations connected with it, the high motives which they should set before them and the willing sacrifices which they were called upon to make. And in so doing they have not for a moment supposed that they were substituting patriotism for religion or departing from their normal task of declaring the counsel of God.

That so influential a pulpit as that of St. Thomas', New York, would give no uncertain sound on these and kindred subjects was quite to be expected. In the volume before us Dr. Stires has collected fourteen sermons on topics connected with the war, preached between February 18 and November 11, 1917. They are published at the desire of some who heard them, and will gratify many who did not. The sermons are thoughtful, direct and stimulating. They point to the highest ideals but also to the practical pathway of service and sacrifice by which they are to be reached. The language of religious truth is used in the discussion of national issues and is not found out of place. They interpret the best and noblest impulses which are animating our people to-day and awakening in them a new sense of spiritual values in mundane duties. Their publication was worthy and timely, and we hope for them the wide circulation which both their topics and the treatment of them deserve.

The Religion of the Church: As Presented in the Church of England. A Manual of Membership. By Charles Gore, D. D., Bishop of Oxford. American Edition. Young Churchman Company, Milwaukee. Pp. 183. 75 cents, cloth; 50 cents paper.

We suppose Bishop Gore would be acknowledged as the leading exponent to-day of that school in the Church of England and in America which has adopted the name of Catholic, at least of its more conservative wing, and that his statement of its views and teachings may be accepted as representative. This little book is of value, therefore, as giving that conception of catholic religion which is held and taught by that large and influential school of thought. We do not understand that the author claims that his views are identical with the teachings of the Church of England. As intimated in the title of the book, it is a system "presented in," not by, that Church. And in his preface the learned Bishop says: "This little book is intended as a summary statement of the religion of the Catholic Church. It is intended to meet a need, which is just now clamorous—the provision of a manual of instruction for the members of the Church of England." The inference is that the Church has failed to instruct her members, or to instruct them adequately or correctly; hence the clamorous need which our author discovers of additional instruction in certain things which are, indeed, held and taught by some in the Church, though not by the Church herself. We could wish, however, that this distinction had been made plainer, for the uninstructed reader will not always be able to draw this important line for himself.

The book seems to us rather a medley. There is so much in it that is true in the highest sense, and that is so admirably put, that one wishes it could be sifted out from the dubious, the outworn and the supererogatory. Sometimes Bishop Gore, like all the best writers of his party, seems to us to chafe under the bonds of fourteenth-century traditionalism and to make as though he would cast them from him, but they are too strong for him. If all Church leaders would be content "to leave off learning where God leaves off teaching"; or at least, after the manner of the Church, leave extrascriptural doctrines and devices to be held by those who like them and not to be urged upon those who do not, how simple, free and redolent of sweet charity would "The Religion of the Church" Catholic be seen to be!

Father Stanton's Sermon Outlines: From His own Manuscript. Edited by E. F. Russell, M. A., St. Alban's, Holborn. Longmans, Green and Co., London and New York. Pp. 236. $1.75.

Here is some of the sermon material, as far as it was written down, of a great and useful preacher who had learned the difficult art of fixing his mind and heart on a text until he had gotten down to the roots of it, and then selecting from its stores just what he would give to his people without attempting to exhaust it—or them. As examples of this essential method of pulpit preparation these outlines are admirable and ought to stimulate the ambition and efforts of every clerical reader. In matter they are also suggestive and illuminating to an unusual degree, and in the main thoroughly evangelical. There are about one hundred of the outlines, covering the Church year from Advent to Easter.

Stowe's Clerical Directory of the American Church. (Formerly, Lloyd's Clerical Directory.) Edited and Published by the Rev. Andrew D. Stowe, Minneapolis, Minnesota. Pp. 418. $3.00.

This publication, which has been long expected and was unfortunately delayed by a fire in the printing office involving a total loss of the material prepared, at last appears in good shape and attractive dress. It is a compendium of information concerning the Clergy which is indispensable to those who have occasion to know something of their personal history and services, and is alone in its particular field. It also contains Diocesan and Parochial statistics and other cognate matter. It seems to be as free from errors as could be expected in such a mass of data, and the publisher is to be congratulated on his work.

The Living Church Annual and Churchman's Almanac. A Church Cyclopedia and Almanac: 1918. Young Churchman Company, Milwaukee. Pp. 515. 90 cents, cloth; 65 cents, paper.

This Annual is an institution which is too well known to require commendation. It is wonderfully complete and accurate, the two qualities which are desired in a publication of this kind. The present issue is fully up to the standard hitherto set.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND.

Minutes of the Meeting of the Trustees, December 18, 1917.

The first annual meeting of the Trustees of the Church Pension Fund took place, in accordance with the rules, and in accordance with notices sent to the Trustees by the President of the Fund, at the offices of the Fund, 14 Wall Street, New York City, on Tuesday, December 18, 1917, there being present the Right Reverend the Bishop of Massachusetts, the Right Reverend the Bishop of New York, the Right Reverend the Bishop of Pennsylvania, the Rev. Dr. McIlvaine, the Rev. Dr. Stires, Mr. Mather, Mr. J. P. Morgan, Mr. William Fellowes Morgan, Mr. Peabody, Mr. Sayre, Mr. Truesdale and Mr. Yarnall. * * *

The Chair laid before the Trustees a report from the Executive Committee as follows:

Resolved, That the assets of the Church Pension Fund shall, until otherwise ordered by the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee, be distributed among the following eight accounts, namely: I. Accrued Pension Liabilities Account; II. Permanent Pension Account; III. General Clergy Relief Fund Account; IV. General Clergy Relief Fund in Liquidation; V. Merged Diocesan Funds Account; VI. General Convention of 1907 Account; VII. General Account; VIII. Hymnal Account.

These accounts shall, until otherwise ordered by the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee, be constituted as follows:

I. The Accrued Pension Liabilities Account shall consist of all assessments received, in accordance with the rules, on behalf of clergymen whose names stood upon the canonical roll of this Church on March 1, 1917, and of payments and subscriptions to the initial reserve to the amount of $5,064,000, as of March 1, 1917. From this account shall be paid the pensions voted by the Executive Committee to those clergymen whose names stood upon the eligible list on March 1, 1917, and to their families.

II. The Permanent Pension Account shall consist of all assessments received, in accordance with the rules, on behalf of clergymen whose names shall have been added to the canonical roll of this Church subsequent to February 28, 1917. From this account shall be paid the pensions voted by the Executive Committee to these clergymen and to their families. The treasurer is authorized to borrow, if necessary, on behalf of this account from the Accrued Pension Liabilities Account (I) or the General Account (VII).

III. The General Clergy Relief Fund Account shall consist of the moneys and securities transferred from the General Clergy Relief Fund to the Church Pension Fund under the agreement of merger approved April 13, 1917, the income of which is unencumbered and as to which the Church Pension Fund is not limited or prescribed as to the expenditure thereof beyond the general purposes of the General Clergy Relief Fund; and of legacies made in the name of the General Clergy Relief Fund under wills executed prior to April 13, 1917. The income of this account shall be used in making payments to beneficiaries who stood upon the roll of the General Clergy Relief Fund at the date of the merger, and when, by the death of these beneficiaries, the income is released, it shall be paid to the General Account (VII) until the expenditures made out of the General Clergy Relief Fund in Liquidation (IV) shall have been reimbursed. Thereafter the income of the General Clergy Relief Fund Account (III) shall be held subject to the directions of the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee in furtherance of the objects for which the Church Pension Fund was created by the General Convention, and according to the intent of the donors of the moneys in the said General Clergy Relief Fund Account (III).

IV. The Church Pension Fund on account of the General Clergy Relief Fund in Liquidation shall consist, for the time being, of payments and subscriptions to the initial reserve to the amount of two million dollars ($2,000,000). In so far as may be necessary by the inadequacy of the income of the General Clergy Relief Fund Account (III), payments shall be made from this account to the beneficiaries of the General Clergy Relief Fund who stood upon the roll of that Fund at the date of its merger with the Church Pension Fund, and to their families, in accordance with the directions of the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee. The Treasurer is authorized, from time to time, to make such transfers from the General Clergy Relief Fund in Liquidation (IV) to the General Account (VII) as may be possible through the progress of the liquidation of the liabilities of the former General Clergy Relief Fund.

V. The Church Pension Fund on account of Merged Diocesan Funds shall consist, for the time being, of payments and subscriptions to the initial reserve to the amount of one million dollars ($1,000,000). In so far as may be necessary by the inadequacy of the income of a merged diocesan fund, payments shall be made from this account to the beneficiaries of merged diocesan funds in accordance with the directions of the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee. The Treasurer is authorized, from time to time, to make such transfers from the Merged Diocesan Funds Account (V) to the General Account (VII) as may be possible through the progress of the liquidation of the liabilities of the merged diocesan funds.

VI. The General Convention of 1907 account shall consist of the moneys and securities collected by the Commission appointed by the General Convention of 1907 and transferred to the Church Pension Fund under the resolution of the General Convention of 1913 and the Canon of the General Convention of 1916.

VII. The General Account shall consist of the following: Legacies to the Church Pension Fund; the income of the General Clergy Relief Fund Account (III) after disbursements to the beneficiaries of the General Clergy Relief Fund are no longer necessary, until the payments made out of the General Clergy Relief Fund in Liquidation (IV) shall have been reimbursed; the income of the diocesan funds merged with the Church Pension Fund until in the case of each diocesan fund the expenditures made on its behalf out of the Merged Diocesan Funds Account (V) shall have been reimbursed; all moneys and subscriptions to the initial reserve not distributed in other accounts; moneys held by the Church Pension Fund pending the determination of their proper use. The income of this account shall be disbursed in accordance with the rules formulated by the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee in furtherance of the objects for which the Church Pension Fund was created by the General Convention. From the income of this account shall be paid the grants to beneficiaries of diocesan funds with which the Church Pension Fund is under contract in pursuance of agreements entered into before March 1, 1917; the appropriate transfers shall be made as of March 1, 1917. The Treasurer is authorized to make, from time to time, such transfers from the income of this account to the income of the Accrued Pension Liabilities Account (I) as may be necessary to provide for additions to the eligible list authorized after March 1, 1917; the appropriate transfers shall be made as of March 1, 1917. The Treasurer is authorized to make such transfers from the General Account (VII) to the Merged Diocesan Funds Account (V) as may be necessary to carry into operation mergers with diocesan funds entered into by specific resolutions of the Board of Trustees or the Executive Committee, for which the present appropriation to the Merged Diocesan Funds Account (V) is insufficient.

VIII. The Hymnal Account shall consist of moneys specifically received by the Church Pension Fund for the purposes of the Hymnal. The Treasurer is authorized to transfer moneys and securities in this account to the Church Hymnal Corporation, when the said corporation shall have been organized and be ready to begin operations.

The Treasurer shall also be authorized, from time to time, to create separate accounts on behalf of the diocesan funds merged with the Church Pension Fund.

All of the moneys and securities of the Church Pension Fund, with the exceptions hereinafter specified, shall be deposited with the Assistant Treasurer in one account entitled "The Church Pension Fund," but the records of the Church Pension Fund shall show the distribution of money and securities among the various accounts in accordance with this resolution. All vouchers shall show from which account the payments are made, and all resolutions appropriating money shall specify from which account said appropriation shall be paid.

The securities held in the General Clergy Relief Fund Account (III), and any investments made from the money of the said account, or any reinvestments made, shall be kept by the Assistant Treasurer, separately for the benefit of the said account.

The securities received in accordance with any merger with a diocesan fund, or any investments made from money received in accordance with such merger, or reinvestments made, shall be kept by the Assistant Treasurer separately for the benefit of said diocesan account, in accordance with the terms of each merger.

These resolutions shall become effective on the first day of January, 1918. The Treasurer is authorized to credit the Church Pension Fund on account of the General Clergy Relief Fund in Liquidation (IV) with such payments made between April 13, 1917, and December 31, 1917, inclusive, as shall have been in excess of the income of the former General Clergy Relief Fund for the same period.

The report of the Executive Committee was adopted.

The Trustees then adjourned.

Attest:

MONELL SAYRE,
Secretary.

This action of the Trustees of the Church Pension Fund may be summarized as follows:

1. The sum of $5,064,000, the amount originally asked of the Church, is segregated for the express purposes for which it was asked and given—accrued liabilities.
2. Two million dollars ($2,000,000) is set apart as a guarantee, to enable the Church Pension Fund to pay the grants of the General Clergy Relief Fund.
3. One million dollars ($1,000,000) is set apart as a guarantee, to enable dioceses to merge their diocesan funds with the Church Pension Fund.
4. The assets of the General Clergy Relief Fund are segregated perpetually, and after reimbursing the Church Pension Fund for its expenditures on account of the merger will be used according to the intent of the donors.
5. The money collected by the commission appointed at the General Convention of 1907, of which the Rev. J. J. Wilkins was financial agent, is segregated, to be used according to the intent of the donors.
6. The guarantee accounts of $2,000,000 and $1,000,000 respectively will eventually be freed, owing to the termination of the present grants of the General Clergy Relief Fund and of merged diocesan funds, and to the repayment to the Church Pension Fund of its payments made to such beneficiaries. The $3,000,000 will then constitute a reserve in the hands of the Trustees, the income of which will enable it to extend the benefits of the pension system to the clergy and their families.

The Church Pension Fund Trustees have thus devoted three million dollars ($3,000,000) to make sure that the beneficiaries of the General Clergy Relief Fund and of the merged diocesan funds receive throughout their lives the grants that have been pledged to them.

SOMEWHERE IN FRANCE WITH BISHOP ISRAEL.

Letter from Rev. Roy I. Murray, the Bishop's Companion.

"He travels fastest who travels alone"; but he who travels alone is likely to miss certain thrills which are inevitably to be got by one travelling with the Bishop of Erie. Apart from that, speed, as such, is hardly to be hoped for on French railroads under present conditions. No matter the place, no matter the distance, one snatches such fragments of "petit déjeuner" as are vouchsafed and lumbers to the station at the crack of dawn. Follows the inevitable and inevitably courteous examination, by the military authorities, of safe conducts, and, lately, the purchase of "billets militaires"—military tickets of astounding cheapness and minute proportions—so small that, once ingulfed in the fastness of one's trench-coat pocket, their discovery at the day's end is usually a matter of involved and embarrassed search. I say "at the day's end" for, again no matter the place or the distance, it is always after dark before the one is reached and the other covered.

When we left Paris on October 11 it was still possible, under certain conditions, to travel on military passes. Recently, however, in accordance with the familiar French proverb, "We have changed all that," and elaborate identity books are now necessary, containing one's photograph, of carefully prescribed size and character, an itinerary, a safe conduct and a paper which must be seen and stamped by designated authorities whenever a stop is made overnight.

We were making this time for the sea—the Bishop having been "loaned" by the American Red Cross in which he is chaplain of Base Hospital No. 20, at the request of the Y. M. C. A., to add to his appointed work addresses to soldiers on "the line." The train was as cold as usual—colder, we thought, as we left the suburbs of Paris to cut north and west across Normandy. We arrived at night, as usual, and, again as usual, in a blinding downpour of rain.

There was one room left at the hotel, a room of three beds—an embarrassment of riches, for Madame, in the office below stairs declined to rent the room unless we could manage to include a third member in our party. Presently we were again outside, breasting the rain for the next port of call, where matters were satisfactorily arranged. One falls naturally into naval phraseology—the town was blue with sailors—American sailors, everywhere. That and the smell of the sea down below the great fortifications—the sound too of American slang—made the next day's sunshine all the brighter.

The Bishop began at once to inspect the recreation and other quarters provided for the men. Most homelike of all, perhaps, was the restaurant, with typewritten menus in English, and food wonderfully good and reasonably cheap—happy combination—at the hands of two or three young Belgian women—refugees—of invaluable bilingual accomplishment. The Bishop was advised to try for peach jam—did try for it—got it, and was glad. Peach jam, asked for in English and eaten in the company of one's own people, crowded elbow to elbow—a corner of home in a town so old that the handiwork of Julius Caesar's soldiers is still pointed out to wondering American eyes.

One had to push through groups of French children to get to the door of the recreation building, just up the street. Inside were the usual rows of tables covered with well-worn magazines—the usual French railway posters—wonderfully done, many of them—seen on the walls across clouds of smoke—the usual groups gathered around the piano at the far end of the room. Everywhere men in navy blue—all, that is, except a few—survivors of the gun-crew of a merchantman torpedoed fifty miles off the coast in last night's storm of wind and rain. They told it gravely, simply—the shock to the ship, the explosion—then the life-boats, and, worst of all, how they heard across the darkness cries for help which could not be answered. We saw them later in another town—these same men—not barefooted this time, not in mufti of necessity, but smart in new uniforms, about to leave again for their appointed work, the conveying of another ship out across those same treacherous waters. It brings the war nearer home to meet men like that! And they are here by thousands, with more coming continually.

It is to reach these men with his message of encouragement and good cheer, his frank, earnest exhortation to our soldiers and sailors that they uphold here in the old world the splendid traditions of our young America—it is for this, in great part, that Bishop Israel is going from camp to camp along the "American Front." Following a carefully worked out schedule, he has made over sixty addresses in as many crowded huts. Some central town or village is chosen as a sort of temporary headquarters, and from there, by touring car, by ambulance, sometimes by army truck or motor side car, the Bishop makes his way to neighboring points where the men are collected.

This town where we are now, for example, the last on the present schedule, is the centering point of five roads, along which, each afternoon and night, the Bishop has been making his Apostolic pilgrimage.

For it is that. Most of his Erie friends would perhaps fail to recognize their Bishop in the person who climbs out of a mud-covered motor at one of those points which, at night, seem, each of them, situated exactly in the middle of nowhere. Designed or not, they are very much alike, these "Somewheres in France," especially at night. In place of the pastoral staff of tradition these present sheep are sought out by the light of a modern electric torch. But they are not far to seek. One of those low, darkened buildings will be the recreation hut, and the men have heard that he is coming and gathered there, often in hundreds. The shepherd adventures confidently through the mud—one goes through mud in France, and not across it—arrives at the door and enters.

There they are, gathered about the inadequate stoves, playing checkers and dominoes at the tables, reading, writing their letters, listening to familiar phonograph records or to such music as can be wrenched from the long-suffering piano—listening sometimes to both, and to both at once! A rough counter at the far end marks the canteen, and behind it rows of shelves, American tobacco, chocolate, chewing gum, candy and other eatables. The place is a fog of khaki, spread over with blue smoke; these soldiers, or, less frequently, marines, sometimes with much more than a sprinkling of French troopers. Not a cathedral surely, but what a congregation. And, before the Bishop has finished, indications of something more than merely human presence. News of what is happening along the line, incidents of interest taken from experiences at other camps, examples of that devotion to the cause which are to be found among our men everywhere, the call to put on that invisible, impregnable armor of the spirit without which no man, soldier or other, can fight his battle to its glorious conclusion—those of you who know him at home begin to recognize in the uniformed, belted figure standing there on an empty soap-box, your Bishop and your friend.

"That's all, boys, and thank you." Then, across the instant's silence, a crash of applause. These men have listened, have understood, have appreciated. Afterwards they gather about the Bishop in groups—the time has come for the personal word. Gradually the hut empties; soldiers go early to bed.

"Gosh," one man said on the way out of the hut at M—, "I wish he'd have come here on a Sunday, I'd like to hear that man preach once!" He did not know that he had heard a sermon; one which, in all probability, he will never forget.

"Can the Church rise to the present opportunity?" anxious men are asking everywhere at home. Can she? If you doubt it, ask that man climbing back into the muddy automobile. It may be that he will not hear you; his hand is on the arm of the soldier who holds the door of the car open: "What name? Why, boy, I know your father, back home."

"You'll know me, too, Bishop, after this," the straightforward answer comes, "if we get back!"

We leave here tomorrow morning—at six-thirty!

"ATTENZIONE!"

By W. H. Morse, M. D., Hartford, Conn.

"'Attenzione!'"

"Nella casa!"

"Certo!"

It was in the mission reading-room. The conversation was between two Italians at one of the tables. One of them had the Southern Churchman in his hand, and had called the other's attention to the advertisement of the Department of Army and Navy Work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, headed "Attention!" and soliciting correspondence with enlisted Churchmen. He had read the first word to the other, whose reply, "Nella casa!" meant that he thought it referred only to American, "home-made" soldiers, not to any others. And the answer, "Certo!" meant that his friend agreed with him.

There was a touch of sadness in their quiet words. It was evident to me as to what the reason was. They both had relatives and friends in the Italian army. One had two sons, young men who had attended St. Paul's Episcopal Mission. The other had a brother, or brother-in-law, who had been a member of the Brotherhood. I went to the table and sat down beside them.

"You hear from the boys?" I asked.

"O, yes, sir. They write some letters by."

"Now, see here!" I said, indicating the advertisement. "That does not mean 'homemade,' American, soldiers only. The boys must have written, or will write, some interesting things home. If, some time, you can tell me things that they have written, I warrant it will be of interest enough to give to the readers of the Southern Churchman."

They argued that the boys were not "home-made," but the next evening they brought the letters, and from them I gained several items, which, I am sure, will interest the readers of the Southern Churchman, as, really, the Italian Protestants who have been called as reservists to their colors from America are rich in true missionary zeal.

That which I will give is free translation, and just as written.

"A French officer heard what I said, and he said to me that he had sat in the sun to hear many priests, but the words of Jesus Christ seldom had he heard them until what I said, which was His words that he said to Miss Mary and Miss Martha."

"There was a swearer, who was named Francis, and he admired St. Francis much. I said, 'Stop! You make those oaths about St. Francis' Lord!'"

"This was a vice-brigadier of the revenue service, and he was examine our goods when we came. So he found my prayer-book, and said it so much added to my pack weight, and to leave it. I said that was one part my arms, if he please. 'You superstitious American!' was all he said, and he let it be."

"One was an old peasant woman, and she brought chicken eggs. Victor was then reading some Bible verses, which he does. She, the woman, saw it, the Bible, and she looked, and then by-by said to Victor like this: 'It a Protestant Bible-book?' Sure, Victor told her. Then this was what she ask: Had he another? He said he could get her another. Then she said she was glad, and this that she said, was: 'My Eldora will be well!' She meant a daughter who had consumption. 'My Eldora will be well, and I know others of same sickness who I will get by, with her.' I found out, and Victor found out, that long of years ago some priest had burnt Protestant Bibles, and some consumption people the smoke in smoked, and got well. What? Old woman Victor's Bible to burn to make daughter and some others get well!"

"D'Alta and me we got many to sing. Those heard us. So they catch off the songs too, which are of hymns, like 'Per te la vita mia!' ('I gave my life for me!'), many others. And it is like much as if it was to a meeting in the hall at home, for lots sing, and are not Protestants, not anything."

"I am more sorry to see some die who not anything about a church are care. Those curse priests, and want nothing to be with religion. So when I open some chance it is to open my Testament and my prayer, from my prayer-book, for them. All will not pay listen to me some. Some do, and are happy."

"I was heard of some priests who say 'Grosso peccato!' ('a grave sin!') when they find those Protestant Bibles with some of us from America; but none priest has this said to me. . . . A priest ask to take my Testament. I said he could. See! He put on his canvas gloves first, before he took it, like a surgeon afraid of germ (not German) gets on rubber gloves. I do not know. What did he want it? He gave it back, about soon, and said some Latin or Spanish. Not a chaplain."

"I got a bit of America on my Testament cover pasted, which is a flag, a small one. . . . They call us George Washingtons, we from America."

What Is Worship?

"To sit quiet in a pew in the house of God is not all of worship. A man's body may be in a pew and his mind and heart be a thousand miles away. Worship is concentration. Body, mind, soul fixed on God, communing with God: that is true worship. The Spirit comes into the heart of the worshipper, and brings the things of God to him. He prays, and praises, and becomes conscious of God. The truth is applied by the spirit to the individual heart, and the worshipper becomes conscious that he has been sitting in a heavenly place with Jesus Christ."

Letters to the Editor

DENMARK, SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN AND PRUSSIA.

Mr. Editor: One sees much in the papers nowadays about the lost provinces of France, Alsace-Lorraine, and as the President says, it is a question in which we are vitally interested as well as Germany. There is, however, a similar question on which Americans are not so well informed, yet which must come up for settlement. It is the question of the lost provinces of Denmark, Schleswig-Holstein. It is the old story of "Might makes right" and that small nations have no right to existence. Prussia tried to take them in 1848, and incited rebellion, but the rebels and Prussia were beaten in a three years' war. In 1864 and '65 the attempt succeeded when two powerful nations, Prussia and Austria, combined to rape Denmark. It was merely one of Bismarck's unholy schemes to prepare the way for war with Austria.

Take a map and look at the northern part of Germany on that little peninsula, and it will not take one long to see that the names of cities and towns are Danish, only the ending "borg" has been changed to "burg." The Kiel Canal is on stolen Danish territory. In fact, clear down to Hamburg the territory is Danish. Centuries ago great earthworks were thrown up to protect the Danes from the fierce German tribes. These earthworks, called "Dannevirke," may be seen to-day. Holstein, the Danes are not so keen about to-day, because it has been Germanized long ago, and originally was settled by "Frisians," or as we know them, Hollanders. Schleswig, however, is Danish to the core, and for nearly fifty years has been ground under Prussian kultur. Prussia promised that province should go back to Denmark whenever the people should, by popular vote, indicate such to be their desire. But Prussia has taken care that vote never should be taken. It is an interesting fact that the famous saying, "A scrap of paper," originated with Bismarck, when receiving a delegation of Danes from Schleswig he abruptly broke off the reminder as to Prussia's promise with the words, "It is nothing but a scrap of paper." In Fabricius' history of Denmark, the last words are these: "The north Schleswig population endure the bitter struggle for national existence in firm trust that the final word has not yet been spoken by history. The unanimity and concord there is a shining example and a prophetic voice for the Danish people."

Germany gives the official population of Danes in these provinces as 162,000, but these figures are subject to suspicion; the fact is there are nearer 200,000. In this war the Danes of these provinces have suffered more in proportion than any other part of Germany, yes, more than Alsace-Lorraine, because there many soldiers have deserted to France. The awful list of killed and missing seems to show that it is Germany's intention to kill off Danish sentiment. Denmark is a little country with only three million, but her heart and soul is with the allies. To enter the war would mean a second Belgium. The President has said that each nationality must have the right to work out its own destiny. In the light of these words Danes everywhere lift up their hearts, and believe the final word of history is soon to be spoken, for no peace would be just without the return of Schleswig to Denmark, and the shadow of fear taken from that little country.

THE SELECTION OF NEGRO SUFFRAGAN-BISHOPS.

(Abridged.)

Mr. Editor: * * * We plead for a change of method in the selection of negro Suffragan-Bishops. It is not the sincerity, or good intentions, of the white Bishops which are questioned. Such are the conditions of life that apart from the ripest experience of the negro priesthood, as a whole, such cannot always prudently and wisely make selection of the best men to work among and for another race. What we suggest is most simple, but we believe, in view of the actual situation, is the most satisfactory method that can be pursued.

Let any Bishop who is seriously thinking of utilizing the services of a negro Suffragan-Bishop, address a proper communication to each and every colored priest in the country, who has been in the priesthood for fifteen or more years, and invite from him the names of three colored clergymen, respectively, his first, second and third choice for the office of a Bishop. When he shall have tabulated the results of the canvass he will be better situated for making his selection. By such a method, responsibility is thrown upon the colored priesthood, and as it is this same priesthood that, humanly speaking, must make the attempt successful, it should be given a fair opportunity to demonstrate its zeal in this particular matter.

* * * Certainly, no harm can come by a trial of the method we have suggested. On the contrary, we believe that the greatest good will be accomplished for the whole work, the country over, by means of such a method in the selection of Suffragan-Bishops to work among the colored race.

The Great Commission

With Bishop Lloyd to Liberia.

Since Bishop Lloyd sailed for Africa many Church folk must have been studying their Atlases and Gazetteers, and so feel better acquainted with Liberia than ever before. Some may have read the book on the little republic, "Liberia," by Francis Starr, professor in the University of Chicago, published in that city in 1915; some have sent to the library at the Church Missions House and borrowed from its shelves one of the quaint old volumes, "History of the African Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church," by Mrs. E. F. Henning (1849); "Day Dawn in Africa," by Mrs. Anna M. Scott (1858); others have looked through files of missionary reports and The Spirit of Missions; and all with the same intent, that when Bishop Lloyd comes home with his story they shall be the better able to appreciate what he will have to tell. And we cannot doubt that as their knowledge of Liberia, of its past, its present, its future, has increased, their prayers have been more constant for Bishop Lloyd, for Archdeacon Schofield, his companion, and for the mission to which they have gone.

The latest review of the field appeared in an article by Miss M. S. Ridgely, of Cape Mount, which was printed in two sections in The Spirit of Missions for July, 1917, pp. 501-503, and October, pp. 716, 717, and which sketched the mission from her twelve years' acquaintance.

Before Bishop Lloyd sailed another woman conversant with the West Coast was consulted, and Miss Woodruff's calm, matter of fact statements were reassuring to friends to whom the words "West Coast" represent certain illness and much risk. A woman who has ten times crossed the Atlantic and spent five terms in Liberia should know something of what she speaks. "Africa is not at all terrible as Africa," was Miss Woodruff's verdict. "Under present conditions Bishop Lloyd may not be able to do all he would like and could do at other times, but there is no reason why he should not be comfortable." "Every one does not have the fever; after five years Miss Conway has just had her first at all serious attack." "People imagine a great deal." "Provide for both warm and cool weather." "Be careful, and use common sense." What good advice for visitors to new places, even not Africa!

A warm welcome, kind care, friendly suggestions for health and comfort, all these might be expected; but rides by canoe, ox cart or hammock must be depended on for the interior, the uncertain, infrequent steamer for the coast, unless—and the chance seemed most uncertain—the mission launch, "John Payne," were not out of commission.

Our latest letter from Mrs. Moort at Bromley, twelve miles up the St. Paul's River, gives a cheering glimpse of what our Commission to Liberia may find.

"The eighth year of our school life opens with a large enrollment of girls. The farm clearing has been extended, and there is prospect of a good yield of breadstuffs. The kitchen garden, too, promises good results, for the girls, with the matron, have spent much time in planting and caring for cucumbers, tomatoes, string beans, egg plants, collards and okra. The store-rooms, cooking, bread-making, laundry, dormitories, in fact, the entire building, are under the care of the matron and her young assistant, who are indefatigable in training the girls in useful ways. We have a Guild and Chancel Society, and the girls are being taught to care for the chapel at Bromley. The Bible and Prayer Book lessons are carefully kept up. The girls are improving in singing and are learning to give more expression to the beautiful words they sing. I am hoping that a class will be ready for confirmation when we are again privileged to have a Bishop with us."

When Mrs. Moort thus wrote she did not dream that Bishop might be Bishop Lloyd, and among the happiest experiences of his visit must be a confirmation such as this.

Japanese Y. M. C. A. Sends Deputation to American and Allied Armies.

Bringing a gift of $10,000 to aid the Y. M. C. A. in this country—$5,000 of this sum having been contributed by the emperor and empress of Japan on Christmas Eve as an expression of appreciation of the splendid work done by the Y. M. C. A. in the Japanese army at the time of the Russo-Japanese war—Major-General N. Hibiki, of the Imperial Japanese Army, and chief of the Japanese Y. M. C. A. deputation to the allied armies, presented greetings to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in New York City, at the meeting of the Administrative Committee on January 10th.

Major-General Hibiki emphasized the importance of the Christian leadership of Japan in the Orient, and urged the necessity for missionary work in that country. "For," said he, "if we win Japan for Christ, we win Asia."

The deputation of the Japanese Y. M. C. A., which Major-General Hibiki represents, has been sent to the allied armies and will visit the camps here and in Europe and also the British, French and Italian Army headquarters. They have brought flags and gifts from Japan which they will distribute in the various centers.

Major-General Hibiki was chief of the commissariat during the Russo-Japanese war. He has been a director of the Y. M. C. A. for many years, and his interpreter, Mr. K. Yamamoto, is Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Tokyo. General Hibiki stated that there are already many Christians in the administrative departments of the Japanese government and high in positions of responsibility. When these numbers can be multiplied two or threefold, he says, the international policies of Japan will certainly become Christian.

Deaconess Hargreaves' Work Among Igorots.

General Leonard Wood, writing to a friend concerning the work done by Deaconess Hargreaves among the Igorots at Basao in the Bontoc District of the Philippine Islands, says:

"I have personal knowledge of Deaconess Hargreaves' excellent work in the Philippines. She has rendered a long, brave and unselfish service and one which has been of very real value to all who have come under her kindly and intelligent supervision, and her example of courage, self-sacrifice and devotion to duty is something which we can all copy with profit."

Church Intelligence

Meeting of the Executive Committee of The Board of Missions.

The Executive Committee of the Board of Missions met in the Church Missions House, New York, on January 8, 1918. There was a small representation present owing, no doubt, to the interrupted transportation facilities.

The Treasurer's report for November and December showed a net decrease over the same months last year of $24,155. This may be accounted for by the fact that these were the first two months of the year, whereas in 1916 the year closed October 1.

From the domestic field we received and acted upon the resignations of Mrs. S. W. Small, of North Dakota; Miss Elizabeth Roscoe, of Oklahoma; Miss E. D. Whitmore, of Tennessee, and Deaconess F. B. Affleck, of Utah. Miss Nellie Freeman was appointed in place of Mrs. Small, and Miss Katrina E. Patterson in place of Miss Roscoe.

Deaconess Emma J. Smith was appointed, at the request of the Bishop-elect of Salina, for work in that district.

Gratifying news was received from the Bishop of West Virginia that the Diocese would try to get along without the extra $200 appropriation made for negro work in May of last year. The Board expressed its great appreciation of this act.

Under the authority given it by the board, the Executive Committee granted an appropriation of $5,000 from the Undesignated Legacies for St. Mark's Colored School, Birmingham, Ala.; $1,000 for a new mission building at Fresno, Cal., in the District of San Joaquin; and $3,000 for a church at Lake Andes, District of South Dakota. A further distribution of the Undesignated Legacies will be taken up at the February meeting of the Board.

A resolution had been received from the Synod of the Province of New England asking the Board to consider basing its appointment for the Dioceses on their current expenses rather than on gross receipts. The Board has considered many times the desirability of basing the apportionment on current expenses. This has also been considered by the Committees on Apportionment each year ever since the adoption of the apportionment plan. They have always agreed that the apportionment for General Missions should bear a direct relation and proportion to the gross receipts for all purposes in each Diocese. Even should the Board consider it desirable to base the apportionment on current expenses, a serious difficulty would be found in the fact that the Parishes and Missions, and therefore the Dioceses and Districts, make such varying annual reports to their Conventions and include under "current expenses" such different classes of items that it would be unjust and impracticable to attempt at the present time at least to base the apportionment to the Dioceses and Districts for General Missions upon "current expenses."

After any standard form of reporting has been recommended by the Commission on Business Methods, and adopted and acted upon by all the Dioceses, it might be possible to make such a change, if then thought best.

The Board continued the arrangement with the Diocese of Washington for the employment of the Rev. David W. Curran as special representative in the Diocese and Province of Washington for another year.

From the foreign field, the resignations of Miss Margaret C. Graves from the Philippines, and the Rev. Edward K. Thurlow from Anking, were received and accepted.

A new pay table and pension scheme for native Bible women in the District of Shanghai was adopted.

Bishop Suffragan A. C. Thomson and the Rev. G. F. Rogers, of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, were present and spoke in behalf of the industrial school and farm for mountain children and homeless boys, desiring an appropriation of $10,000 to build a power and heating plant in order to make available new buildings which would increase the accommodations of the school by providing for 120 additional boys. This matter was referred to the next meeting of the Executive Committee for careful consideration.

Meeting of Synod of the Second Province, New York, January 8.

The feature of the Provincial Synod of the Second Province, meeting in New York last week, was the spirit running through it that the Church in the Province and in the nation must bring its methods up to date. It must get hold of the common man. It must change its plans for the better. Many things that have been are not as good as they ought to be. Hugging of them must stop. Such sentiments came out repeatedly in the discussions, but they were even more apparent in the remarks one heard between sessions.

One Archdeacon said:

"The Church must modernize herself. She must distinguish between essentials of the faith, which are to be held, and non-essentials that are mere churchly ways and of no particular value. Men as men must be come up with, poor and rich, broad and middle class. It is not a question of union with other bodies as back numbers as many of the methods of the Church, and as weighted down with history as we are, but one of union with men as they are. Our boys are going to France. That is, they are going into the greatest school of human experience, the supreme test of spiritual faith. If the Church marks time while they are away, and does not come somewhere near meeting these men half way on their return, they will have small use for the Church. And I cannot blame them."

The Cathedral, Synod Hall, Bishop's House and Deanery are heated from one central plant, and the plant was put to the severest test. The Christmas festival, when the Cathedral was filled, there was not a particle of heat. Bishop Greer got on for days with heat in only two rooms. On the opening night of the Synod, with a dinner in the undercroft of Synod Hall, there was little heat and the meeting, planned for the hall itself, was held around the tables with members and guests wearing their wraps. Coal was not to be bought, and the heating plant was not built for such weather.

A striking feature of the Council addresses was the talk of Bishop Lines, President of the Synod, and best business Bishop in the Church. He analyzed finances, memberships and other data, including gifts, and set forth in the limelight the real operations of Church men, especially men. His address was much discussed, and attracted attention of business men in and out of the Church. The story is familiar—much talk by laymen and small performance, many appeals for money and small average gifts, scores of criticisms that the Church does not do and few willing to recognize they are the Church and must themselves do, thousands trying to work in Europe and forgetting the home base. Commenting upon it, Bishop Greer referred to President Wilson's address to Congress, and added that "the leaven of democracy is working in the Church."

Resolutions were adopted calling for equal pay for equal work, whether by women or by men, standing firm on child labor, rejoicing over Palestine being in British hands, condemning those who would exploit food or fuel, and squarely favoring the early adopting of the amendment to the national constitution forbidding the manufacture and sale of whiskey and beer. It seemed to be the belief that at an early date women will be admitted to convention and Council. The date of future Council meetings was changed to October.

Army and Navy Scriptures.

Immediately on the entrance of the United States into the world war, the American Bible Society prepared special editions of the Bible, the New Testament, the Book of Proverbs, the Book of Psalms, and the Gospel according to St. John, for the especial need of the soldiers and sailors. These were bound in khaki or khaki-colored cloth, or a blue cloth where that color was preferred for the navy. These volumes all had in them a page for the name, address and service, and another page for memoranda.

Between May first and December thirty-first, 1917, the society has sent out, in addition to all its ordinary and regular work, 1,232,463 copies of these special army and navy editions. Funds to care for the expenses connected with this distribution are now being solicited.

Soldiers Build Church.

The first church built by the soldiers at any army camp in the United States is now in course of construction at Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg. The funds for the material and the work are both provided by Colonel Cornelius Vanderbilt, One Hundred and Second Engineers. The plans show that it will be a handsome structure. Dr. Horace R. Fell, formerly rector of St. Alban's Church, Highbridge, N. Y., is chaplain of the One Hundred and Second Engineers.

The Rev. A. S. Thomas Accepts Call to Columbia.

The people of Cheraw, without regard to Church affiliations, regret very much the resignation of the Rev. A. S. Thomas, as rector of St. David's Church. Mr. Thomas has been rector of this church for over nine years, and has, by his devotion to duty, his exceptional ability as a preacher, and his good mixing qualities, won for himself universal popularity. He has done a great work among the poor, not only in, but out of his congregation. He planned and built the new church a few years ago, which stands as a monument to his faithful and untiring efforts. He was captain of the Home Guards, recently organized, and Chairman of the County Committee on Food Conservation. Mr. Thomas has accepted the call from the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbia, where he will give special attention to work among the soldiers of Camp Jackson.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

All-Day Conference of Woman's Auxiliary.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Richmond Convocation of the Diocese of Virginia convened in all-day Conference in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Wednesday, January 9, with Miss Louisa Davis, Diocesan President, in the chair, who gave as the aim of the gathering on that occasion that "we feel a personal responsibility for impressing others with a realization of the great need of mankind for Christ in this crisis of the world's history."

To this end many pertinent questions were presented and discussed, resulting in enthusiastic expression and conference of opinions designed to broaden and awaken increased interest in the local branches.

Mrs. Osgood, Educational Secretary, urged the need of greater information which leads to more active interest and intelligent understanding of the Mission problem.

Miss Sallie Dean spoke in behalf of the "Mission Study Class," pleading the formation of more classes, and it is to be deplored that all of our branches do not avail themselves of this great privilege.

Mrs. C. W. Culp gave a short talk on Box Work, which is growing, and is truly a strong call of humanity which is no small factor or unimportant one in our work.

Miss Neely, the leading speaker of the day, gave a very fine definition of Missions, wonderfully interesting, enlightening and helpful, expanding particularly on work in Japan, its influence and results upon that nation where she has been very successfully putting forth her energies for fifteen years.

Miss Randolph presented the cause of Thrift Stamps, ably advocating their sale, and, while it is not strictly in our line of work, at this time when war and war work are all-absorbing topics it was well timed and welcome.

The discussions, addresses and conference in general were most helpful, and we trust every Auxiliary member present may take home for active service the enthusiasm and information gained at its sessions.

The ladies of St. Paul's who so kindly ministered to our needs deserve warm praise and thanks for such consideration.

M. B. C.

The Richmond Clericus held its annual election of officers at the meeting on Monday morning, January 14, the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, rector of Grace Church, being elected President, and the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Forest Hill, re-elected Secretary. Addresses were made by the Hon. R. Carter Scott, in regard to the War Commission's appeal for $500,000; by Dr. Ennion G. Williams, in regard to the method of administration of the Holy Communion, and by Mr. Royall E. Cabell in regard to the Government's War Saving and Thrift Stamp campaign. The Rev. J. J. Gravatt, Jr., rector of the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, Ky., was a visitor to the Clericus.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, has been presented with full equipment for a chaplain with an ambulance unit by the members of his congregation. Dr. Bowie, who expects to sail shortly for the war zone as chaplain of the McGuire Hospital Unit, has been granted an indefinite leave of absence by the vestry of St. Paul's.

Brandy Station: A handsome brass cross was presented to Christ Church, Brandy Station, by Mrs. Greanor Neale, of Richmond, and Mrs. J. C. Miller, of Brandy Station, as a memorial to their father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Louis P. Nelson.

During his lifetime, Mr. Nelson took an active interest in the work of the Parish, and gave the land on which the church and rectory stand.

On the Sunday before Christmas a service flag was placed in the church by the rector, the Rev. Alexander Galt.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, Grace Church, Elkins, regretfully said goodbye to his friends in the Northwestern Convocation, as he has been called to act as city missionary of Richmond, Virginia. Dr. Montague, while regretting to leave the congregations at Elkins and Davis, and his many friends in the "dear old Diocese of West Virginia," considered that the position he has accepted offers great opportunities for Christian work. He has done good work at Elkins and Davis, and will be much missed by both congregations. Mr. Montague acquired quite a reputation through his very efficient administration of the affairs of the Deaf, Dumb and Blind Asylum at Romney before he took up the work of the ministry at Elkins and Davis.

Wheeling: St. Matthew's Men's Club has been re-organized, and has entered into the work mapped out with enthusiasm. Their intention is to keep before them the comfort, and pleasure of the boys at the front and in the training camps. As a beginning, twenty barrels of apples were sent to Camp Lee, Virginia. Hundreds of magazines, books, etc., have been collected for shipment to the soldiers. Over thirty young men have gone from St. Matthew's Parish into the service of their country, and there are eighteen names on the service flag of St. Luke's, while St. Andrew's has four names on the roll of honor.

Gift to Sheltering Arms Hospital: Some years ago, some Churchmen on Cabin Creek, Kanawha County, under the leadership of Rev. P. N. Macdonald, now rector of Trinity Church, Morgantown, raised $180 toward the building of a church at Carbon, in Fayette County. The building has never really been begun, and after conferring with Bishop Gravatt, the money has been turned over to the Sheltering Arms Hospital. We must not forget the needs of this hospital. There is a danger that in responding to the numerous calls from the many organizations doing war relief work we may do this. Who that knows the history of this noble work can fail to be struck with the unselfishness which has characterized the management during all the years of its existence. Founded in 1886, by the Rt. Rev. George W. Peterkin, first Bishop of the Diocese of West Virginia, it has grown from a very small beginning—thirty-five patients in the first year of its existence—until, in 1916, three thousand patients received its benefits, only twenty-five of whom were connected with the Episcopal Church. These people came from eighteen different nationalities and twelve religious denominations. "Protestant Episcopal in its burden because founded by that Church, undenominational in its benefits, because for all patients of all Creeds, nationalities and colors." The appeal is being made for linen, and the Woman's Auxiliary is doing what it can to meet the need. In these days of large, very large, requests, $1,500 asked for seems small.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Ordination: Bishop Greer ordained in the Cathedral on Sunday, January 13, the Rev. Leighton Williams, D. D., for many years a Baptist pastor in New York, an educator of prominence in the country, and a brother of Mr.

Mornay Williams, one of the best known of New York Baptist laymen. The Rev. Dr. Williams came into the Church a year ago, and has worked as a layman near New Paltz, which is near his home on the Hudson.

Two new rectors of Washington Heights parishes are the Rev. Dr. G. A. Carstensen, of Holyrood, and the Rev. William T. Walsh, of St. Luke's, the former succeeding the late Rev. Dr. Stuart Crockett, and the other the Rev. Dr. G. Ashton Oldham, who is now rector of St. Ann's, Brooklyn. The Rev. Dr. Carstensen, once rector in Indianapolis, for some years rector of Christ Church, Riverdale, and long takes up a word that is shrdluonto prominent in the Church Congress, takes up a work that is provided with ample equipment and is located in one of the best parts of upper Manhattan. The Rev. Mr. Walsh comes from splendid service at St. Mary's in the Bronx, his first parish after having been received into the Church from the Roman Catholic Paulist Fathers. St. Luke's Parish is closely associated with the history of Alexander Hamilton, its rectory being the Hamilton homestead, and is one of the large and growing Manhattan Parishes.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. R. E. Gribbin held his last service at St. John's Church, Wilmington, on Epiphany Day and left on January 8 to take up his new duties as volunteer chaplain under the Church War Commission at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C.

The Rev. L. T. Hardin, after serving for several weeks as locum tenens at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Wilmington, has returned to his Parish at Clinton, N. C.

The Rev. Thos. N. Brincefield, of Warren, Arkansas, has accepted work in Gates and Hertford Counties.

The Rev. Basil Walton is temporarily in charge of Aurora, Bonner-ton and Edward in Beaufort County.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

The New Orleans Item, a few days before Christmas, carried a full page of attractive matter, "published in the interest of religion by leading citizens of New Orleans and with the special co-operation of five churches" of the city, among them being the Free Church of the Annunciation, the Rev. Clarence N. Bispham, rector, and Trinity Church, the Rev. Robert S. Coupland, D. D., rector.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

Calvary Church, Memphis, the Rev. Dr. W. D. Buckner, rector, is the first in the city to display a regular service flag for the members of its congregation now in the service of the great war. This flag, which contains thirty-seven stars, hangs below the Stars and Stripes. Thirty-four of the thirty-seven are commissioned officers, and all branches of the service are represented.

In the entrance of the church is also placed the Honor Roll, containing the names of the men represented by the stars in the service flag.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The War Commission of the Church is urging the Bishop and Clergy in all the Dioceses to organize their congregations in such way as to secure a generous and imaginative response to the Commission's appeal for $500,000 in the offering of January 27th.

The success of the appeal will depend upon the publicity given it. If the Church leaders present the matter to the people enthusiastically, the money will be given in a way that will make the gifts and the giving both a blessing.

One of the wonderful results of this time of war has been the way in which its great issues have waked in good people an altogether unprecedented generosity. We are beginning really to appreciate what we have often not had the daring to believe—that our Christian congregations can do in the Master's name far greater things than they have ordinarily attempted, and that the spirit and power of the congregations increase when they are faced with large, unselfish challenges. The gifts which are being released now may well expand for all time to come the Church's conception of what can be done when a great motive is made clear.

The ratification of the prohibition amendment to the national constitution seems to be proceeding rapidly. The legislature of Mississippi was the first to act. Then the governor of Virginia, in his message to the newly convened legislature, recommended the ratification of the amendment on the ground of the admirable results in Virginia of prohibition. Now, as we go to press, it is reported that the legislature of Kentucky has voted to help make the nation dry. "Et tu, Brute!"

The Synod of the Province of Sewanee endorsed these recommendations of the Committee on Country Church and Rural Life, and if they are followed out, there will be dawning a new day of power for the country church:

"1. That each Diocese of the Province be urged to provide a Committee on Country Church and Rural Life, either in connection with or independent of the Diocesan Commission of Social Service.

"(a) To investigate and report on the status of the Church in rural districts.

"(b) To make a study of the country church and rural life problem and its literature.

"(c) To make recommendations of such methods as may be adaptable to the various local needs revealed by their investigation and study.

"2. That Clergy and other workers engaged in country church work be urged to make local surveys of their various fields of labor, ascertaining the social, educational, economic, moral and religious conditions as they exist and describe in a report to their Diocesan or the Provincial Committee what they are doing to meet these conditions.

"3. That the Theological Department of the University of the South, within the Province of Sewanee, as well as the General Theological Seminary and other seminaries of the Church, be urged to supply in their libraries a country life bookshelf, and that the attention of their students for Holy Orders be called to the importance and the possibilities of this subject.

"Recommendations were also made for a campaign of publicity and education through the Church press, and the Sewanee Summer School. This should apply also to the Gulfport, Blue Ridge and St. Mary's Conferences.

"It is also suggested by the committee that:

"1. Every Diocesan committee make a map of the Diocese, showing the live and decadent rural churches; the circuits of the rural Clergy, and the rural strategic points within the Diocese, whether served by the Church or not.

"2. That the Clergy and lay workers in rural sections make maps of their respective fields, showing location of church, families and members, the other religious bodies at work in the same field and their membership, and the unchurched families or individuals in their communities.

"3. That the Clergy and lay workers co-operate with State and secular agencies for advancing the community welfare. State Departments of Education, Agriculture and Board of Health; County Board of Education, State University and College of Agriculture. Write and find out how to help the community through these agencies.

"The function of the Church in rural sections is:

"To teach fundamental religion.

"To act as inspirer and leader in the cultural life of the community.

"To be the social unifier and center of the community.

"The problem of the country church is the fulfilling of her function in terms of the fundamental needs of the people."

Of very exceptional value is the "War Service Bulletin, No. 5," on "Labor Problems of War Time," just issued by the Joint Commission on Social Service.

Of it the Secretary of the Commission writes:

"It is the aim of this new bulletin, as you will see from the foreword, to call attention to some important matters which have been comparatively ignored amid the pressure of war-time activities of the Church, as well as of the nation. The experience of England in the early days of the war, which is dealt with somewhat fully in the first part of the bulletin, points a lesson for America. It is most necessary that the Church at large should be thinking of these problems, and especially that the various social service agencies of the Church and their leaders should be cognizant of them. Though doubtless much of the material contained in the bulletin enclosed is familiar to you, it may not be so to all the members of your Social Service Commission, or to your Clergy in general. We hope, therefore, that you can promote the circulation of this bulletin.

"Of the first four of our War Service Bulletins we distributed gratis upwards of 16,000 copies. This last bulletin, containing more material than any previous issue, has cost us ten or eleven cents per copy, and we are setting that price on it—though this is not intended to interfere with its circulation in cases where the price is not available."

The scope of the bulletin may be seen from this paragraph from the foreword and from the table of contents, as follows:

"The war has on the whole aggravated rather than palliated the problem of industry. In a world-wide struggle of democracy against autocracy it is increasingly evident that in the interests not only of efficiency but of fair play more substantial justice must be rendered to the manual toilers, on whose willing efforts our military success ultimately depends, than has ever been rendered to them in time of peace. There is evidence, despite the at times almost hysterical pre-occupation with our soldiers and their problems, of an increasing disposition to recognize the needs of the "second line of defense," which really so far outnumbered our actual fighting forces in the ratio of ten or fifteen to one. Even should the war be protracted to a point where our present military establishment would be increased from approximately two to five or six millions, or even more, there will still in all probability be upwards of twenty million men and women, if not older children, engaged in "productive" processes. It is the interests of this large number of our fellow-citizens which the nation has sometimes been in danger of forgetting in its endeavors to train and to safeguard from noxious influences the soldiers and sailors who are to fight America's battles on land and sea."

Second Sunday After the Epiphany:

The first lesson in the morning records the fulfilment of the prophecy of captivity contained in last Sunday's lesson, together with the prophetic historian's analysis of the reasons why it came to pass. The king of Assyria was the instrument of the divine discipline; and it was due to the fact that the children of Israel though redeemed from Egypt and enabled to occupy the Promised Land for the purpose of weeding out false religions and planting therein the worship of the true God and the practice of His righteousness, had themselves yielded to their heathen environment. The material fact that Assyria was stronger than Israel did not, in the mind of the prophets, explain what happened. The Commission on Revision of the Lectionary calls attention to the value of thus bringing prophecy and fulfilment into juxtaposition: prophecy of captivity last Sunday; captivity this Sunday, and we modestly invite comparison with the way in which prophecy and fulfilment are separated and confused in other Lectionaries. For the New Testament lesson we have used St. Peter's warning not to treat heedlessly or with mocking contempt the teaching of God's prophets with reference to the final judgment upon this world. St. Peter harks back to the judgment inflicted by the flood (used by the New Lectionary in Advent of year 1), thus endorsing the principle that historical instances of judgment are to be taken as guarantees that God will continue to do what He says through His prophets that He will do. Connection with Epiphany season in general is to be found (a) in the fact that judgment is part and parcel of divine manifestation, though in the Prayer Book assigned to the fifth and sixth Sundays after the Epiphany; and (b) in the relation of the Church to the Gentile world. The Church to-day must be true to its mission and serve that world or itself go into captivity to that world and its sins. Moreover, the very Collect for peace on this Sunday is based upon faith in God's providential ordering of this world in matters both temporal and spiritual, and owes its origin to the "stormy times of Gregory the Great," when "barbarian invaders were harrying the empire" (Sanders: Message of the Church). Again, the "Bethphany" of the Christ to and through a transfigured home life (gospel for day) receives comment in the analysis of social conditions by Amos and Hosea, used to lead up on week days to this particular Sunday.

In the evening, our Lord's manifestation as Son in baptism and temptation (following on the boyhood of last Sunday's gospel) is preceded by Isaiah's prophecy of the Messiah as endowed by and working through the Spirit. In the week-days, the history of the upper Kingdom is concluded by the origin of the Samaritans (Monday), and on Tuesday, we go back and pick up the thread of lower Kingdom, which will be carried forward to the Babylonian captivity and beyond. St. John's Gospel is continued in the morning and Ephesians read in the evening for the teaching on missions.

C. B. WILMER.

The Bible.

The Bible is the record of the Revelation of God made to man. That is what it professes to be, that is how it claims to be read, and that is how we must judge it. It is not a text book of history or science; it has but one purpose and end, to show forth the revelation of God through the ages. In so doing it records also man's perception of God during the same time. God sent His teachers and prophets; men learned from these in just the same way that men learn now. The Bible gives the record of the teaching of the prophets and the failures, as well as the successes, of men to receive and act upon this teaching. More than this, God spoke through His prophets unto His people in the language they could understand; for instance, God took a Semitic tribe and revealed unto them His essential unity and Himself as the Creator of all things, but in so doing He did not disclose to them modern science as man has come to learn it. He took what they knew and accepted; He spiritualized their crude ideas. Taking a belief in the creation of the world that required many gods, He took away from it all debasing thoughts and declared through Abraham and Moses, His servants, that "all things were made by Him, whether they be things on earth or things in heaven." This is the great lesson of the first chapter of Genesis. As St. Paul tells us, "the Law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ." The Bible, therefore, is the record of God's educating men into the full revelation of Himself in Christ Jesus. So in reading and studying the Bible we must consider the time and conditions under which each book was written. We must not expect to find the ethics of David as thoroughly Christian as those of St. John; the knowledge of a child is not that of the full grown man.—The Witness.

Two Attitudes.

In speaking of the dearth of candidates for the ministry these two thoughts come uppermost. Parents are directing the aspirations of their boys into worldly rather than distinctively churchly channels of recompense, be-

Collect for St. Paul's Day.

O God, who, through the preaching of the blessed Apostle St. Paul, hast caused the light of the Gospel to shine throughout the world; Grant, we beseech Thee, that we, having his wonderful conversion in remembrance, may show forth our thankfulness unto Thee for the same, by following the holy doctrine which he taught; through Jesus Christ our Lord. cause they count the pursuit of money as the highest good of life; and parents who are sympathetic towards the ministry as a vocation for their sons are fearful of presenting the claims of God as superior to the claims of mammon lest they be responsible for committing their boys to a life-long martyrdom of predilection. As a further elaboration of the falsehood of both these attitudes we may say: Nothing is more needed by people today than a revival of those spiritual ideals which played so large a part in their earlier history, and a re-appraisal of the value of those soulful ideals which have apparently become obscured by the opportunities offered for material prosperity. It is still true that "the love of money is the root of all evil," and that one of the evils is the loss of the sense of the value of character above circumstance. Moreover, if the parent is the vice-regent of God, it is inconceivable that parental responsibility and opportunity should be discharged by emphasizing the demands of the human at the expense of the prerogatives of the divine. We must put first things first, and, seeing all things in their just proportions, play fair to all concerned; God, the Church and the child.—Canadian Churchman.

God Understands.

It is so sweet to know
When we are tired, and when the hand of pain
Lies on our hearts, and when we look in vain
For human comfort, that the heart
divine
Still understands these cares of yours and mine.
Not only understands, but day by day
Lives with us while we tread the earthly way,
Bears with us all our weariness, and feels
The shadow of the faintest cloud that steals
Across our sunshine, ever learns again
The depth and bitterness of human pain.

Abraham's Tent.

An aged man came late to Abraham's tent.

The sky was dark, and all the plain was bare,

He asked for bread; his strength was well-nigh spent,

His haggard look implored the tenderest care.

The food was brought. He sat with thankful eyes,

But spake no grace, nor bowed he toward the East.

Safe sheltered here from dark and angry skies,

The bounteous table seemed a royal feast.

But ere his hand had touched the tempting fare

The Patriarch rose, and, leaning on his rod—

"Stranger," he said, "dost thou not bow in prayer?"

Dost thou not fear, dost thou not worship God?"

He answered, "Nay." The Patriarch sadly said:

"Thou hast my pity. Go, eat not my bread."

Another came that wild and fearful night.

The fierce winds raged, and darker grew the sky;

But all the tent was filled with wondrous light,

And Abraham knew the Lord his God was nigh.

"Where is that aged man," the Presence said,

"That asked for shelter from the driving blast?"

Who made thy master of thy Master's bread?"

What right hadst thou the wanderer forth to cast?"

"Forgive me, Lord," the Patriarch answer made,

With downcast look, with bowed and trembling knee.

Ah me! the stranger might with me have stayed,

But, O my God, he would not worship Thee."

"I've borne him long," God said, "and still I wait, Couldst thou not lodge him one night within thy gate?"

"Tick! Tock! Tick! Tock!" reiterated the sitting room clock, with monotonous persistency, reminding those present that the time for retiring had past. But the farmer and his daughter stayed on regardless of the fleeting hours. Neither had spoken for an entire sixty minutes. The man reclined in a high-backed arm-chair oblivious to all else but his ugly blackened clay pipe. The daughter sat gazing listlessly into the fire, an open letter in her hand.

"'Tis eleven years ago to-night since mother died," she remarked sadly. A sudden strong gust of wind shook the door of the outside kitchen, making it creak dismally as it swayed, to and fro, on its rusty hinges. The old man stirred uneasily in his chair, and glanced nervously behind him.

"Yes, it's eleven years to-night," he replied, with an effort to appear at ease. Both again lapsed into silence. Presently the old man glanced across at his daughter and said: "Who did the letter come from?"

"From James Cooke, father."

"From James Cookt, eh? Why, it's many a long day since you heard from him, Bessie. What's he been doing with himself? He's been gone some years."

"He wrote to tell me that he's just been married, father," the woman replied. Although she tried to speak calmly and bravely, a sympathetic ear would have discovered the sound of unshed tears in her tremulous voice.

"Married, eh?" the old man remarked with a chuckle. "Well, well, the Book says it is not good that a man should be alone. He was a nice young fellow. I hope he has found a good wife."

"So do I, father," replied the daughter very gently.

"Bessie!"

"Yes, father."

"It has been a puzzle to me that you and James never made it up. I always thought he was fond of you. But women are queer-fish. They let a good man go, and pine after a fool who doesn't care a button for them." Bessie made no reply. But she read the letter through carefully for a second time.

"My Dear Bessie,—I have taken you at your word. You said it was no use waiting. And I began to reckon it wasn't. So I married a little girl down here last year. It was so lonesome coming back night after night to cold, cheerless lodgings, with never a soul to smile at a man. And I'm fond of company, you know. I tried to bear up, and told myself that I had no right to marry any other woman but you. If I felt lonesome, why, you felt lonesome, too. And it wasn't your fault. Then, one night, coming home from chapel meeting, all of a sudden I took hold of her hand and asked her to marry me. That's how it all happened. And we were married two weeks ago to-day. She's a kind-hearted little thing, and can't seem to do enough for me. Good-bye, my dear friend. Don't think any less of me. My best respects to your father. Your sincere friend, James Cooke."

"Bessie!"

"Yes, father."

"What did you keep him hanging on for, all those years, if you didn't intend to marry him? I didn't like to say anything about it at the time. But now it's all past and gone. I must say you treated him badly. He was a good enough man for you, wasn't he?"

The woman's face twitched painfully. She answered in an almost inaudible whisper: "Yes, father, James was a very good man. But I could not marry him. That's all about it."

"You couldn't marry him? Why not?"

"I do not want to say any more about it, father. James is married now. And there's an end of the whole business."

"All right, Bessie! As you please. But the day will come when you won't have any one to look after you. And as you've been a kind girl to me, I'd like to see you comfortable with some good man before—before—" The old man stopped abruptly, and glanced up timidly at his daughter. But she didn't appear to have heard what he said. She sat staring at the blazing logs, thinking, thinking, thinking of the past and of possibilities now forever lost.

Six years ago James Cooke had come to make his last appeal to Bessie to marry him. He was employed on the railway and had received a good appointment in Omaha, and he came either to obtain her promise to marry him or to say good-bye. Six years ago. It seemed like six hundred. How hard he had striven to overcome her conviction that to marry him would be contrary to what she felt to be her duty toward her father.

"Let him come live with us," James had said.

"No," said Bessie, tenderly, "it would break his heart to leave the old farm. He'd never consent."

Then James Cooke, driven to desperation, cried angrily: "Seems to me he's a selfish old man. Parents are everlastingly talking about the duty of children. But they often forget that parents have duties."

"Hush, James! He never tried to make me stay. I never even spoke to him about it. I couldn't, you know, because I promised mother when she died that I would never leave him."

"Then you have quite made up your mind, have you?" he asked, in a strained voice.

"Yes, James. But don't speak unkindly to me. It is hard enough to let you go without having you angry with me." And with a sob she put her head on his shoulder. And he stroked her hair, and spoke a few, kind, gentle words of affection. Suddenly an overwhelming desire to choose the happier lot took possession of her. For an instant she wavered. Then with one supreme effort, she held herself erect, and cried: "Leave me, leave me now. Be a man! And God go with you."

He glanced into her eyes. He saw there was no hope.

"Good-bye, Bessie," he said, mournfully. Like one turned to stone she watched his retreating figure. "James!" she gasped in an agony of grief. "James! Come back!" But he was already far away. An hour later he left the village.

"Bessie, hand me down the Bible, please," said her father. Bessie walked over to the book-shelf, took down the book, and put it in the old man's hands. Slowly he turned over the pages until he came to the book of Proverbs. Then half aloud he read: "Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands."

"'Tis a wonderful book, Bessie, a wonderful book," he muttered. Then glancing up furtively at his daughter, he inquired in a tone of voice that sounded almost anxious: "Bessie, I've been a good father to you, haven't I?"

"Yes, father, you've always been good to me," she replied, evidently surprised at this unusual remark from her father, who had exacted so much and given so little in return. But then he was a lonely old man. He had never meant to be selfish and unreasonable, she thought.

"I wonder how you'll get along without me, Bessie," he continued. His voice shook perceptibly.

"Hush, father! You must not talk like that. You will live a long time yet."

The old man chuckled to himself. "I wasn't thinking of dying, Bessie," he remarked significantly.

"That's right, father. Why, you're a younger man than many a one half your age," she replied cheerfully.

"Do you think so? Do you think so, daughter?" A look of eager hope came into his eyes.

"Of course I do. Any one with half an eye could see that," she said in a tone of mild surprise.

"Bessie, I've got something I want to tell you. I've been trying to make up my mind for five weeks. But I never knew quite how to do it."

"What is it, father? You are not ill, are you?" she inquired anxiously.

"No, daughter! I never felt better in my life. By the way, how long is it since Jared Blake died?" he asked.

Bessie glanced up in astonishment.

"About four years, father," she said.

"What made you think of him?"

"I was just wondering. I met his widow to-day when I was down to the post-office. It seems he left her thirty thousand dollars with the farm."

"Did he, father? I am glad to hear it. She was a good, kind wife to him."

"So the neighbors tell me, so the neighbors tell me," he remarked hastily. He acted very self-conscious.

"What were you going to tell me just now, father?" Bessie asked.

"I—I—I was—going—to—tell you that I am going to marry Jared Blake's widow," he blurted out sheepishly. "I—just—wanted to know what you thought of her."

"Father!" Bessie cried. And her face lost all its healthy glow. She stood staring at him in a strange, vacant manner as though unable to realize what he meant.

"Well! well!" he ejaculated testily. "What have you got to say against it?"

"Nothing, father. Do whatever you think is for the best."

Both remained silent for a moment. The clock struck the midnight hour. The old man got up out of his chair.

"Reckon it's time to go to bed," he remarked.

"Yes, father. I reckon it's about sleeping-time," the woman answered wearily.

"I Press On."

The meaning of life will be determined not only by what we put into it and leave out of it, but also by what we emphasize. First things must be put first. Little things, good enough in their places, too often become evils when brought to the front and unduly enlarged. Jesus stood in a position to judge things aright. He could and did give a true estimate of the true worth of things. He knew the things that are of supreme worth, and He warns us time and again that if we neglect these things we do so at our eternal peril.

Jesus was never more in earnest than when He said, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all things else will be added unto you." If we would seek that Kingdom first, then we must strive to enter in. We must strive to conduct ourselves as sons and daughters of the living God. No one ever came nearer attaining this ideal than the Apostle Paul. And the reason that he attained such a high state of efficiency, as a follower of Jesus Christ, was because of the characteristic suggested in the words of the text—ambitious, "I press on."

Paul was ambitious to secure the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. He pressed on. No one mere man has done so much for the world through the Church as the Apostle Paul. He kept one aim steadily in mind. In his preaching he was determined to know nothing among them, "Save Jesus Christ and Him Crucified." In his public life his one desire was to finish his course with joy, and the ministry which he had received from the Lord. One increasing purpose ran through all his Christian career that he might serve Christ, know Christ and become like Christ. If we might select from His own writings a fitting inscription for his memorial, we could find it in the combination of these two expressions, "To me to live is Christ," "This one thing I do." His was a worthy ambition and he had a right to beseech us, "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ."—Ex.

For the Southern Churchman. The Man of Nazareth.

Grace Imogen Gish.

There was a Man of Nazareth
And everywhere He went
The people loved and followed Him
And worked in sweet content.

There was a Man of Nazareth
And little children learned
To nestle in His tender arms
And all things evil spurned.

There was a Man of Nazareth
So kind and good and sweet,
That where He walked the lilies bloomed
And bowed to kiss his feet.

Oh, Christ, Thou Man of Nazareth,
We need Thee so to-day.
Be Thou our Guide, our Helper, Friend,
Our everlasting Stay!

Personal Experience of God.

How pertinent in these days of bravery and self-sacrifice on the battle fields of Europe are those stirring words of the great statesman prophet, "The people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits!"

The most interesting portions of the Bible and of history are those which tell us about the people who knew God. There is a charm about these stories, a thrill about those biographies that never fail to move us when we read them. The shortest yet most profound biography ever written is this: "Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him." Who can describe the sweet aroma and the strong helpfulness of that life in daily communion with God?

Witness the great triumph of Noah, a preacher of righteousness to an atheistic age, who built an ark—the wonder of all beholders—to the saving of his house and the race. What but a deep, abiding knowledge of God could have kept him true and courageous in the face of scorn and ridicule? What but an intimate knowledge of God could have prompted Abraham to leave home and kindred to go to a strange land, to become the father of a multitude and of the faithful, the friend of God?

The story of Joseph is unequalled in all the literature of the world. Whence the charm, the sweetness, the fascination, the uplifting power of this simple, natural tale? Joseph knew God. His acquaintance had begun as a child running his father's errands, enduring his brother's scorn and envy; it had increased from year to year through all the trying vicissitudes of his adventurous life. Through suffering, through triumph, through submission, and through power, in the prison and on the throne, his intimacy with God remained the same.

It was given to Moses to talk with God face to face, reflecting the glory of God, because he had learned to companion with God; in the care of his godly mother, in the magnificent court of Pharaoh, in the silence of the desert tending the sheep, or transforming a rebellious race of slaves into a great nation, always was he on intimate terms with God.

David learned to know God; on the grassy hillside watching his sheep and drinking in the beauties of nature, composing and singing his deathless psalms to the music of his harp, reigning over God's people and leading them to victory over their foes; fleeing from Saul and Absalom; it mattered not when and where, even in the anguish of remorse and the bitterness of confession of sin, David knew God, and that is why we love to read the story of his life.

Elijah knew God, and that is why he could defy all the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel and score a victory for God against the entrenched forces of idolatry.

Through privation and suffering and anguish and cruel testing Job came into a blessed deeper intimacy with his Maker and gave to all succeeding generations a sublime example of loyalty to God in the face of a fiery furnace of trial.

Because of the majestic, beatific vision of God and the humbling vision of himself, Isaiah gave to the world the sublimest messages ever spoken or penned.

And Daniel lived in such intimate acquaintance with God that he was able to reveal God's secrets to men and foretell his purposes, to scorn the king's dainties, to come unharmed from the den of lions.

Jesus of Nazareth learned to know God at his mother's knee, from his devout foster father, in the Jewish schools, through the Old Testament, in the carpenter shop, among the doctors in the temple, in the silent watches on the mountain top; never man entered into such close and intimate and sacred relations with the Heavenly Father as he, and that is why he has influenced the world so profoundly and wrought such marvelous transformations among men.

What is the secret of the prodigious labors and herculean accomplishments of Paul? Is it not in the fact that he knew God and had a transforming vision of Christ which never left him?

Time would fail to speak of countless others since then who have achieved mighty victories through intimate acquaintance with God—Ridley, Craumer, Wycliffe, Huss, Knox, Luther, Calvin, Savonarola, David Livingstone, William Carey, Chinese Gordon, Frances Willard, D. L. Moody, Spurgeon, the Wesleys, Billy Sunday. Men have come to know God in the European war trenches, and women left behind have learned to know him through labor and anguish and prayer and tears.

Surrounded by such a cloud of witnesses, there comes to you and to me the call to intimate acquaintance with God, that power and strength and courage may enter into our souls to fight His battles and win His victories; for the "people that know their God shall be strong and do exploits."—Isaac B. Mershon, in Herald and Presbyter.

Efficiency for What.

A young man of twenty-four stepped into a business office in a large city and walked up to a desk where an elderly man sat examining a bundle of papers.

"Look at that, father!" the young man said with a smile of pride. "I've made nearly one hundred on my efficiency chart! What do you think of that?"

The business man looked up at his son with a smile and a feeling of pride at his appearance, and then his eye fell on the list of questions put by the efficiency bureau that had interested the young man to compete with many others for first place.

1. Are you physically sound and free from all trace of disease?
2. Can you apply yourself to mental labor without great fatigue?
3. Are you an exact mathematician?
4. Do you have any bad habits?
5. Would you be willing to employ yourself in a business that required honesty, quickness of judgment, keen intellect?
6. Are you quick to see and take advantage of a business opportunity?
7. Are you in debt? If so, how did you become so?
8. Do you have extravagant habits of dress, amusements, or social life?
9. Can you secure good letters of recommendation from business men in the city who know you?
10. How much money have you ever earned, and how did you earn it?

The father read the list and then, without a word, reached for a sheet of paper and put down the following:

1. Are you a Christian? Would you follow the teachings of Jesus if to do so should result in the loss of money and position?
2. Do you have some great cause of humanity at heart, and are you ready to give your heart's enthusiasm for it?
3. Are you as active and as useful in some church as you are in your business of money-making?
4. Do you pray and read the Bible daily?
5. Are you planning to do a man's part by sharing in the burden of good citizenship?

The father handed these questions to his son. The son read them, and his face paled and grew red by turns. He faltered. His father was a distinguished and deeply consecrated man who had lived consistently the life outlined in the questions. The son respected him as he respected no other man.

"Father," he said finally, in a low voice, "that is real efficiency. I am going to try to live up to it; but right now I cannot answer those questions honestly and pass. It will take me a long time to qualify."

"It will take you all your life," his father said, gravely.—Youth's Companion.

Times of Refreshing.

We do not often hear now of parochial missions. Why not? Surely there is need for special effort and prayer in these "last days." Other churches are bestirring themselves and calling their people to the confession of their sins and an opening of their souls' windows to let in the flood of light and grace the Blessed Spirit is waiting to bestow. He is waiting on us; let us respond promptly and gladly. Christ is knocking patiently at the door; we must open the door if we would have Him come in and "sup" with us, and "abide" in our hearts.—H. An Indoor Nutting Frolic.

Mamma had been telling us all about the jolly times she had when she was a little girl going a-nutting, until you could really imagine you were right there in the woods with her, gathering nuts.

"Was it anything like a picnic?" asked Molly.

"The very jolliest kind of a picnic," answered mamma. "All through the mellow golden weather of late September and the early part of October we were waiting, and by we, I mean not only the girls and boys, but all the furry squirrels too, for a visit from whom? can you guess?"

But we couldn't guess.

"Why, Jack Frost, to be sure. Then down the woodland paths, scattering the rustling leaves of red and gold, came a merry group of girls and boys—"

"And squirrels, mamma," interrupted Ruth.

"Yes, and squirrels, too, Ruth, but they take the time, usually, when the boys and girls are safe at home. Oh, yes, these little creatures of the woods are very wise, and keep a sharp lookout for the two-legged funny folk. These timid, bright-eyed squirrels are the gardeners of our wild woods, children; did you ever think of that?"

"But how, mamma?" asked Newel.

"They sow the seed, dearie, from which spring more nut-bearing trees, perhaps a stately oak or maybe a hickory tree."

"Wouldn't I just like to shinny up one of those trees and make the nuts fly!" cried Newel.

"Well," said mamma, "as you cannot go to the woods, suppose we do the next best thing and have an indoor nutting frolic!"

"How?" asked Newel rather soberly.

"Oh, I know how," laughed mamma, "and you will know bye and bye."

"When is bye and bye?" asked Molly.

"Let me see," returned mamma, "today is Thursday; say that bye and bye means Saturday, from three to five."

"It's a party!" Newel exclaimed.

"Good!" cried Molly.

"Goody-two-shoes!" cried Ruth, hopping up and down on one foot.

"Whom shall we invite, mamma?" I asked.

"You may each invite one little guest," answered mamma.

Now, perhaps you think mamma had given us an easy part, but when you have about 'leven intimate friends, as I have, and want to invite every single one of the 'leven, it is quite hard to decide on one. But with mamma's help, we finally chose. They were three girls and one boy who seldom get invited to parties.

When the guests had all arrived mamma took us directly to the nursery, which is really a play-room, as we are too big to need a nursery any more.

"This is a nutting frolic, children," said mamma, "and one of the greatest delights in going a-nutting, is to have someone shake the nuts from the trees while the remaining number of boys and girls scamper around under the trees, and gather up the nuts as they come down in showers. You see I have suspended from the chandelier a paper bag which is filled with nuts, and as the nuts come tumbling down you may all scramble for them the same as the boys and girls do who go a-nutting in the real woods, under real trees."

Well, if we didn't have a jolly, good time. The first bag was filled with hickory nuts and when it broke, as Lillian—Lillian was Molly's little friend—struck at it with papa's cane, down came the nuts, pitter, patter, scatter, and away they rolled, helter-skelter, but it was all the more fun diving after them.

"Before I hang another bag, let me tell you something about the hickory nut," said mamma. "If you will examine the outer covering, you will see that it has no regular opening; but in drying it cracks irregularly, allowing the nut to fall out, while butternuts and some others have to be forcibly removed from their outer coats. The hickory is the favorite nut of the bushy-tail squirrel tribe, who lay up a good store for winter use."

"I'd like to be a squirrel for just about a day; I'd lay up a good store of hickory nuts, wouldn't you, Newel?" said Harvey. Harvey was Newel's guest.

It was Gracie's turn next. Walnuts came tumbling out of her bag.

"Oh, won't you please tell us something about walnuts?" said Gracie, turning to mamma, without stopping to pick up one single nut.

But as Gracie was my company, I gave her half of what I picked up.

"Gladly," returned mamma. "By its name, English walnut, you would think, very naturally, that it was a native of England, while in reality it is a native of Persia. Persian kings at one time held these nuts in such high regard that the common people were not allowed to eat them, they being reserved for their majesties alone."

"Well, I call them pretty selfish kings," said Gracie.

The next bag, which Helen brought down with a thud, was filled with chestnuts. Helen was Ruth's company.

"Um," said Harvey, "my favorites!" as he made a dive under the couch.

"Yes, Harvey," said mamma, "chestnuts are now general favorites, although in former times they were scorned by the Romans."

"Why?" asked Harvey.

"I suppose they considered them too common for their refined taste. The largest chestnut-tree on record was one that stood at the foot of Mount Aetna, in Sicily, which measured two hundred and four feet in circumference. It is said that a company of a hundred cavalry once found refuge in its hollow trunk, from which it was called 'The Chestnut of the Hundred Horsemen.'"

"Doesn't your mother know lots?" whispered Lillian to me.

That's what all the children say when they come to our house. I think mamma must try to find out interesting things to tell us, p'raps more than their mothers do. I know when I go to their homes, we just go off and play by ourselves; the mothers don't seem to want to be bothered; but our mamma is different; we never seem to trouble her.

"Now it's Harvey's turn," cried Newel, as mamma tied the fourth bag to the chandelier.

"Filberts!" cried Harvey.

"Yes," said mamma, "named from Saint Philbert, whose day, August 22nd, fell in the nutting season. In England, the nuts must ripen sooner than with us. It is said that the scholars who attended Eton School had to earn their holiday for gathering nuts. You will think, perhaps, it was a very funny way to earn a holiday when I tell you about it. They were obliged to write verses on 'The Fruitfulness of Autumn and the Deadly Cold of the Coming Winter.' How would you young people like to earn a holiday in that way?"

Then mamma hung another bag and motioned to Ruth to hit it quick. Ruth did, and down came a shower of pecans. Well, if we didn't scramble to get out of the way of that shower!

"That makes me think of a little story told of the cruel Emperor Nero," said mamma, laughing at our antics; "he took delight in going to the theatre in disguise, and from an upper gallery pelting down nuts upon the bald head of the praetor who sat below."

"What's a praetor?" asked Ruth.

"A civil officer among the ancient Romans, dear," answered mamma. "And did he sit there and let Nero pelt him without shying any back?" demanded Harvey indignantly.

"Hur! he'd shied back. Nero would have cut his head off!" cried Newel.

"How did he know it was Nero if he was in disguise?" asked Gracie and I together.

"Fortunately he recognized his assailant or no doubt he would have resented the insult. It is said that he was afterward rewarded for bearing the injury to his pate so good-naturedly. Now, Molly, it is your turn; but before you strike the bag, I will lay this big sheet of brown paper on the rug, and I am going to ask you to touch the bag very gently. Now!"

And what do you think was in the bag? Salted almonds.

"This the very best of all," we said, as we sat on the floor around the sheet of brown paper.

"There are only two bags left," said Helen with a sigh.

"But hasn't it been fun!" said Lillian.

"Oh, mamma, you didn't tell us anything about pecans!" said Newel.

"Or almonds!" said Gracie.

"I don't know very much about either," said mamma. "The pecan is a species of the hickory and grows chiefly in the Mississippi Valley and in Texas. Of the almond there are many different varieties of one species, such as bitter, sweet, thin-shelled and thick-shelled. It is a native of the Mediterranean region and Western Asia."

"Your turn!" cried Newel, handing me the cane.

"Butternuts! I love them," I cried. "You told me once, mamma, that they were related to the walnuts."

"Quite true, dear, they belong to that family. Now, Newel, you know they say, the last, the best of all the game."

"Look out, here goes," cried Newel, and peanuts came tumbling all about our ears.

"Peanuts differ from all other nuts, children, in this way," said mamma; "it is the fruit of a trailing plant instead of a tree. The fruit is a hard pod, usually containing two or three seeds which ripen beneath the soil."—G. W. Fielder, in The Young Churchman.

The Wind.

I saw you toss the kites on high
And blow the birds about the sky;
And all around I heard you pass,
Like ladies' skirts across the grass—
O wind, a-blowing all day long,
O wind, that sings so loud a song!

I saw the different things you did,
But always you yourself you hid.
I felt you push, I heard you call,
I could not see yourself at all—
O wind, a-blowing all day long,
O wind, that sings so loud a song!

O you that are so strong and cold,
O blower, are you young or old?
Are you a beast of field and tree,
Or just a stronger child than me?
O wind, a-blowing all day long,
O wind, that sings so loud a song!

—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Room for Elizabeth.

When the burning of the orphan asylum made it necessary to "farm out" the little inmates until new quarters could be found for them, Mrs. Bennett consented to take seven-year-old Elizabeth rather reluctantly, for she felt that the noise and disorder a child would bring into the house might disturb her husband, a studious man, who greatly valued the quiet of his leisure hours.

"May I pretend you're my really aunt?" asked Elizabeth, the first morning at breakfast.

Mrs. Bennett looked at her husband with a questioning smile.

"Of course you may," he answered for her, "and I'll be your uncle temporarily."

"What's temp'rarily?"

"For a short time," replied Mrs. Bennett.

"Is it two weeks?"

"Well, maybe, dear; we'll see."

"I'd like to have it to be two weeks. Do we have oranges every day?"

"Yes, dear."

"Sallie Connors, she has an aunt and an uncle, and they come to the 'sylum' and bring her candy and apples, but they ain't rich enough to have her visit them. They've got lots of children of their own. You haven't got any, have you?"

"No. Now, Elizabeth, eat your oatmeal."

"Yes'm, I'm eating it. It's funny God didn't send you any little children, when this is such a nice place, and oranges every day. Oh, goody, sirup! We hardly ever have sirup at the 'sylum.'"

Mr. Bennett looked at his wife and smiled. "Put it on thick, Dora," he said.

One cold morning when the house was chilly, Mrs. Bennett tied a little shawl around Elizabeth's shoulders. Greatly to her surprise, the child burst into tears.

"Why, what is the matter, my dear?" she asked.

"I don't look like a girl with an aunt when I wear this shawl; I look like a 'sylum girl.'"

"Why, bless you, child, I wore it when I was little."

"Were you an orphan?"

"No, but I wore that little shawl. I thought it was pretty."

"I don't. I hate it."

"Don't make her wear it, Dora," quickly interposed Mr. Bennett, who saw that his wife was about to try a little discipline. "Elizabeth isn't a 'sylum girl' now; she's visiting us. Come here, youngster, get on my lap and I'll take off that shawl, and to-day Aunt Dora shall buy you a nice little sweater."

"Uncle," Elizabeth's arms went around his neck, "I wish you and Aunt Dora weren't just nick uncle and aunt."

"Nick, child, what is that?"

"Why, uncle and aunt are only nick-names for you. I wish they were really and truly names."

"How is it, Dora?" Mr. Bennett's eyes glistened above the curly head on his shoulder. "Would you rather be nick or really and truly?"

"Oh, I'd rather be really and truly," cried Mrs. Bennett, and slipping down on the floor at her husband's knees, she clasped both his hand and Elizabeth's in her own.

By and by, when Elizabeth was made to understand that she was not to be sent back to the "sylum," she said, very gravely, "I guess God didn't send you any children, so there'd be room for me."—Exchange.

The Wildcat and the Woman.

Translated From the Chinese by Martha Lee (11 Years Old).

There once lived an old woman, and she made her money by spinning and making mattresses and selling them.

One day she put her cotton on the roof to dry. When the evening came the old woman went to get her cotton and she found that a wildcat had stolen all of her cotton. When she saw this, she began to threaten to hang the wildcat. At last he grew angry and he said:

"You will never hang me, for I am coming this very night and I am going to bite you till you die." Here he stopped to show two rows of terrible white teeth to the poor, trembling woman. "And no matter how much you beg and cry I will not spare your life."

The old woman was in despair when she heard this, but she knew it would do no good to beg and cry, so she just sat down in her house and cried. Just then a troll who happened to be passing, stopped and asked the old woman what was the matter, and the woman told her tale of woe.

"Oh, don't cry, I can get you out of this trouble easily enough if you will only do as I tell you."

The old woman promised, so the troll gave her six eggs and one hundred packs of needles and four knives. Then he said:

"Put the eggs in the boiler with some lime and water, and take the needles out of their cases and stick them with the points out on your bed curtain and put two of the knives on your door and the other two knives on your stove near the boiler."

The woman listened carefully and said she would do everything he said. Then the troll left a very happy woman in the place of a sad one.

Just before the woman went to bed she fixed everything as the troll had told her to do. And then she went to bed. She had not been there long when the wildcat came. When he opened the door he got his hand cut off by one of the knives, this made him howl with pain, but he went on into the house. When he came to the stove he looked into the boiler, and the eggs and lime jumped out and put out his eyes, but still he would not stop. As he groped blindly around the knives on the stove cut off his other hand, but still he made up his mind to get to the bed if he didn't kill the woman, so on he went. When he got to the room where the bed was he started feeling about, at last he came to the bed. He grabbed at the curtain, and all of the needles stuck fast to him, and this was too much for the cat to bear, so he rushed from the house and was never seen again. The woman lived happily ever after.

In Treasures of the Snow.

I wonder if, when we go out some morning and find it snowing hard, we stop to think that God is giving the snow? Perhaps we think only of sliding down hill, and of wrapping up warmly in furs and leggings and mittens and warm caps; maybe we think of snow-men and snowball battles and sleigh-rides. With all these joys I know it isn't easy to be thinking about God.

And yet, if God did not think to give us the snow, we would never have had any such thing.

A great many people say, "Oh, I don't like to have the snow come! It has to be shoveled away, and it gets one's feet wet and cold, and then it has to melt and make everything muddy and dirty and messy. I would like to live in some country where they have no snow at all." I have heard people say that, haven't you?

God made a very wonderful thing when He made the snow. And it is very necessary to the earth and to us. Let us think a little about snow. It is really rain-water frozen, you know; but it is not hard and harsh like hail or ice. It is soft and gentle; and when it comes down and covers the dry plants and roots it makes a thick blanket over them and protects them from the fierce winds and bitter frosts. Then in the spring it melts away and softens up the earth, and the sun streams down warm and bright, and the roots awaken and grow.

The Bible tells us many things about snow. Mankind does not always stop to think how wonderful snow is, and what a wonderful place it has in the general plan of earthly vegetation. The Bible reminds us that snow is one of the things which do the will of God, for He sends it to us. It reminds us, too, that if it were not for snow, grains and plants would not grow, and we would not have food to eat.

Then there is another thing the Bible tells us. You know how white and clean and beautiful and fresh snow is, and how it makes the world look as though a layer of spotless cotton-batting had been spread over everything in sight. Well, when we think of sin, we think of something that must be dark and soiled and ugly; we know that it makes our souls so, and we cannot find any beauty in it.

So God tells us that if we believe in Him and love Him and serve Him truly all the days of our lives, the sins which we have committed must be "washed away," and that our souls will be made as white and beautiful as snow.

Then again He tells us that even though we may have sinned terribly, and our souls are all dark and stained and disarranged, if we are truly sorry, and want to love Him. He will make our souls clean and white again through His great love—and we shall still be as "white as snow."

So you see, besides being such a help to us in earthly ways, snow is a very beautiful way of explaining cleanliness and purity and whiteness of spirit. I think God must have loved the snow and enjoyed making it, don't you?—Shepherd's Arms.

Annie and the Mocking-Bird.

"It's too bad you've sprained your knee, Bobby," said Mrs. Brown, as she seated herself in the little living-room, after doing the supper dishes. "I wanted you to run over to Aunt Sarah's and get a skirt pattern for me so that I could cut out my work tonight and be ready to begin on it early in the morning."

Bobby was sorry, too, and he said so, though he added bravely, "I could go anyway, mother. I could hop along and it won't hurt very much, besides it isn't far, you know."

"No, it isn't very far," answered his mother quite positively, "but you are not going to run any risks with that sprained knee." Then she added thoughtfully, "I would go myself only I'm expecting your father to call me up over the telephone just any minute, and I don't want to leave the house at all for fear I might miss him."

Nobody looked at Annie Lee all of this time, and nobody made any signs at all of expecting anything of her, but still she felt sort of uncomfortable.

Her knee was not sprained, she was not expecting any one to call her over the telephone, and she was almost as old and as tall as Bobby Brown, besides it was neither very far to Aunt Sarah's, nor yet very dark outside.

Annie Lee was learning how to read, and she could read stories in story papers when she tried very hard. She was trying quite hard now, and I am sure would have succeeded only that she couldn't keep her eyes fixed on the page. Her sight kept wandering to the open doorway, and through it, out into the gathering dark outside.

Annie Lee did not like the dark at all. It gave her a queer feeling, as if something big and soft and smothery were closing in all around her so that she couldn't get out at all.

She understood just how queer it made her feel but maybe other people might think she was afraid, for she noticed that they never asked her to run out in the dark any more.

She didn't at all like people to think that she was afraid, but she was more and more sure every minute that some people did think that.

Everything was quite still and nobody in the room said a word, and yet Annie Lee thought she could feel them thinking, "Don't ask Annie Lee to go, she's afraid of the dark!"

It isn't at all pleasant to feel that people are criticizing you in their minds, and Annie Lee couldn't get interested in the story she was trying to read, so she sat quite still and did nothing at all.

Then she heard a noise outside, a strange, wonderful, beautiful noise.

"Oh!" she gasped, and leaning eagerly forward in her chair she asked, "What is it, aunty?"

"What is what, child?" said Mrs. Brown, not looking up from her reading.

"She means the mocking-bird," said Bobby. "They don't have mocking-birds where she lives."

"Where is he?" asked Annie Lee, gazing with a new interest out into the darkness.

"Oh, he's outside in the trees somewhere," answered Mrs. Brown carelessly as she went on with her reading.

Now, where Annie Lee lived they were not used to hearing birds sing outside at night. "Who's out there with him?" she asked at length.

"Nobody, goosey," said Bobby, "they sing at night lots of times."

"I sh'd think he'd be afraid," breathed Annie Lee in a whisper.

"Why should he be afraid?" asked Mrs. Brown laying aside her paper at last.

"Afraid of the dark," answered Annie Lee so softly that you hardly could hear her.

Then Aunt Brown laughed merrily. "Why, child," she said, "there isn't anything to be afraid of. The dark isn't anything—it's just nothing at all—nothing but a big, kind shadow that comes over the world to rest our eyes, and why should any one at all, even a little bird, be afraid of a shadow?"

That was a new thought for Annie Lee, and she sat very still while she thought about it, and listened to the brave little singer outside in the shadow.

Then she jumped up and said brightly, "I'll run and get your pattern, aunty."

Then before any one could say a word against it her willing feet were

The juice of two fresh lemons strained into a bottle containing three ounces of orchard white makes a whole quarter pint of the most remarkable lemon skin beautifier at about the cost one must pay for a small jar of the ordinary cold creams. Care should be taken to strain the lemon juice through a fine cloth so no lemon pulp gets in, then this lotion will keep fresh for months. Every woman knows that lemon juice is used to bleach and remove such blemishes as freckles, sallowness and tan and is the ideal skin softener, smoothener and beautifier.

Just try it! Get three ounces of orchard white at any pharmacy and two lemons from the grocer and make up a quarter pint of this sweetly fragrant lemon lotion and massage it daily into the face, neck, arms and hands. It naturally should help to soften, freshen, bleach and bring out the roses and beauty of any skin. It is simply marvelous to smoothen rough, red hands.

running down the path to Aunt Sarah's house, and all the way she was saying to herself, "Thank you, little bird, for not being afraid of the dark, for not being afraid of a shadow!"

Pretty soon she came safely back into the lighted room with the wished-for pattern in her hand.

"Thank you, dear," said Mrs. Brown gently. "Were you afraid?"

"Course not," answered Annie Lee smiling brightly, "I'm a good deal bigger than a little mocking-bird."

Then she sat down with her story paper and enjoyed her story.—Frances Morton, in Sunday-school Times.

Odd Geographical Facts.

The following list of odd things about the earth that the average person does not know has been compiled by Professor R. H. Whitbeck, of the University of Wisconsin geology department:

Did you know—

That the Pacific end of the Panama canal is farther east than the Atlantic end?

That Venice, Italy, and Montreal, Canada, are in about the same latitude?

That if an express train had started out from the earth for the planet Neptune at the birth of Christ, and had traveled sixty miles an hour day and night ever since, it would not yet be half way there?

That Cuba would reach from New York to Chicago?

That the mouth of the Amazon River is as near to Europe as it is to New York?

That Texas is larger than Germany and as large as 212 Rhode Islands?

That when measured in degrees of longitude, San Francisco is about in the middle of the United States, including Alaska?

That the entire continent of South America lies farther east than Florida?

That Glasgow, Scotland, is in the same latitude as Alaska?

That, if the southern end of Chile, South America, were placed at Florida, that single country would extend northward entirely across the United Guide.

Taylor: Fell peacefully asleep in God, January 7, 1918, after a brief illness, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, the REV. ARTHUR RUSSELL TAYLOR, priest, beloved rector of St. John's Church, York, Diocese of Harrisburg. He had completed more than a quarter century of ministry, during which he was successively rector of St. John's Church, Manakato, Minn., Trinity Memorial Church, Warren, Pa., and for the last eleven years of St. John's Church, York, Pa. He served the Diocese of Harrisburg in many official positions, among them on the Standing Committee, the Board of Missions and as delegate to the General Convention. Dr. Taylor was a graduate of Lafayette College, from which he received the degrees of Master in Arts and Doctor of Divinity, and of Seabury Divinity School, from which he received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He was a frequent and forceful contributor to the thought of the day through current periodicals. All who knew him felt the charm and cheer of his personality, and were heartened by the faith of his message:

"Underneath are the Everlasting Arms."

Gibbs: Died December 18, 1917, at the residence of her nephew, Fairfax C. Jones, 300 North Rowland Street, Richmond, Va., MRS. LEE V. GIBBS, widow of Dr. William H. Gibbs. She is survived by one sister, Mrs. William Ellis Jones.

The funeral service was from the Church of the Holy Comforter, December 20th, at 12 noon. Interment at Shockoe Cemetery.

MRS. ALFRED B. SHEPPERSON.

Entered into life, December 4, 1917, FRANCES LUPTON, daughter of William L. Johnson, D. D., forty years rector of Grace Church, Jamaica, Long Island State. Other relatives were Rev. William Allen Johnson, D. D., professor at Middleton, Conn., Theological School; Rev. Samuel Roosevelt Johnson, D. D., professor at General Theological Seminary, N. Y.; Rev. George B. Johnson, D. D., chaplain to Bishop Hall, Vermont, later missionary in the West Indies; Rev. Daniel Johnson, D. D., rector of St. Mary's Church, Brooklyn; Theodore Folhemus Johnson, second vice-president of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, New York. Among her early ancestors were Gaspar Cole and de Rapella—Rapella, Italy, being named for the family—a nephew of Coligni; Abraham Van Janssen, the historical painter; Sarah Janssen de Rapelle, the first white child born on Long Island; Barent Johnson, killed in the battle of Long Island. Mrs. Shepperson, a graduate of Packer Collegiate Institute, was for years one of the managers of the Church Charity Foundation Orphanage, a visitor for the Bureau of Charities, and the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and a teacher at Christ Church Chapel, Brooklyn. Her early married life was spent in the South, always beloved. She was a fine equestrienne and possessed a rare voice. She published Church music, her father and mother being early contributors to the Churchman and other Church papers. She was especially fond of poetry and flowers. She was noted for her hospitality, generosity and patriotism. The last time she was out, it was to attend a patriotic service. Through years of suffering, she was patient and cheerful. She leaves two married daughters, a deaconess connected for years with St. Luke's Church, Brooklyn, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. The interment was at Jamaica, Long Island. Her life was full of those "little unremembered acts of kindness and of love." To her "death was just an incident in life, for it is all life, here or there." One day, after listening to some beautiful verses, she said: "Well, after all, I am the resurrection and the life, sums it all up, more simply and finely: He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

MISS ANNIE DOUGLAS GRAY.

As the bells rang out for a new day and a new year, ANNIE DOUGLAS GRAY, beloved daughter of the late Algernon Sidney Gray and his wife, Annie Henderson, entered into the Paradise of God. She was born in Harrisonburg, Va., October 3, 1842. She leaves a sister, Mrs. Foxhall Daingerfield, and nephews and nieces, great-nephews and great-nieces, whose home in Kentucky her salutary presence had blessed. She had been an invalid for many years, but in all that time her work, her love, her prayers went out for the Church of God and all that concerned it. We would feel that life was full of new perils if we believed her death had left us unguarded by the bulwark of her prayers, but her own vivid faith in the communion of saints makes us sure that she is not less loving, nor less prayerful in the very presence of Him who ever liveth to make intercession for us. From its first publication, the Southern Churchman had been a beloved visitor to her mother's home, and from generation to generation it has been a guide and inspiration to her family. As the growing weakness to which, two days later, she succumbed was creeping over her, she said, "I cannot read my Churchman to-day. Tell me what it says about all our interests, especially the Syrians and Armenians." Her dying hours were touched with ecstasy that Jerusalem was in the hands of those who acknowledged the Prince of the house of David as its lawful King.

Her life since earliest youth has been entirely devoted to work for Christ and for those He died to save. Bishop Capers, then her rector, as Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, once said of her, "Miss Annie's heart yearns over all sinners and outcasts and sorrowful people—lepers, prisoners, fallen women—till she seems more than anybody I have ever known to be partaker of our Lord's passion. To think of her is to think of the words, 'If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him. If we be crucified with Him, we shall also be glorified together.'"

The House of Mercy in Lexington owes its inception largely to her. Emanuel Church in Harrisonburg is built on her work and prayers. And God only knows how many of those who greeted her in Paradise on New Year's morning would never have heard of God, who so loved the world, but for "Miss Annie." No wonder that through our tears we seem, nearly to see her shining as the stars. Years and years before the blessed mission now under the charge of Archdeacon Neve was begun in the Virginia mountains, a man charged with murder was brought to Harrisonburg for trial. "Miss Annie" visited him tirelessly, but it seemed impossible for him to accept the love and forgiveness of which she told him, good news that he had never dreamed of before. As the day of his execution approached, she was in agony of mind about him, and knelt all night at her window begging that God would touch the stony heart and give His poor, untaught child an heart of flesh. When she went to the jail for her daily visit, as soon as she saw her poor friend, she knew her prayers were answered, even before he said, "Oh, Miss Annie, I have found my Saviour!" He acknowledged his sins and made such reparation as he could to those whom he had wronged. Mr. David Barr prepared him for baptism and gave him the Holy Communion.

Faithful to her promise that she would herself see that his body was given to his children for burial, this sensitive, delicate woman stayed with him to the hour of his execution, and in the jail till all was over. Just before he left his cell for the last time, they knelt together and at the very last the condemned man prayed, "O Lord Jesus, bless my poor people in Shifflett's Hollow and send your light to save them from their sins and to give the children a better chance, and take my soul. You died for it. Amen."

Thirty-five years later, as she lay dying, Annie Gray heard new evidence of the blessed work in all that part of Virginia and said, "God never forgets." After she was so weak that the loving ones who watched beside her thought she would not speak again on earth, she said clearly and happily, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday and to-day, and forever."

All her life and work was illumined with the bright expectation of our Lord's second coming, and never did life more clearly prove that "every one who hath this hope purifieth himself, even as He is pure." It seems to us a beautiful thing that the last words of the second lesson on the evening that she lay breathing more softly, till the last breath fluttered out, just as the New Year bells rang joyfully, were these: "Behold I come quickly. Amen. Even so. Come, Lord Jesus."

LETTERS THAT INSPIRE CONFIDENCE.

I wish very much that every reader of the Religious Herald could spend sufficient time in my office to read the thousands of letters which I have received from all parts of the country. I have printed several hundred of them in a booklet, but I wish you could see the originals, for I would like for you to realize the wonderful results which they report in the relief of dyspepsia, indigestion, persistent headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney, bladder, and liver diseases, uric acid poisoning, and other conditions due to impure blood.

Before my own health was restored by Shivar Mineral Water and I purchased this Spring, and before I received all of these letters from sufferers, I didn't take very much stock in advertisements like this. I therefore cannot blame you if you doubt, but, my friend, I am absolutely convinced that the Shivar Spring is the greatest restorative mineral spring ever discovered, not excepting the famous Spas of Europe. I have shipped this water to thousands of sufferers in all parts of the United States, and they almost invariably report either permanent restoration or beneficial results. That is why I make the guarantee offer contained in the following letter. Sign it now and mail it:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64-J, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen.—I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons (two five-gallon demijohns) of Shivar Spring Water. I agree to give the water a fair trial in accordance with instructions which you will send, and if I derive no benefit you are to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McA. Pittman.

Prophecy and the Jews "Startling Fulfillment of the Prophecies Concerning the Jews in the Last Days."

By the Rev. Jacob H. Rosenberg, Supt. of the Hebrew Christian Association.

We are sure that it will open the eyes and convince anyone who will read it. It is impossible to secure stronger proof of the inspiration of the Scriptures, also of the fact that we are living in the end of this age, than is found in this booklet.

Written by a converted Jew, an ordained minister of the Gospel who has made a careful study of prophecy from a Jewish point of view. You will be impressed in reading this pamphlet with this fact, that the finest interpreter of the Scriptures is the converted Jew. The facts contained are positively startling and intensely interesting.

Order Fertilizers Now or You May Have to Do Without Them This Season

The freight congestion is serious. You will help yourself, us, the railroads, and the Government by giving your order for Fertilizers NOW to your dealer. If all the farmers do this, the dealer can then "bunch" his orders, and be able to order his cars of fertilizers loaded to full capacity. The Government urges that all cars be so loaded.

When the goods arrive haul them home, and put them into your barn until you are ready to use them. If the movement of railroad cars becomes any more serious you may not get a pound of fertilizer at any price.

Our 50 factories, and distributing points are so well located geographically as to enable us to get fertilizers to you with minimum amount of hauling.

How painful it must be to a family who have perpetuated the memory of their loved ones in seeing their same style of window, same pose, same coloring, same everything, in another person's memorial window—all that they had cherished as theirs was anybody's. Why? Because intending purchasers will ask for a catalogue and, in consequence, choose a window that has probably been placed all over the country, when by writing to me they can get not only their own ideas carried out, but a new and original one and my guarantee that their window will never be duplicated.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Christ was an attentive listener.

The Church does not keep men wholesome by the refrigerator method.

"God has never tried to make a man who could please everybody."

"One Paradise only there is, and that where the Lord God is the Light."

Freedom's battle once begun,
Bequeathed by bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won.

What is rightly regulated love but moral power of the highest order? As St. Paul puts it, "The love of Christ constraineth us." Love is the very muscle and fibre of moral force.—Canon Liddon.

Sunday is not rightly observed in the home where the children hate to see it come.

They healed sick hearts till theirs was broken,
And dried sad eyes till theirs lost sight;

We shall know at last by a certain token
How they fought and fell in the fight.

—Sir Edwin Arnold.

If you are on a railway train, your falling asleep will not hinder you from reaching your journey's end. If you are in Christ you will pass into glory, even though you may do so in a state of insensibility.

One secret act of self-denial, one sacrifice of inclination to duty, is worth all the mere good thoughts, warm feelings, passionate prayers, in which idle people indulge themselves.—Cardinal Newman.

Jesus lifted with His pierced hand empires off their hinges, and turned the stream of centuries out of their channel, and still governs the ages.—Jean Paul Richter.

No plan for the betterment of mankind which does not make perfection of character the primary aim is likely to be of permanent good. However well devised, it will break down by its inherent defect.

What a trouble these branches are in! So much to see to in getting out their leaves! So much to see to in expanding their buds! If they would give their attention to abiding in the Root, everything would go on better. Then the Root would take care of it all, and leaves and buds would soon come right.—Selected.

Voice of our God, O yet be near!

In low, sweet accents whisper peace;
Direct us on our pathway here,

Then bid in Heaven our wanderings cease.

We shrink from any precise or dogmatic statements concerning a future of which we know nothing. It is absolutely enough for us to believe that our future lot will more than satisfy us, even though our hearts were a hundredfold more exacting than the tenderest heart can be. The heart of God will be satisfied—that is enough.—Selected.

The secret of the unique combination of strength and gentleness, of force and unselfishness in Jesus, lies in the motive of His life. His aim was to serve. "I am among you as one that serveth." Men have sought for ornaments and trophies, for implements and servants, for honor and distinction. Christ sought for none of these. Unlike the kings of the Gentiles He exercised His authority merely to do good. And this magnificent ideal cuts across the law of the survival of the fittest with sharp distinction. Imported into our international relationships and into our class divisions it would revolutionize the world.—Herbert Parrish.

A little boy takes a rose which he has just plucked from a bush in the garden, and plants it in a pot with earth, and brings it to his father, saying, "Father, look at my rose!" The father pities the boy's delight, for he knows the flower must soon wither away for want of root. And so the great Father in Heaven looks down at the plans we make without Him and He knows they must shortly wither and die. Nothing can succeed but that which is rooted in God.—Wade Robinson.

The value of the Southern Churchman, we trust, speaks for itself.

It is the oldest of all our Church papers.

To thousands of individuals and families it has been long endeared.

To-day, in the living present, it seeks to bring to all its readers, both old and young, the evangelical message of Christ's spirit in the life of His Church.

"THE CHILDREN'S YEAR" is a volume of fifty-two talks with children by the Rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond.

Of this book, now in its second edition, the dean of the Theological Seminary in Virginia has written:

"These five-minute talks by Dr. Bowie should be extensively used by the clergy as a stimulus and a model. Sunday School teachers also must find these talks very useful in their delightful illustrative quality as helps in pointing lessons through pictorial language and familiar objects. The volume should have its place in every Sunday School library as well as on every rector's study table."

To take advantage of this offer you should act quickly.

If you do not now subscribe to the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, seize this opportunity. If you yourself are a subscriber, secure a subscription from someone else.

The book and the paper may be mailed to different addresses.

Once more, once more into the fire they go,

With their dreamed and undreamed deeds of the coming years
Put to the chance of a shell or a bayonet's blow—

With a smile in their eyes made bright by a touch of tears,
And a laugh on their lips, they have gone to meet our foe!

To-day they fight for a freedom newly born,

For the earth is weary of kings and the spawn of kings,
And out of the throes of a world with anguish torn

Shall rise a peace no glory of conquest brings,
Like the peace that came to the earth on Christmas morn.

We have sent our best to the world's last great crusade,
They shall not come back till the world at last is free!

For the Old World calls to the New, and, unafraid,

Our youth go forth to their fame and their agony,

For God will judge in the end, and His price be paid!

"On the Highway—What of the Boy?"

They sat just in front of me, a father and son. The conductor came along and asked for their fares. The father gave the conductor a nickel and the conductor asked the boy for his fare. The boy looked at his father, and the father told the conductor that the boy was not six. He looked eight or ten, and the conductor insisted on the fare, but the father persisted that the boy was under age. The expression on the boy's face was pathetic. He knew that his father was lying, and the father knew that the boy knew, and the boy knew that the conductor knew, and the boy was mighty unhappy. What of the boy? Handicapped by a dishonest father even before he has had a chance in the world, taught to lie and to steal by the man to whom he naturally must look for an example. What of the boy in the years to come? What of all the boys who are handicapped by their fathers? What of the boy who will have to say in the dark days ahead, "Well, how could I help it, my

Lieut. Edwin A. Abbey, Killed in Action
April 10, 1917.

This was his last letter:
France, Good Friday,
April 6th, 1917.

Dearest Mother and Father:

We are going up to an attack in a short time, and I am going to leave this note, to be sent to you, in case, by God's will, this is to be my final work.

I have made my communion, and go with a light heart and a determination to do all that I possibly can to help in this fight against evil for God and humanity.

I do not think of death or expect it, but I am not afraid of it and will give my life gladly if it is asked.

It is my greatest comfort that I know you, too, will gladly give all that is asked, and live on happily doing all that can be done, grateful to God for His acceptance of our sacrifice.

To-day the news came to us here that the United States had joined the Allies, so I go with the happy consciousness that I am and you are fighting for our dear flag as thousands of Americans have before us in the cause of liberty.

It may be a comfort to you to know that I have a great company of comrades, men and officers, all filled with determination and cheerful courage.

My dearest love to Sue and Howard and their dear children, Margie and Billy. My heart is full of gratitude for having such love as they have given me. My dearest love to all my friends.

Now, dearest mother and dearest father, I will say good-bye for a time. You have given me my faith which makes this so easy for me, and a wonderful example and inspiration of courage and unselfishness.

All my love and God bless you both.

Your son,
Edwin.

THE CHURCH WAR COMMISSION.

On next Sunday, January 27, the War Commission of the Episcopal Church asks the Church for $500,000 for her special and distinctive work in the Army and Navy of the United States, at home and over the seas, for one year.

This Commission, as our readers will remember, was appointed by the Presiding Bishop in August or September last. Rightly divining the mind of the Church under the conditions which had arisen he acted in this matter simply as her spokesman, and his course met with unanimous approval which has since been voiced by the House of Bishops at St. Louis and by the several Provincial Synods which have lately been in session. Since its organization the Commission has been busily at work and has already accomplished large results. Especially, it has thoroughly surveyed the field and knows how and where its services are to be rendered, has co-ordinated the several agencies in the Church which are helping on various lines and assigned to each its fitting tasks, and has already its representatives in almost if not quite all of the cantonments and naval stations here and abroad.

Let it be again noted that the work of the Church, through the Commission, is supplementary to that of the Y. M. C. A. and other agencies engaged for the social, moral and religious welfare of our soldiers and sailors. The work is so large and varied, the interests at stake are so tremendous, that there is neither room nor reason for rivalry or jealousy. The Y. M. C. A. welcomes every accredited helper in the overwhelming task of ministering in spiritual things to the million and a half of America's young men gathered under such unwonted circumstances, and seeks his co-operation while affording him every assistance; and the same, we believe, is true of the regular chaplains who are so utterly inadequate both in number and equipment, for the services demanded. Moreover, none of these other agencies, with the exception of the few Episcopal chaplains, is qualified for or can undertake the distinctive work of the Church in ministering to her own sons. In addition to all else that is offered them, these men need the ministry and services and sacraments of their Church with an urgency that is hardly equalled elsewhere. A moment's thought on the part of any devout Churchman will fix this fact beyond the reach of argument. The Church would be strangely delinquent and oblivious of her sacred duty as well as her highest interests if she failed or faltered in supplying this imperative need to the utmost of her power.

The supply of chaplains regularly appointed for the great army we are gathering and training, is pitifully small, and the government seems to be relying upon the voluntary aid of the churches in supplying the enormous deficiency. We are told that in great cantonments of from twenty-five to fifty thousand men there will be found from two to five or six chaplains, or one to ten thousand men. In many of the smaller camps and stations, and in regiments in process of formation, there can be none at all.

The chief work of our Commission is to place volunteer chaplains of our Church, with the permission of the authorities, in as many of these camps as possible, and supply them with the facilities and equipment necessary for their ministry. They also, in co-operation with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, locate picked laymen, men specially qualified for this work, as Y. M. C. A. secretaries or workers. With an eye to the whole great field they also supplement the efforts of local churches situated near the camps and guard against inefficiency or overlapping. As the men are sent to France they follow them. Bishop McCormick and numerous helpers are already there, supplied to a large extent with the names of the Church's sons who have gone over and the units to which they belong. As more and more of our men go across to meet the crowning test and win the war the demand upon the resources of the Commission in men and money for service abroad will increase greatly, while new drafts taking their places in training camps at home will allow no reduction in the force at work here.

It is just another call, urgent, beseeching, imperative, upon those who stay by the staff in behalf of those who go to battle. The appeal is both to our patriotism and our piety. One's imagination is stirred as one thinks of the extent of this work and its immeasurable spiritual import. Surely it is little enough that the Commission is asking in Christ's name, and no Churchman will be willing that his contribution, representing some real sacrifice, shall be wanting when the free-will offerings of the Church are gathered in.

The Treasurer of the War Commission is Mr. Arthur E. Newbold, Care of Drexel and Company, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Contributions should be sent direct to him.

But since this address may be forgotten, and many of our readers will lack opportunity to contribute through regular parochial channels, the Southern Churchman will acknowledge and forward promptly contributions made through its office.

The Churchman's Year Book; Continuing the American Church Almanac. 1918. Vol. LXXXVIII. Churchman Company, Publisher, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York. Pp. 582. Paper, 65 cents; cloth, 90 cents net.

This standard publication, hitherto the American Church Almanac, has been taken over by the Churchman Company, and appears under a new title. It retains all the features which have made it popular in previous years, and doubtless under its new ownership will continue to improve with age. Its arrangement of the Calendar is the most complete we have seen, since on Holy Days the regular lessons for the day of the month as well as the special lessons for the festival are given. This is specially desirable where a Saint's Day falls on Sunday, giving the minister the opportunity of selecting the lessons he desires. It is also nearly free from extra-rubrical notations.

Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; Twenty-second Annual Report; 1917-1918.

The report shows this admirable Society to be in an excellent condition. We strongly recommend to our clerical readers who are not acquainted with its purpose and advantages to send for this report and other information to the Rev. Henry Anstice, D. D., Financial Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

THE UNBENEFITED PENSIONERS.

We are publishing below extracts from some of a number of letters we have received within the past few weeks in regard to the present disabled clergy who are excluded from the benefits of the Church Pension Fund. These and other letters have been withheld in the hope that the Trustees of the Pension Fund would feel justified in affording the relief so sadly needed and so richly due these veterans in the Church's service, but since receiving the record of their action in the matter there is no longer any reason for putting to silence these voices.

Mr. Editor: * * * Will you permit me to send you several letters that came to me after my communication appeared in the Southern Churchman?

Case A.—"I was glad to see your article in the Southern Churchman on 'Old Pensioners.' I am one of many suffering from the technicalities of the Pension Fund. The fact that it would apply only to pensioners after March, 1917, was not emphasized in the appeals, but 'justice' was. Many lay people gave, believing that all old clergy would be taken care of. And I believe that the magnificent sum was given with this instinctive thought. But no move is made in that direction. In fact, I am told that those who have written the pension authorities have emphatically been given no satisfaction. The cruelty and injustice of the past will be perpetuated until the present generation of old clergy die off, and may God hasten the time. * * * 'To him that hath shall be given.' I hope those in authority in the Church will take this matter up. Do you think we can expect this?"

Case B.—"I was a beneficiary for $300 from the Clergy Relief Fund. I was delighted at the thought that I was to receive $300 in addition, making a total of $600. Six hundred dollars would have made me very comfortable, but I am told, 'No you are not eligible.' I am seventy-eight, and have been in the active work since 1870."

I have other cases before me; but if the situation, as pictured by these two examples does not bring pity and shame to every thinking man and woman, a multiplication of cases will not. * * * The men in the pulpits who made the appeals, and the men in the pews who gave the money, thought that by "accrued liabilities" were meant all the old clergy who were already getting the meager pensions from Diocesan or Clergy Relief Funds; and that for these this special provision was intended.

Mr. Editor: Having read Rev. Mr. Hartzell's letter in your paper of November 17, may I say that here is where the shoe pinches us. Under the former system each year the retired men were gradually receiving an increase and had hopes. In case of urgent necessity the Rev. Mr. McClure never failed to assist. His whole heart and soul seemed to be with the old clergy who laid foundations in years gone by at remarkably low salaries—salaries which today would be looked upon as ridiculous for a clergyman to accept. When the new system came all our hopes were destroyed. No hope any more of an increase. Poor and all as that fund was, we accepted it, feeling we had helped to raise it and would receive an increase as it grew.

I know myself retired clergymen who today have not a change of clothing for the winter months. When in the harness in past years the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions used to help on account of the meagre salary. Once a clergyman is retired, that help ends. I am nevertheless persuaded that under the new system we are not to be forgotten when affairs become adjusted. Nevertheless, my opinion is that it is so just and worthy a cause that it is well to keep the matter before the Church through our Church papers.

Mr. Editor: Pardon an old clergyman (seventy-eight) writing to thank you for your noble editorial, "The Older Pensioners and the Church Pension Fund." I think that the Southern Churchman is the only Church paper that takes up our cause. God bless you for it. I have been for forty-five years in the ministry—never out of work. How the $600 would comfort and help me! God bless and prosper the Southern Churchman!

Mr. Editor: I have read with pleasure Dr. Egar's strong article, your timely editorial, and Bishop Olmsted's splendid letter on the subject of the Church Pension Fund.

As even our Bishops did not understand that this fund would be of no benefit to those clergy who had retired before March 1, 1917, I feel that the laity have not been stupid in the same understanding.

A large proportion of the laity gave generously to the fund, believing that every loved aged clergyman, in whom each individually was interested, would be a beneficiary. Therefore, it seems that these aged ones have a rightful claim to a share of this fund.

A sad mistake, to put it mildly, has been made by beginning at the wrong end; helping the clergy first who could best afford to wait! The aged clergy who retired before March 1, 1917, at best, can live but a few years longer, while some may pass away this winter, which, from the present outlook, promises to be a hard one on all in straightened circumstances.

Therefore, when the Trustees meet during this month of December, it is to be hoped that with a clear vision they will see their duty, take quick and decisive measure to right this grave mistake. What they do, may they do quickly, while there is yet time.

Mr. Editor: I have read with interest the letters of late in the Southern Churchman relative to the distribution of the Church Pension Fund, and the share, or no share, of it to be paid the aged clergymen who had retired before it was collected. Permit me to say in behalf of these clergymen and the donors of the pension that many, if not all, of us are shocked at our most aged and consequently most dependent clergy being denied their just share of this sum. I doubt if the $8,000,000, or even $5,000,000, would have been subscribed if such terms had been known. I express the hope that the committee in charge of this sum will see that it is due, not only to the retired clergy, but to the many donors of this $8,000,000, that they correct any technicality which may prevent a just sharing of it.

Another correspondent calls our attention to the following extract from the preliminary report of the Joint Commission on the Support of the Clergy (now incorporated as the Church Pension Fund), made to the General Convention of 1813, page 78:

"Those already retired before the complete system goes into operation and the widows and minor orphans of clergymen previously deceased must be provided for. This should be done at the commencement of the fund's operation and will require careful actuarial investigation to be accomplished with safety out of the fund for the accrued liabilities, and yet provide a living for all. The annuities already received by these individuals from existing societies must be taken into consideration, with the relation of these societies to the Central Fund. This will be a complicated process to work out on a basis of strict equity to all concerned, but with patience it can be done."

CO-OPERATION OF CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS.

By (Mrs.) D. H. Moitoret.

"New occasions teach new duties," but they go farther than that. The new occasions which have grown out of the world-wide war have brought new opportunities of service, and new blessings in service. They have proven the value of co-operation and the wisdom of a harmonious interlacing of all agencies organized to serve the men in the field, and to provide an efficient avenue of service for those who remain at home.

The Department of Army and Navy Work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States, has the most intimate association with enlisted men of any Church agency to-day. Every day scores of letters are mailed to soldiers and sailors, and each day brings back some replies. They are glad to be remembered, those boys in the far off camps and training stations, and are delighted when a letter has found its way even across the seas to the other side. The Church is following them, and it gives them courage to know of it.

Many of these letters from the field contain requests, ranging all the way from Bibles to cook books, French magazines and Sunday supplements. While the Brotherhood solicits these requests, it does not attempt to fill them directly, another agency is provided for that purpose, and almost every day requests of this nature are forwarded to the Church Periodical Club headquarters at New York City, where they are given prompt attention.

At the suggestion of this department, the Church Periodical Club has sent supplies of reading matter to various camp hospitals, it has entered subscriptions for magazines especially asked for by the boys, and it has supplied doctrinal pamphlets to men ready for confirmation or baptism. It has given such splendid co-operation all through the work that the Brotherhood is looking eagerly forward to a like relationship with all Church organizations doing war work under the steady hands of the War Commission, whose members are doing yeoman service in supplementing and co-ordinating all branches of service.

BUSINESS MEN AS HEROES.

Americans are not given to self-sacrifice. True, the war is developing this spirit, but prior to the time when President Wilson announced that we would take a stand to "make the world safe for democracy," self-sacrifice was not regarded as an American characteristic.

On the contrary, many of our friends across the seas accused us of being materialistic. And with good reason. While Great Britain, France, Russia and Italy were standing the brunt of the German onslaught, the United States was waxing fat on war profits.

But what a change has come over the country since that historic Good Friday when Congress decided that a state of war existed between the United States and the Teuton. How the American people have responded to the demands made upon them. What millions have been poured out for the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. How nobly Americans have supported the Liberty Loan.

After all, it was discovered that Americans were not materialistic. The heart of the country was right. A nation of business men, trained along business lines, they had made their individual interests a first consideration until President Wilson showed them that there were more important things than individual interests. Then America woke up.

With the organizing of the national army, the Church discovered that it was confronted by a problem and an opportunity, and the challenge is putting the Church to a severe test.

But the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, that splendid laymen's organization which seeks by personal work to bring men—men in all stations of life, business and professional men, clerks, machinists and laborers—into closer touch with the Master, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew saw in the war a wondrous opportunity.

The Department of Army and Navy was organized; and then came a call to laymen to do the unprecedented thing. It was contrary to every American conception of "good business"; this call to prominent men to lay aside their work for several months, perhaps for several years, and go into the army camps to organize groups that will combat the every-day sins which the soldiers encounter.

There was no reward in dollars and cents. It was to be a labor of love. A labor involving sacrifice of business interests and separation from family.

It takes a big-hearted man to engage in service as a camp secretary of the Army and Navy Department of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. It is the supreme test. Jesus counseled His followers to leave their business, their families, their all, and "follow Me," and here was a twentieth century application of His command.

Let it be said to the glory of the Brotherhood that there was a ready response. Thirty-seven have enrolled for service, and more are coming.

They come from the Eastern coast cities, from the Middle West and from the Pacific coast. No sectional lines mark this work of self-sacrifice. They come from North, South, East and West—these heroes of the business world who are ready to lay aside everything for the service of the Master.

They come from all professions and business occupations. A life insurance man of Chicago—one of the biggest in the country—lays aside his work and goes into the camps. A manager in Marshall Field's great store, in the same city, responds, "I will."

Philadelphia and New York, gigantic marts of trade and commercial interests, furnish their quota. Business has not stifled Christianity. When the call comes for heroes the men stand forth. A nurseryman lays aside an old and long established business to obey the call to duty. A lawyer arranges to have his partners take care of his interests while he goes to France. A chief clerk in a Pennsylvania railroad office lays down his pen to don the khaki uniform of a Brotherhood camp secretary.

A retired business man, who has devoted much time to civic betterment, decides to enlarge his usefulness by giving his service for his country's betterment. A transportation agent for a Hudson river boat line says, "There is more important business than I am called upon to perform," and goes into the camps. The head of an advertising agency in New York City searches his heart and arrives at the conclusion that there is something in life superior to advertising.

The sales manager of an engineering company, decides to become a sales manager for Jesus Christ, knowing that the biggest business of his career lies ahead.

A retired business man of New York, noted for his personal man-to-man work as a member of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, enrolls as a camp secretary to increase his sphere of usefulness.

The owner of a hardware store goes to Camp Dix. A life insurance solicitor of Vancouver, British Columbia, decides to enlarge his business by writing insurance for the life hereafter.

A lawyer of Columbia, South Carolina, takes up the larger work. A life insurance man of Birmingham, Ala., goes to Camp McClellan. A Chicago insurance broker responds, giving his services for the duration of the war.

An art designer in New York; a sales agent of the Quaker Oats Company, of Chicago; a printer of Stamford, Conn.; a manager of the National Biscuit Company, Norfolk, Va.; the manager of a publishing company of Atlanta, and a partner in a land title company in Jacksonville, Florida, hasten to enroll.

It is a magnificent roll of honor. Every American will be proud of them. Because these men, by their service, embody the spirit in which America entered the war.

How many more will volunteer during the next month?

Will you be one?

There is no surer or better way of earning that "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

CHURCH WAR WORK.

A Few Outstanding Facts.

1. Young men are the greatest asset of the Church. Hitherto they have been scattered in business, in college or in their sodalities. To-day they are massed in camp and ship. We must go with them.

2. The nation, the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. are behind the men and they know and feel it. Seventy thousand Churchmen are in the army and navy. What are they going to think of the Church if she does not let them know that she is behind them? When they come home will they care for her if she has not cared for them?

3. Those who return home at the close of the war are to be the leaders of national life in the next generation. Is the Church going to lose them or is she going to guide and inspire them, making the country strong in spiritual force and the Church effective through their strength?

4. The Church will never be the same that she was before the war. We shall have new heavens and a new earth. These men who have faced death, looked into the other life, have asked and answered deep questions and have deep spiritual problems. Has the Church no message for such men?

Spiritual leadership is needed at the front as well as military leadership.

5. Our Church has a contribution to make to the religious life of the army. The order of the Church, its reverence and dignity of worship, its sacramental spirit, its traditions of personal, pastoral work fall in happily with the habits of soldier and sailor.

6. A camp or a ship is a great, systematized organization. Officers and men have hearts. A chaplain can be the human, sympathetic, invigorating force.

7. We at home have the blessings of the ministry, the services and sacraments. Why should the men in service go without them? Why should not soldiers and sailors have the living ministrations of their Church?

8. The great impulse of patriotism brings the churches together. Chaplains and laymen of all faiths are working in spiritual sympathy. We must have a part in this.

9. A chaplain is not only a pastor and priest, but postmaster, censor, letter writer, banker and man of all work.

10. In the trenches, on the battle front the chaplain goes with the men. He is beside the wounded and the dying. He takes their last messages. He gives words of comfort and the assurance of a loving Saviour. He administers to those who are offering their lives for us.

11. Five hundred thousand dollars is to be raised to reinforce the work we have begun. Some Dioceses will spend many thousands of dollars in war work in their own borders and will not call for a dollar of the General Fund. Other Dioceses with masses of soldiers will need heavy reinforcement.

This is sure: The work overseas and on the ocean is the work of the whole Church. Every Diocese and missionary district, no matter how heavy its military responsibilities, will make contribution towards the general fund of $500,000.

"MOONLIGHT" CANTONMENTS

For Mountaineers of the Southern Appalachians. Why Not?

By Martha S. Gielow.

"The time has come when every cove in the Appalachian Mountain Range is sending forth its splendid physical manhood for national defense; but, alas! the lack of educational qualification will cause thousands of these Highlanders to be rejected (as was the case in the Spanish-American War) by the nation they would serve and defend with their lives."

The above quotation is from the letter of a patriotic woman living in a Lodge in the North Carolina mountains, where she is calling for aid in establishing a "centre" where, as she says, "we might disseminate information and knowledge so woefully needed by the unprepared Mountain Volunteers."

Yes, the highlanders of the Southern Appalachian Mountains will certainly respond, as they have ever done to their country's call. There is little tolerance of disloyalty in the mountains. These sons of the hills will swarm down from their coves to defend the flag which some of them may never have seen. No need of naturalization here, no need to teach patriotism and compel respect to the flag.

The Southern Mountaineers have ever been among the Nation's best and truest defenders of human rights and the principles of democracy and freedom. Patriotism steadily burns in the hearts of these isolated descendants of revolutionary patriots.

The centuries of neglect of this fine native stock, hidden away in the remote regions of "forgotten men," cannot be laid entirely at the door of the Southern Appalachian States. It must rest as well upon the Nation, which should, long ago, have taken stock of this undeveloped, native-born human asset.

The Appalachian mountaineers hold a unique place in the history of this country. Their ancestors were among the pioneers of liberty. The mountaineers turned the tide of battle at King's Mountain and Cowpens, and made possible the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. History records their bravery and valor. The names of Sevier, Campbell, Shelby and Boone are remembered; yet tens of thousands of the mountain descendants of revolutionary patriots who fought with those leaders have been practically lost to the Nation for nearly two hundred years. Through no fault of their own, they have been isolated by geographic conditions and poverty from the outside world; and though cut off from education and progress, and as President Frost of Berea says—"more destitute of all the opportunities that go with progress and education than any other people of our race in the world," these mountain people still preserve many of the finest traits of the Anglo-Saxon race, and possess the undaunted loyalty of their English-American ancestors.

Is it not up to America to see to the educational preparedness of her mountain defenders? They are even now coming down from their coves in answer to her call. There will, of course, be many a qualified mountain enlistee who has made his way through some of the scattered mountain schools, such as the Lincoln Memorial, at Cumberland Gap, Tenn.; Berea and Hindman, Kentucky; Plumtree, Oneida, Christ School, N. C., but they will be as drops in the ocean compared to the thousands that have had no chance in those splendid schools or in any other schools. The question is often asked, Why do not these Southern States take care of their own illiteracy? The reply is: School funds are secured in part by per capita taxation and distributed in proportion to the local population, and in the remote, sparsely settled, poverty-stricken districts enough money cannot be raised to pay efficient teachers and keep the schools open. In view of the unprecedented educational problems and complexities with which these States contend, it seems that the Federal Government, in the present emergency, should take a hand in furnishing of the quick aid that is needed to qualify these belated, loyal citizens for their country's service.

Why not a Cantonment for the mountaineer? The "Moonlight" schools in the Kentucky mountains for adults have proven what can be done with "grown-ups." Mrs. Cora Wilson Stewart, founder of the moonlight schools, says she has known them to learn to read and write within two weeks. As incredible as it may seem, it has been done; and with a training of six months in an Army Cantonment, the mountain boys could be prepared, educationally and otherwise, as soldiers of whom Uncle Sam may well be proud. Why not a few special Mountain Army centers? "Moonlight" and daylight Cantonments, where Federal instruction can be given to the manhood that may be found unqualified for service in the regular Army training camps? They have had some practice in shooting to be sure, for it is a mountaineer's boast that he can always shoot a squirrel through the eye. Why not a Hun? Give him a chance to try his hand in that direction, at least. Surely it seems a timely opportunity for the Nation as well as for the Mountaineer, that training centers for their preparedness be made a part of the great Cantonment program. Let us not only have mountain Cantonments for soldiers, but "centres" for the training of the sturdy mountain girls for nurses! Uncle Sam needs this native element as never before, and there are "war mothers"; and many willing workers in the field ready to help with garnering of a mighty army of home defenders from the Highlands of our Southern Appalachian Mountains.

Letters to the Editor

In this department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

BISHOP JONES' LETTER OF RESIGNATION.

Mr. Editor: Thoughtful and intelligent clergymen, I have no doubt, experienced positive pain in reading the letter of resignation of the Bishop of Utah.

Straws in the current show the direction in which the river flows, and the utterances of the Bishop of Utah on various occasions show indisputably the actual animus of the man in regard to this whole question.

It is charitable to infer that the Bishop is guilty of self-deception, and that this "camouflage" (verbal) may be honestly used by him in consequence of the possibilities of the human mind in this direction under strong temptation.

The evil of passing over the wording of his resignation unnoticed resides in the fact that if his literal statement is true, he is a martyr to high principle and courage of personal conviction, rather than the victim of moral blindness and personal prejudice.

There are many people who do not think deeply who will accept the assertions of the Bishop of Utah at their face value. He practically asserts that the noble band of men who constitute our House of Bishops are in "favor of war," and are narrow and intolerant toward him as indicated by the restriction of his privilege as "a leader" of his Diocese. His whole statement is utterly unjust and should not pass without question.

It is well said by a recent writer, "I know of no clearer index to the character of any man than the way in which he looks at the issues of the great conflict between barbarous militarism and Christian civilization."

Add to this a quotation from the September Forum, which expresses the truth mildly, "It would be difficult, if not impossible, to denounce the German government unjustly or to accuse it of any crime of which it is not guilty, there being no crime known to history which it has not committed."

If a Christian gentleman can argue justly that this national issue, internationally considered, is not a matter of vital import to our Christian republic then the shade of Cain need not blush when he looks the Almighty in the face and says, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

If a Bishop of the Church is blind to the moral and humanitarian status of a case like this, vast in its scope and eternal in its moment, he need not be surprised if the Church fails to recognize his fitness for its leadership. The least he can do is to retire from his office without reflection upon other Bishops of at least a higher humanitarian standard of thought and action.

W. M. WALTON.

Summerton, S. C.

"STRAINING AT A GNAT," ETC.

Mr. Editor: "Straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel" has long passed into the vernacular as a forcible proverb of hypocrisy. The mental picture is vivid of the insincere man gasping, strangling, "straining at a gnat," and later opening his mouth wide to "swallow the camel." A poor substitute would be the clumsy figure of speech of the same man slowly "straining out the gnat." No wonder English speaking people for three hundred years have preferred the former translation as it now is in the Authorized King James Version of the Scriptures. Other changes of beloved and accustomed phraseology are not likely to prove more popular. Notably, why omit the "imprecatory psalms" from the Psalter of the Book of Common prayer, if, as we have been taught for thousands of years, they are a part of the Word of God, inspired by His Holy Spirit? After all, may they not have been put there to remind us that while St. John, by the same Spirit, tells us that "God is Love," St. Paul says, "Our God is a consuming fire," and that "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God"? The present world conditions seem to confirm this idea. If Gerizzim smiles upon one side of our way, Ebal rises threateningly opposite, while Calvary alone is our sure refuge.

It seems regrettable that the committees of the English and American churches should feel impelled at this time to plan changes, or the omission of these imprecatory Psalms from their accustomed place in the church service. Such omission seems like "straining at the gnat" of unpleasant phrases and "swallowing the camel" of disregard of the inspired Word of God. The exact words of the Book of Common Prayer are embalmed in the hearts of generations, to many of whom any change whatever would be as unwelcome as an attempt "to paint the lily, to gild refined gold or add a perfume to the violet!"

The Great Commission

Deaconess Knapp in Tokyo.

Miss Julia C. Emery.

Deaconess Knapp, formerly Dean of St. Faith's Training School for Deaconesses, New York, who went out to Japan last fall, has taken up her abode at No. 1 Tsukiji, Tokyo, in the large house on the end of the property recently purchased for the new St. Luke's Hospital. The house stands on the site of the old American Legation, and has ample grounds around it. The lower floor of the building is now used, and most actively, by the Tokyo Chapter of the Red Cross for its headquarters and work-rooms, and Deaconess Knapp and her Japanese pupil and friend, Miss Saito, find a delightful home in one wing of the fine old mansion.

In November they gave a house warming, which was largely attended by American, English and Japanese, and through her residence in the house the deaconess is able to serve as hostess, coming into daily contact through the Red Cross with large numbers of the English speaking community in Tokyo.

Miss Saito is at work in Miss Tsuda's school, and is making some most agreeable English speaking Japanese friends.

Deaconess Knapp has already reached the point where she must choose the most vital things, and decline those less pressing. Her classes number more than fifty individuals, and include doctors and nurses of St. Luke's Hospital and government officials. With English speaking Japanese she can give advanced instruction on religious and social service lines; but she paints an attractive picture of herself seated with gentle Japanese ladies at her tea table, and, by means of sacred pictures and her own few words of Japanese, dwelling with them upon the things of Christ.

It is not strange that the thankfulness of her heart should impel her to close a recent letter with the words, "I do not want to write any letter about my new and wonderful work without thanking my friends for their prayers. It is the great volume of prayer which is being offered in many quarters which is my great support."

A Day of Intercession at the Missions House.

To strengthen the missions of the Church in this time of bewildering opportunity we shall observe Friday, February the first, as a Day of Intercession.

Though the business of the office will go forward without interruption, prayers and intercessions will be offered in the chapel throughout the day for the propagation of the gospel, the welfare of the workers, and the safe return of the President of the Board.

Beginning at nine o'clock there will be a celebration of the Holy Communion, after which intercessions will be continued until five o'clock by various members of the office force.

At Noonday Prayers there will be a short address. The officers ask that you will remember us in your prayers that day. If you happen to be in the neighborhood of the Missions House we shall, of course, look for you to join with us in our supplications.

Church Intelligence

A cable received at the Missions House from Bishop Lloyd, presumably from Monrovia, reads, "Comfortable passage." A later cable, dated Monrovia, Africa, reads, "Interesting reception."

English Services in Japan: Every year sees an increasing number of tourists going to the Orient. Church people visiting Japan will be glad to know that they will find English services as follows:

In Tokyo: Holy Trinity Cathedral, Tsukiji, Holy Communion, 8 A. M.; Morning Prayer and sermon, 11 A. M.; Evening Prayer, 6 P. M.

In Kyoto: St. Mary's Church, Okazaki, near Miyako, Holy Communion, 8 A. M.; Evening Prayer and sermon, 4 P. M.

Archbishop of York.

Most Rev. Coemo Gordon Lang, Archbishop of York, will visit the United States in March as the guest of the War Commission of the Episcopal Church. It will be his first visit to the United States, and the second time that an English Archbishop has come to this country. It is expected that the Archbishop will arrive in time to speak in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on March 3.

The War Commission of the Episcopal Church at the present time is raising a fund of $500,000 for religious work in camps both in this country and in France. Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, Bishop of Massachusetts, is Chairman of this Commission.

The present Archbishop of York is the eighty-ninth to hold this position in the Church of England. In the House of Lords, in precedence, he is outranked only by the King, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord High Chancellor.

The present Archbishop of York is considered one of the ablest speakers in the House of Lords. He is the son of a Presbyterian clergyman, his father having been Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. He was formerly Bishop of Spetney, and Preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral in London. He became Archbishop of York in 1908.

While in this country the Archbishop will visit Boston, Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Baltimore and Washington, where he will preach on Easter Sunday. The present plan is that the Archbishop will speak at the noon-day services at Trinity Church in New York during all the week of his arrival.

A hotel for American women in Paris has been opened by the War Work Council of the Young Women's Christian Association. The building is the well-known Hotel Petrograd, formerly Hotel St. Petersburg, 33 rue Caumartin, near the Madeleine and the Opera.

The house accommodates two hundred and twenty-five and is available to all American women engaged in war relief work. The house is already filled with women in uniform—workers of the Red Cross, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Fatherless Children of France and other relief associations. A social room and evening entertainments for both men and women make the house a center for American life.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of Mrs. Landon R. Mason.

Mrs. Lucy Ambler Mason, wife of the Rev. Dr. Landon R. Mason, rector emeritus of Grace Church, Richmond, died suddenly at her home on Thursday afternoon, January 17. While Mrs. Mason had been in ill health for some time, her death was very sudden and unexpected, and a great shock to her family and friends.

The funeral services were held from Grace Church on Saturday morning and were conducted by the Rev. William H. Burkhardt, rector, assisted by Bishop Gibson and Bishop Brown. Interment was in Hollywood.

Mrs. Mason was Miss Lucy Ambler, daughter of the Rev. John Ambler and Anna Mason, and was born in Fauquier County. She was married to Rev. Landon Randolph Mason November 9, 1875, and is survived by Dr. Mason and six children: Miss Lucy Randolph Mason and Mrs. Taylor Burke; of Alexandria, and Lieutenant Randolph Fitzhugh Mason, of Camp Lee; John Ambler Mason, of Baltimore, and Lieutenant Landon Randolph Mason, of the English Royal Engineers, now fighting near Jerusalem.

Mrs. Mason had lived in Richmond for twenty-six years, and was known and beloved all over the city as a friend of the poor and needy, regardless of creed or race. No call for help was ever refused by her. She was President of the Virginia Mission for Lepers, and her work for these unfortunate people was untiring.

Service for Deaf Mutes: About fifty-five deaf people of Richmond and vicinity with their children assembled in the Parish House of St. Andrew's Church, for a Christmas social on the evening of December 28. A brief service and address by the Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf, was followed by the distribution of gifts and the serving of refreshments. Credit for the success of the social is due Mrs. R. L. Chiles, the city visitor to the deaf, and her assistants, and it is hoped that it may become a regular feature of the work in Richmond.

The Rev. C. O. Dantzer, pastor of All Souls' Church for the Deaf, Philadelphia, was in Richmond recently and took a service for the Rev. Mr. Merrill in St. Andrew's Sunday afternoon, January 13.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop

In Christ Church, Washington Parish, Washington, D. C., the Rev. David Ransome Covell, rector, on Saturday, January 13, was held a patriotic and religious service of unusual character and interest.

Three flags were presented: A handsome silk American flag in memory of Brevet Brigadier-General Archibald Henderson for thirty-nine years head of the marine corps and for thirty-five years yestryman and senior warden of Christ Church, a church flag as a memorial to the Rev. Kemper Bocock, poet, journalist and loyal Churchman, a service flag in honor of the thirty men who are representing the parish in the national service.

A color guard of marines presented the American flag in true service style. After the acceptance speech by the rector, the whole congregation gave the flag salute, and Joseph Tonneis, of the United States Navy, sang the Star Spangled Banner.

A detachment of sailors unfurled the church and service flags, which were suspended high in the church between the pillars.

Sunday, January 20, the Rev. R. B. Mitchell, a member of the Board of Missions of New York City, and recently returned from a tour of the East, was the preacher at the eleven o'clock service, and also at the Annual Missionary Rally of all the Sunday-schools in the eastern section of town, held at Christ Church this year at 3:30 in the afternoon.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

The General Board of Religious Education has issued a program of patriotic service and a copy for each officer and teacher in the Sunday-schools of the Diocese of Southern Virginia is sent to the superintendents this week with the following letter:

To the Rectors, Officers and Teachers of Our Sunday-Schools.

The Diocesan Board of Religious Education is sending you a program of war activities, arranged by the General Board, and asks that you read it carefully and apply it to your school in such ways as commend themselves to you. We realize that schools differ, and that therefore what works in one does not work in another. We also realize that the program is somewhat indefinite. It could not be otherwise; but it is of great importance that each Sunday-school be linked up by active work to this great world war for righteousness. If plans, other than those in the leaflet, suggest themselves to you, please let the Board have the benefit of them. They may help some others, as this whole problem is in the experimental stage.

Diocesan Board of Religious Education.

The Virginia Episcopal School, located near Lynchburg, opened after the Christmas vacation with seventy-nine scholars. Twenty-five applicants had to be declined for lack of room. Every nook and corner of the school is full and the health and general condition of the scholars are excellent, all starting in with vigor and enthusiasm. The new chapel is well under way and will fill a great need for this school. It is of colonial architecture, matching the present large building, and fitting in with the general scheme of the plan. The chapel will seat about two hundred.

The temporary gymnasium has been completed and fills a great need at the school, especially during this prolonged bad weather. The boys spend much time in this building.

The new bridge spanning the ravine has been completed. This makes the approach to the school much more delightful. The new athletic field is also under construction.

Things are moving along splendidly at this institution and all interested are greatly encouraged at its progress.

The Convocational Board of Religious Education met in Lynchburg on Friday, January 11. The Rev. T. D. Lewis, of Sweetbriar, is Chairman and the Rev. T. F. Opie, of Pulaski, Secretary.

While the various branches of work were considered the Board devoted most of the time to discussing arrangements for the next Summer School to be held in Lynchburg in June. The Lynchburg local committee, together with the Board, are making timely provision as to faculty and place of meeting, with the determination to make this the best of Summer Schools of Southwest Virginia.

The Ministers' Association of Bristol, Va., on learning of the resignation of the Rev. Hunter Davidson, who has removed to Kent Island, Md., adopted resolutions of regret at his departure and of high appreciation of his work in Bristol and of his character and worth. Mr. Davidson had been a member of the Ministers' Association and at one time its President.

Bishop Tucker has designated two of the Diocesan Clergymen to serve as voluntary chaplains, one at Camp Lee and the other at Hampton and Newport News.

SOUTHERN FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., Bishop

Annual Convocation.

The twenty-sixth annual Convocation of Southern Florida was held in St. Luke's Cathedral, Orlando, on January 8-10. The opening service was held at 8 P. M. on the 8th, Evening Prayer being said by the Rev. James H. Davet, of Bartow, and the Rev. F. E. Alleyne, of DeLand.

Bishop Mann's official address to Convocation was received with closest interest. He set forth clearly the present conditions of the various phases of Church work in this large district, for both white and colored people, and for both earnest work carried on along important lines, pastoral and institutional.

Among many important points emphasized by the Bishop was his earnest desire that Southern Florida should take steps toward becoming an independent Diocese instead of a missionary district, the chief obstacle now being the endowment fund necessary before effecting this change.

Immediately after this service the formal organization of Convocation was briefly made, the one committee then appointed being that on credentials, consisting of the Rev. F. A. Shore, of Arcadia, and the Rev. W. W. Williams, of St. Petersburg.

Convocation assembled for business at 9:30 A. M. on January 9. The Rev. G. A. Ottman was appointed secretary and Rev. W. B. Curtis as his assistant.

A telegram of affectionate greeting and hearty good wishes was sent to Bishop Gray. The following officers were reappointed:

Treasurer—Mr. Frederic H. Rand, Sanford.

Registrar—Very Rev. J. G. Glass.
Council of Advice—Very Rev. J. G. Glass, Rev. A. S. Peck, Mr. A. Haden, Dr. E. M. Hyde.

The report of the Treasurer, Mr. F. H. Rand, was received with interest, as was that of Rev. R. P. Cobb, rector of the Cathedral School. Convocation passed a unanimous resolution of gratitude to Rev. and Mrs. Cobb for their splendid work at this school.

The following delegates were elected to the Provincial Synod, which is to be held in Louisville next November: Clerical, the Very Rev. James G. Glass, Rev. C. E. Patillo, D. D., of Tampa; Rev. G. A. Ottmon, of Ocala, and Rev. S. F. Reade, of Fort Pierce. Lay delegates, Messrs. L. H. Lothridge, of Tampa; Captain George McConnell, of DeLand; C. S. Crook, of St. Petersburg, and A. D. West, of Mulberry.

Luncheon was served on the 9th and the 10th to all delegates of Convocation and of the Auxilliary.

At the afternoon session a helpful address was given by the Rev. L. G. Wood, Field Secretary of the Board of Missions, in behalf of the diocesan movement for a wider use of the Duplex Envelope System through a general "every-member canvass." Convocation attested hearty approval of such plan by unanimous rising vote, the date and details to be later decided by Bishop Mann, with Rev. Messrs. Wood and Patton.

In the evening a delightful reception was held by Bishop and Mrs. Mann at Bishopstead.

After the Holy Communion and Morning Prayer a final business session was held on January 10. Plans were discussed for completing the Diocesan endowment fund, and decision made for vigorous action in effort to accomplish this within the year, enabling the next Convocation to petition the General Convention of 1919 to make Southern Florida a Diocese.

The next Convocation will be held at Sanford.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Women's Missionary Organizations Meet.

At the governor's house there was held on January 11 an inspiring meeting of all the women's missionary organizations of Raleigh, the wife of the governor, Mrs. F. N. Bickett, presiding. This meeting was held under the auspices of the Auxilliary branches of Christ Church and the Church of the Good Shepherd, and the music room and halls of the executive mansion were crowded. The general theme was "The Need of the Times: A Great Missionary Advance," and representatives from the Presbyterian, Baptist, Roman Catholic, Methodist, Lutheran, Christian and Episcopal Missionary Societies and from the three colleges for women in Raleigh spoke. Mrs. Bickett spoke on "The Plattsburg of the Missionary Advance," and urged attendance in June at the Blue Ridge Missionary Conference—the Missionary Education Movement Conference nearest this part of the country.

The meeting closed with prayer and the National anthem.

WEST TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

Associate Mission, Kenedy.

Some months ago Bishop Capers organized an Associate Mission, with Kenedy as the center, including Beeville, Karnes City and Runge, and placed the Rev. Upton B. Bowden in charge. The work is growing steadily and there is promise of it soon becoming one of the strong centers of Church life in the Diocese.

On the morning of the Feast of the Epiphany, the Bishop dedicated the Hutcheson Memorial Rectory at Kenedy. The Bishop celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Bowden, and preached in St. Matthew's Church to a large congregation, which included members of the churches in Runge and Karnes City.

At the close of the service the Bishop, minister and vested choir led the congregation to the rectory, where the Bishop delivered a brief historical address, in which he stated that the building had been erected by money bequeathed by the late Rev. Dr. Hutcheson for that purpose. Dr. Hutcheson was born of English parents on Eleuthera Island (one of the Bahamas), October 31, 1831. He graduated from the Virginia Theological Seminary in the class of 1854. Ordered deacon in 1854 by Bishop Meade of Virginia, and priested by Bishop Whittingham of Maryland in 1855. Of the sixty-three years of his ministry forty-six were spent in Texas, of which forty were in the Missionary District and Diocese of West Texas. The Bishop further stated that the lot on which the rectory stands was purchased with funds raised by Mr. Percy Harriman, and that the property stood free of all encumbrances; the title to the same being vested in "the Bishop and Standing Committee" in trust for the mission. After the address the Bishop presented the keys of the building to Mr. Bowden, formally placing the building in his charge and keeping. He then solemnly dedicated the home to the purpose for which it was erected.

News Notes From San Antonio.

Two camp chaplains are now at work in San Antonio, the Rev. Lee W. Heaton and the Rev. Dwight Cameron. Chaplain Cameron is working at Kelly Field, the Aviation Camp. His salary is being paid by the Church of the Transfiguration, New York City, where he served as curate. With the Clergy of the city co-operating, a distinct advance is being made in caring for the approximately 125,000 soldiers in and near San Antonio.

A service flag has recently been dedicated in St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, the Rev. W. B. Stevens, Ph. D., rector, with eighty stars on it, two of them in gold for men who have given their lives for their country.

On Wednesday, January 2nd, a luncheon was tendered General J. W. Luckman by all the Clergy of the city, as a testimonial to his vigorous and high-minded stand on vice conditions in San Antonio. Bishop Capers presided, and addresses of appreciation were made by clergymen representing all the religious bodies in the city.

Announcement has been made of the San Antonio Teacher Training School, which will be held for a period of fifteen weeks, and will have its sessions in the parish house of St. Mark's Church. The courses will include one on "Child Study and Pedagogy," by Miss Edna McNeil, one on "The Christian Year," with the Rev. Leonard B. Richards as instructor, and one on "Christian Missions," with the Rev. W. B. Stevens, Ph. D., as instructor.

San Antonio Church people deeply regret the departure of the Rev. R. Y. Barber, city missionary, who has left to take charge of Grace Church, Chanute, Kansas. Mr. Barber has done most effective work as city missionary, and has also had charge of St. John's Church, St. Philip's colored congregation, and has been chaplain of the Southwestern Asylum for the Insane.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

St. Michael's Mission.

The staff of workers at St. Michael's Mission for the Arapahoes, Wind River Reservation, Wyoming, has just been augmented by the addition of a number of competent teachers, who are re-adjusting the work and grading the schools under the direction of Mrs. B. S. Cooper. Mrs. Cooper has rendered invaluable service to St. Michael's from the moment of its origin, both in actual work in the establishment of the Mission and in interesting the friends of Wyoming in this noble cause looking to the welfare of the Arapahoe. Mrs. Cooper is now in charge of the teaching and house force. Her home, the Glebe House, is the social center at which teachers and scholars find a ready welcome.

The Rev. Rowland F. Philbrook, in charge of the work of Christ Church, Glenrock, has been elected Secretary of the Glenrock Commercial Club.

The Rev. S. A. Huston, rector of St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, was in Washington, D. C., attending a Conference of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, December 19, 1917. Mr. Huston attended this Conference as President of the Wyoming State Board of Education, inasmuch as State Commissioner Creager was unable to be present. As a result of the Conference the Adjutant General requested the co-operation and assistance of the Federal Board in developing some plan

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. W. S. Trowbridge has accepted the call to become rector of the Church of the Holy Faith, Santa Fe. Recently he has been acting as Archdeacon, with residence at Albuquerque. But for several years has been Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Michigan City, Indiana. In becoming rector of the Church of the Holy Faith, he takes work at a place full of attractive, historic associations, and where there is an important field of labor.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Church War Commission: A Diocesan Committee has been formed, consisting of seven prominent clergymen and eleven laymen, to co-operate with the Church War Commission in raising that part of the $500,000 Fund for Church Work in the Camps, Cantonnments and over the seas, which has been apportioned to the Diocese of Pittsburgh. The Rev. E. S. Travers, rector of Trinity Church, is chairman of the committee; the Rev. Dr. H. A. Flint, of the Church of the Nativity, Crafton, secretary, and Mr. Henry has set $23,000 ashrdlueaincmfwypp Chalfant, treasurer. The committee Diocese, and is busily engaged in distributing literature and laying plans for a grand ingathering from every Parish and mission in the Diocese, on Sunday, January 24.

St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh, the Rev. E. H. Ward, D. D., rector, has been sadly bereaved in the last two or three months by the death of its senior and junior wardens, Messrs. Harvey Childs, Jr., and Samuel R. Patterson and that of another vestryman, George N. Munro, Esq. Mr. Childs was senior warden for fifteen years, and Mr. Patterson junior warden for thirteen years. Mr. Munro was the oldest member of the congregation, having reached the ripe age of eighty-four years.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Death of the Rev. Dr. Duhring.

The Rev. Herman Duhring, D. D., well known throughout the Church in the United States, died in Philadelphia, Pa., on December 30, after a long illness, aged 77 years.

Dr. Duhring was born in Philadelphia, where he received his early education. He was a student at the Virginia Theological School from 1860 to 1861, when that institution was closed until the end of the Civil War. He completed his course at Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, received his degree in 1863 and was ordained a Deacon and appointed assistant at Holy Trinity Chapel, Philadelphia. He was advanced to the Priesthood in 1868, and became the rector of All Saints' Church, where he continued in charge until 1888, when he was elected Rector Emeritus. In 1889 he was elected Superintendent of the Episcopal City Mission, which position he held until the time of his death. He was a member of the General Board of Religious Education, Dean of the Convocation of South Philadelphia. Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday-School Association, and had been the Editor of the American Church Sunday-School Magazine from 1905 to 1915.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. H. L. Burleson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. P. Remington, D. D., Suffragan.

Consecration of Bishop Remington.

The Rev. William Proctor Remington, D. D., was consecrated Bishop Suffragan of the Missionary District of South Dakota on Thursday morning, January 10, in St. Paul's Church, Minneapolis, Minn., in the presence of a large number of the clergy and laity of the Diocese, and of a congregation which crowded the church to the limit of its seating capacity. Holy Communion was celebrated at 8 o'clock by the Very Rev. Edwin B. Woodruff, Dean of Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls, S. D., and formerly rector of St. Clement's Church, St. Paul, and Morning Prayer was said at 9:30 by the Rev. Stanley S. Kilbourne, rector of Gethsemane Church, Minneapolis. The Consecration Service began at 10:30 with the processional hymn, "Glorious Things of Thee Are Spoken." The Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Church, was the celebrant of the service of the Holy Communion, and presided at the office of consecration. The Rt. Rev. John Poyntz Tyler, D. D., Missionary Bishop of North Dakota, read the Epistle, and the Rt. Rev. Frank Arthur McElwain, Bishop of Minnesota, read the Gospel. The Rt. Rev. Charles David Williams, D. D., Bishop of Michigan, was the preacher, taking for his text St. Mark 10:42-45.

The Bishop-Suffragan-elect was presented by the Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, D. D., Bishop of South Dakota, and the Rt. Rev. Irving P. Johnson, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Colorado. The Certificate of Election was read by the Rt. Rev. Theodore P. Thurston, D. D., Bishop of Eastern Oklahoma, and formerly rector of St. Paul's Church, Minneapolis; the Evidence of Ordination, by the Rev. George S. Keller, a member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Minnesota; the Testimonial of the Bishops, by the Rev. Alfred G. Pinkham, Secretary of the Standing Committee; the Consent of the Standing Committees, by Mr. Charles B. Lyon, a member of the Standing Committee. After the Promise of Conformity, the Litany was said by Bishop Burleson.

The Consecrators were Bishops Tuttle, McElwain and Tyler; Bishops Williams, Thurston, Johnson and Burleson took part in the laying on of hands. The attending Presbyters were the Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis, and the Rev. Edward M. Cross, rector of St. John the Evangelist's Church, St. Paul. The Rev. Frederick D. Tyner was the Master of Ceremonies.

At the close of the service luncheon was served to the guests in the Parish House, at which short talks were made by Bishops Tuttle, Burleson, Johnson, Williams, McElwain and Thurston, the Rev. Dr. Dewey, pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church, Minneapolis, and Mrs. Remington.

Bishop Remington made an earnest and appropriate response to all that had been said.

The night following his consecration Bishop Remington left for Camp McPherson, Atlanta, Ga., to resume his duties as Chaplain of Base Hospital No. 26, the University of Minnesota Unit. On his return from service in France he will take up his work in South Dakota.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Churches of New York are hard hit by the coal order. Far more than had been supposed were found to be without adequate supply, and some with coal on hand felt the Government order covered them. Hence, on the first Sunday some churches omitted services, and almost all cut out weekday meetings. The holiday Mondays were promptly taken advantage of to appeal for Church workers and to train them. There was doubling up of accommodations, churches loan heated rooms to civic societies and the opposite. The steam-heating plants, designed to supply large numbers of buildings, failed in scores of instances. So far as heard from there were no protests from churches or Church officers, but immediate consent to obey the Garfield order, and to do so to the end.

The Church's Contribution to War Work: The Rev. Dwight Cameron, of the staff of the Church of the Transfiguration; the Rev. Dr. G. C. Houghton, rector, and Miss Amy Hore, private secretary to Bishop Lloyd, are the latest Church contributions of workers to the war. The parish continues the salary of Mr. Cameron, and he is stationed as volunteer chaplain at Anniston, Ala. Miss Hore goes to the ordnance department for special work. The Rev. John G. Mabry, at one time member of Calvary parish staff, is reported to hold a commission in a newly formed tank regiment already in France. The commission is a military one.

The Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires, speaking on general missions in St. Thomas' Church on the third Sunday of this month, answered indirectly some of the assertions, then just, made by United States Senator Chamberlain, of Oregon, to the effect that our Government has failed in its entire war program. He had for part of his text an expression from a New Testament verse about turning the world upside down. "Some things were made to go upside down," observed Dr. Stires, "and often the wrong way, in our opinion, is the way God determines to be the right way. Besides," he added, "some things turned upside down soon adjust themselves to the new method and go better than before. Because everything is not prepared in a few months we are not to conclude that a democratic form of government is a failure, or that we should have spent the last twenty years getting on a military preparedness basis. A democracy is flexible, but while it sometimes fails at the outside it always succeeds in the end as other methods do not. I take a hopeful view. Men and women who live for ten years will witness such changes for the better as it were worth while to live to see. More than that, the men and women who are permitted to have part in the Christian work of the coming decade are to be envied."

The Home and Foreign Mission Boards of the United States and Canada, meeting through their executives in New York last week, found Foreign Mission gifts of the societies of the two countries named to have been $20,405,000, or almost exactly the amount of the preceding year. There was a very slight decline in American societies, but those in Canada increased $100,000 in incomes. The home figures were not compiled in time to be presented. Secretary John R. Mott, speaking at the dinner of the united societies, asked for sympathy for Russia and missionary co-operation. There was a generally hopeful outlook on the part of all of the secretaries, first that incomes will not fall off this coming year, and second, that for societies to take the lead in helping Red Cross, European relief and even Liberty Bonds will not be to the prejudice but rather to the help of their respective societies. It was pointed out that British and Scotch societies have increased their incomes year after year since the war began.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Custis Fletcher, formerly rector of Christ Church, Temple, Texas, will, on February 1, take up his duties as rector of Grace Church, Paducah, Ky.

As has been previously noted in our columns, the Rev. Walter Lowrie, rector of St. Paul's Church, Rome, Italy, having found it necessary to return to America, the Rev. Roy Irving Murray has been appointed minister-in-charge during his absence.

The Rev. Daniel LeBaron Goodwin, formerly of Laporte, Ind., has entered upon his work as rector of St. Peter's Parish, Lakewood, Ohio.

The Rev. Oliver M. Fisher, of Youngsville, Pa., has accepted the call to the rectorship of St. Stephen's Church, Rochester, N. Y., and will take charge immediately.

The Rev. H. C. Stone, founder of the Stoneman's Fellowship, Philadelphia, has received a chaplain's commission from Governor Brumbaugh and will work among the Pennsylvania troops in France. During his absence the Fellowship will be governed by a board of seven, with Mr. F. P. Coggeshal as chairman.

The Very Rev. Robert K. Massie, D. D., Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., has recovered his health and resumed his duties.

The Rev. James Williams, of Astoria, N. Y., has been appointed minister-in-charge of the Church of the Holy Cross, Brooklyn, N. Y., and will commence his duties there on February 1.

The Rev. Edward H. Eckel, assistant minister of St. John the Evangelist Church, St. Paul, Minn., will succeed the Rev. Edward L. Roland as rector of St. Paul's Church, Minneapolis, Minn. Mr. Roland has accepted the rectorship of St. Bartholomew's Church, Chicago.

Ordinations.

In St. Paul's Church, Springfield, Ill., on St. Thomas' Day, the Rev. Messrs. Henry Herbert Firth and Egbert Adolphus Craig (colored) were advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Sherwood. The candidates were presented by Archdeacon Edward Haughton, rector of the Parish, and the sermon was preached by Archdeacon John C. White. The Rev. W. F. Dawson, of St. Peter's, Chesterfield, and the Rev. Arthur Wilson, of St. Barnabas, Havana, assisted in the service. The Rev. Mr. Firth will continue his work as rector of St. Paul's, Carlinville, and Mr. Craig will continue to be priest-in-charge of St. Luke's, Springfield.

On Sunday, December 30, in Trinity Cathedral, Omaha, Nebraska, the Bishop of Nebraska ordained to the diaconate Mr. Henry F. Selcer and Mr. William D. Foley, of the senior class at Seabury Divinity School. The Dean of the Cathedral and the Rev. A. H. Marsden presented the candidates, and the Dean preached the sermon. After their graduation in May, Messrs. Selcer and Foley will be assigned to work in the Diocese of Nebraska.

On Sunday, December 30, in St. James Church, South Bend, Ind., the Rt. Rev. John H. White, D. D., advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Ray Everett Carr, who was presented by the Rev. H. R. White, of St. James. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.

Deaths.

The Ven. Charles J. Sniffen, Archdeacon of the Diocese of Western Massachusetts since 1906, and Associate Editor of The Witness, died suddenly in Greenfield, Mass., on Saturday, January 5. Funeral services were conducted in St. Paul's Church, Stockbridge, by Bishop Johnson, of Missouri, assisted by the Rev. Arthur Gammack and the Rev. George Granville Merrill. The interment took place at Stafford, Conn., Bishop Johnson and Bishop Acheson officiating.

Deposition.

Notice is hereby given that on Saturday, December 22, 1917, in the Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, Washington, D. C., and in the presence of the Rev. Dr. William L. DeVries, Canon of Washington, and the Rev. D. Wellington Curran, I did pronounce and record the deposition from the ministry of this Church of Thomas Hubert-Jores, Presbyter, under the provisions of Canon XXXIII, Section 1, he having declared in writing his renunciation of the ministry of this Church.

Alfred Harding,
Bishop of Washington.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

This is the final week in the campaign of education on behalf of the War Commission of the Church before the great offering from all the congregations of the country to support the Commission's work is gathered on next Sunday, January 27th.

The question must naturally have been asked by many persons—what is the relation of the work the War Commission proposes to do to that of the Y. M. C. A., for which the people of the churches already have given so generously?

The most concise answer to that question is found in the War Commission's Bulletin, No. 2. On the back cover of that bulletin is this letter from Mr. John R. Mott, the executive head of the International Y. M. C. A.:

"Our camps need laymen and clergymen just as much as our towns do. The Y. M. C. A. is a body of laymen. Commissioned and volunteer chaplains are clergymen. Together they represent the Church. Both are indispensable to our army and navy.

"They should seek in every way in their power to support each other. The Association cannot perform the functions of the Clergy. Its desire and purpose is to strengthen the hands of the Clergy in every way in its power."

In more detail, the bulletin says:

The United States Government equips its surgeons and paymasters, but does not appropriate a dollar for the equipment of its chaplains. The Church must do it.

The Episcopal Church must have $500,000 for war work for 1918. The Church must follow its seventy odd thousand boys and men to the camps across the seas, and to the trenches. They must feel that their Church as well as their country is back of them.

This bulletin tells exactly how the Church's War Commission Fund will be used. Every dollar contributed will be devoted to actual war work.

Commissioned chaplains must be equipped. It will cost $100,000.

The chaplain has nothing but his commission. He needs service books and an altar. In France his regiment of 3,600 men is billeted in villages along five, ten and fifteen miles; he needs a Ford car or motorcycle.

He is the personal friend of the men: when pay is late he lends them small sums and is repaid on pay-day.

He writes letters for the men, hence his need for a typewriter.

The chaplain is the postmaster of the regiment, its censor, statistician and banker.

In his daily visits at the hospital gifts of delicacies, cigarettes, chewing gum, story books and printed prayers are in demand.

If his regiment is at a distance from the Y. M. C. A., he needs a regimental tent, a film machine and a talking machine.

Every day brings to the Commission's office requests from chaplains in this country and France for items of equipment.

The War Commission must supply it.

The Church War Commission will supply voluntary chaplains to aid commissioned chaplains. It will cost $100,000.

The number of commissioned chaplains is at present utterly inadequate for an army of two million men. The Church must supplement the chaplains with volunteers whose special charge will be the Churchmen in the service.

To-day camps of 30,000 and 40,000 men have only six or eight chaplains, and scores of camps and posts have no chaplains at all.

The Church War Commission is placing strong clergymen in camps throughout the country as volunteer chaplains. They are there with the cordial approval of the commandants. They work in co-operation with the Y. M. C. A., in whose tents they often live.

Dr. Manning, rector of Trinity in New York, is now voluntary chaplain at Camp Upton; Bishop Capers, of West Texas, is in charge at the San Antonio Camp. Many of the strongest men in the Church are doing this great service.

The Church War Commission Fund will maintain a register of all members of the Church who are in the national service. It will cost $5,000 to do it.

The great Honor Roll of the Church, drawn from all the Parishes in the country, is being card catalogued in the office of the War Commission.

These names and addresses of the tens of thousands of Churchmen and boys are for the use of the Clergy and parents.

The War Commission by its many connections with the camps, its agencies here and in France, will, as far as military regulations allow, help parents, relatives and friends to gain information as to where our boys are and how they are getting along.

The Church War Commission will assist Parishes near cantonments. $50,000 is needed for this purpose.

Great camps of 40,000 soldiers are sometimes set alongside a village or small town. The Parish church is naturally overwhelmed.

The Church, through the War Commission, must come to the rescue; we must help the Bishop give the rectors of those churches the assistance of men well-fitted for the work.

As illustrations, the church at Spartanburg, South Carolina, and the church at Vallejo, California, near the great Mare Island Navy Yard, are able to minister effectively to the thousands of soldiers and sailors who test the capacity of the buildings at every service.

The Commission is planning similar reinforcement at many points.

The War Department is tying together and directing all the co-operating agencies of the Church engaged in war work. $95,000 is needed for this.

Through the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the Commission is placing in all the larger camps laymen who are above draft age.

These men, a number of whom are men of large business training, are making this patriotic sacrifice of their time. The Y. M. C. A. has given them the status of secretaries; they thus come into the closest personal touch with the men and boys of the Church.

The War Commission must carry its work overseas. $100,000 is required for this.

The year 1918 will see a great American army fighting in France. The War Commission is already represented overseas by Bishop McCormick, of Western Michigan.

The need for voluntary chaplains and other assistance of the Church on the battle-line will become increasingly great. The Church must carry its ministry and sacraments to the men who are ready to go "over the top."

Promptness is the essence of war strategy. Confident of the support of the Church, the War Commission has already begun work.

William Lawrence, Chairman,

James De Wolf Perry, Jr.,

Executive Officer.

The Church War Commission.

The National Commissioner of Internal Revenue is asking the co-operation of the Clergy in impressing upon their people the duty of paying their income tax cheerfully and promptly as a patriotic duty. The commissioner says:

"The Treasury Department requires the immediate response of over six million citizens who have not been asked, heretofore, to pay a tax on their personal incomes. They have bought Liberty Bonds and War Savings Stamps as a safe and profitable investment, but now they must do more. The income tax section of the new war revenue law increases from about 465,000 to more than six millions the number of persons who are called to pay a percentage of their incomes towards the government's needs. Some may not welcome this opportunity, so new and unfamiliar to them. They may not respond promptly and cheerfully, unless they feel—

"That such tax contribution is their patriotic duty, even privilege.

"That they owe this duty to their government and to justice and righteousness.

"That they owe it to 'Our Boys' at the front, who freely offer their lives.

"That to fight for one's country is no more a binding obligation than to help bear the expense of those who fight.

"That lending money to the government, investing in its securities, is not enough—that a direct share of all income should be gladly yielded.

"That the universal brotherhood of man requires consecrated income not less than consecrated lives.

"That the defense of freedom is now a duty and privilege laid upon the American people, to be borne, whatever its cost, for the safety of coming ages.

"Every citizen, whether born on American soil or who came from a foreign land to enjoy American opportunity and freedom, must bear his part of the burden of government which gives him its protection and the blessings of its institutions. No man has a right to these precious things who is not willing to pay his fair share of their cost."

Making war taxes, declares Senator Simmons, puts the legislator in the position of the facetious minister at Ocean Grove, who took a little girl on his knee and said, "I don't love you, Nelly." All the ladies on the breeze-swept veranda laughed, but little Nelly frowned and said firmly: "You've got to love me." "Got to? How so?" asked the minister. "Because," said Nelly, "you've got to love them that hate you—and I hate you!"

			John 4:1-42

With Septuagesima Sunday we make a fresh start in the Church year. We have been looking back to Christmas; we now look forward to Easter and to Lent as preparation for ourselves knowing the power of His resurrection. There is an intensity about the Church's message in Collect, Epistle and Gospel. "Many" are called, but few chosen. Mere work does not count; only the spirit of the workmen. We may "bear the burden and heat of the day" and even then lose out. Hence the necessity of definiteness of aim and complete self-mastery. The more that is realized the greater our humility, and the realization that after all we must throw ourselves on the mercy and goodness of God. The Old Testament lessons in Prayer Book Lectionary are, afternoon, Jer. 22:13 to end, rather too historical for general use and placed by New Lectionary in proper historical connection (first week Lent); and morning, Jer. 5:10—end, very, suitable, but given year I as alternate for this Sunday, and also given year II in historical connection (Sexagesima week). English and Canadian Lectionaries begin Genesis on this Sunday. The New Lectionary gives the story of Joseph as introduction to Lent in year I and for to-day, Hezekiah's reformation. This is psychologically sound, since example is at least as inspiring as precept; needs shortening, however. Perhaps: 29:1-11, 15-29. The second lesson is in keeping with the day: "What shall I do to gain eternal life?" and also leads up to the Gospel. Moreover, the idea of following Christ and of regeneration deepens the reformation thought of the first lesson. The second lesson for the evening is keyed to the same earnestness of other Scriptures. The question, more or less of a speculative character, "Lord, are there few that be saved?" is rebuked with the terrible exhortation, "Agonize to enter in the narrow door." After all is over, many will "seek" to enter, but no power is equal to prizing open the door that yields only to faith and penitence. The Old Testament selection is one of the most striking to be found in the Apocrypha, and is not included in the Prayer Book selections. The idea of passing through a straight entrance into true freedom, the very idea our Lord stresses, is illustrative by a narrow river emptying into the fullness of the sea, and by a narrow pathway leading into a city "full of all good things." The conclusion (verse 28, 29) is a prophecy of the death of the Messiah.

For week days the historical course is continued in the morning, and the Gospel according to St. Mark is begun. In the evening, selected passages from 1 Corinthians are given, touching on true wisdom, necessity of right use of the means of grace and of personal liberty, right relations to our fellow members of the Church, and the meaning of love, which is what the all-day laborers in the vineyard lacked.

C. B. WILMER.

Twilight Sundays.

By Sarah Cecelia Jukes.

Septuagesima, Sexagesima and Quinquagesima Sundays. These three Sundays seem to form a landmark in the Church year. They stand as a witness of no great act; or of no great doctrine; but they are the turning point from the consideration of the birth and early years of our Lord, to the consideration of His suffering, life and death for us men and our salvation. The great fact upon which all teaching previous to the Pre-Lenten Sundays, is the fact of the Incarnation. From now on until Easter-tide, the great fact is the Atonement. These two facts sum up the whole doctrine of the Church of Christ, concerning His mission and His work while here on earth.

We begin during these Sundays to look forward toward Easter, instead of backward to Christmas, and in that journey towards Easter we must pass as did the Master, through the valley of the shadow of His own suffering, life and death.

What do we mean by the Atonement? It is the means whereby Almighty God has brought back fallen man into union with Himself. He did this by sending His only Son, Jesus Christ, to the earth, and to be made man. Man had become sinful; and we read, "the wages of sin is death," but Jesus our Saviour, being God as well as man, being without sin, suffered death for all sin. That we might have a part in this freedom from sin, He instituted a way, a mystical way, by which we might each become a part of His Body. His victory over sin and death is our victory, because we have been made part or members of Him in Holy Baptism. But the death of one person no matter how good he may be cannot pay the penalty of another's sin, even the death of a loving Saviour, cannot atone for our sins, only by sharing in it. We must do our part. God always sends His gifts upon conditions. We must fulfil these conditions if we want to get the benefit of the gift. You will remember God offered to give Solomon anything he liked to ask. Solomon did not ask for riches or a long life, he chose something far better. He asked for wisdom that he might do his duty. This pleased God so much that He promised to give him all the other things as well on Collect for Septuagesima Sunday.

O Lord, we beseech Thee favorably to hear the prayers of Thy people; that we, who are justly punished for our offenses, may be mercifully delivered by Thy goodness, for the glory of Thy name, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

condition that Solomon would walk in His ways and keep His commandments. God's conditions for Holy Baptism are repentance and faith.

Love Unexpressed.

The sweetest notes upon the human heartstrings
Are dull with rust;
The sweetest chords, adjusted by the angels,
Are clogged with dust;
We pipe and pipe again our dreary music
Upon the selfsame strains,
While sounds of crime, and fear, and desolation
Come back in sad refrains.

On through the world we go, an army marching
With listening ears,
Each longing, sighing for the heavenly music
He never hears;
Each longing, sighing for a word of comfort,
A word of tender praise,
A word of love to cheer the endless journey
Of earth's hard, busy days.

They love us and we know it; this suffices
For reason's share;
Why should they pause to give that love expression,
With gentle care?
Why should they pause? But still our hearts are aching
With all the gnawing pain
Of hungry love, that longs to hear the music,
And longs and longs in vain.

We love them, and they know it; if we falter,
With fingers numb,
Among the unused strings of love's expression,
The notes are dumb.
We shrink within ourselves in voiceless sorrow,
Leaving the words unsaid,
And side by side, with those we love the dearest,
In silence on we tread.

Thus on we tread, and thus each heart its fate fulfils,
Waiting and hoping for the heavenly music beyond the distant hills.
The only difference in the love in heaven
From love on earth below
Is: here we love, and know not how to tell it,
And there we all shall know.

Our Daily Bread.

One longing fills my heart, that else
With earthly cravings would o'erflow;
One pure desire within me dwells
Amid desires I would forego.
One longing deep that day by day
Sweeps every lesser wish away.

It is not that I choose no more
Between the shadow and the sun;
That vanities no longer lure;
That sweet and bitter are as one;
But that this longing day by day
Sweeps every lesser wish away.

If now I triumph, now I fail,
Or now attain an inward peace,
If now temptations sore assail,
All things this longing but increase;
And, oh, this longing day by day
All gains, all losses doth outweigh.

It is for Thee, for Thee alone,
Who art beyond all language dear;
In life, in death, Thou only One
Who stoopest low, who drawest near;
For Thee I hunger day by day,
And pray the more, the more I pray.

Come, daily bread of gracious taste;
Sweet manna endlessly supplied;
Thou hidden Joy that cannot waste;
Our Wayside Strength, however tried;
Come, blessed Jesus, day by day,
Lest we should faint beside the way!

Come, God and Saviour, to Thine own;
Revealed to faith's anointed eyes,
Make Thou Thy very presence known,
Though veiled in holy mysteries;
And, oh!—the sum of all I pray—
Sweep Thou at last the veil away!

The Joy of Tithing.

Eugenie Du Maurier.

"Mother, I'm just disgusted with Mrs. Lewis. She's the richest woman in the parish, and she says she won't give us a cake for our Junior Auxiliary tea. I do get so dead tired of goody-goody people who love to hide the little they do under a bushel."

"Why, daughter, I am afraid you are misjudging Mrs. Lewis. I never heard of her being selfish, and as to doing missionary work, don't you know that she has several 'substitutes' in various parts of the world?"

"Yes, mother, I know she has, and the work she does with her club girls is perfectly wonderful. You know that fine girl, Dolores, to whom she has taught Spanish, went last spring to Mexico to teach the little children, and Mrs. Lewis paid her expenses. Dolores has two cousins who are deaconesses, and Dolores went to live with them, of course it was pleasanter and far safer for her to be with them, the girl has done some wonderful work with the little Mexican children. The American consul where Dolores went, turns out to be a college chum of two of Mrs. Lewis' brothers, and the long and short of it is that he fell in love with Dolores, and they were married the day before Christmas. And Juanita, another of Mrs. Lewis' girls, has gone to take Dolores' place. Both these girls knew kindergarten. The work must be fascinating—telling those little ones the story of Jesus' love."

"Well, dear, I do not think that proves

Mrs. Lewis to be selfish. Rather the contrary, and the story about Dolores is beautifully romantic to say the least. He seems to have sent Dolores down into Mexico for some great wise purpose of His own. And in the larger sphere of consul's wife she will be able to do much good. I understand this consul was a minister's son."

"Yes, mother," hesitatingly; "but all these really big things Mrs. Lewis does cannot make me change my opinion about her selfishness. All the Auxiliary girls say the same thing."

"Aren't the girls rather determined to misjudge? But, what reason did Mrs. Lewis give for not giving towards the Auxiliary tea?"

"Oh, she does not believe in raising money for Church work in that way. She believes in tithing. As to tithing I reckon she gives far more than tithing. But what would I give if I tithed?"

"Well, let us see," suggested her mother. "Your father gives you three dollars a month for pin money alone. Did you ever think of tithing that amount?"

Eunice blushed. "No, mother, I never did. Sometimes I've given a dime and sometimes a quarter, but more often nothing. There are always girls to treat, and extras to buy."

"Well, that is something you could give each month. Then there was the ten dollars Uncle Bart sent you for a birthday gift."

Eunice's face was more scarlet than ever.

"And, then the ten dollars Aunt Lucy gave you. Just count up how much that is you might have given during December, at least."

A few days later Eunice and one of the Auxiliary girls were calling at the Home for Invalids, where they had taken flowers, fruits and magazines. Eunice had been doing some writing for one of the crippled ladies while Lois had been darning for another. They had met in the hall to go home, when they heard the noise of several automobiles. Looking from one of the hall windows, they saw a line of them drawn up at the entrance of the home.

"Oh," said an old lady, gleefully, "the cars have come again. Mrs. Lewis said little Jane was to go this time. I hope she's better than she was this morning."

"Well, if Jane's sick you can go in her stead," said a querulous faced woman whose wheel chair was close up to a flower-boxed window.

"Oh, but I went last time," was the answer. "I do wish you could go once, Mrs. Black."

"Not me, thank you, with my aching bones," answered the other.

"'Twould do you good, Mrs. Black; that it would, to see all the improvements in the city since you've been here," cheerily.

"Mayhap, it would. But I'll not leave this house 'til I go out never to come back."

"Oh," said another woman, "don't talk so, Mrs. Black. God wants for us to enjoy the little pleasures He sends us, and Mrs. Lewis gets sad when she sees us down in the dumps. She says we're mistrustin' the Almighty when we keep ourselves rebellious."

"Mrs. Lewis is an angel of mercy to us all," said Blind Nancy.

"Mrs. Lewis," gasped Eunice.

"Yes, she sends her ottermobiles twice a week," said the querulous one.

"But she doesn't know we know who sends 'em, though," said the cheerful one. "She doesn't want us to know."

"But it takes a bunch o' shut-in women like us to ferret it out," chuckled the querulous one.

Eunice and Lois walked thoughtfully away. Presently they stopped at the home of one of Mrs. Lewis' girls, who did wonderfully beautiful bead and basket work.

"Oh," she exclaimed, enthusiastically, "do come in. I've some money for your Auxiliary tea. I've been tithing. Mrs. Lewis taught us, you know, about it in our club. For the matter of that, what hasn't she taught us? She taught me my work that I'm earning my living at, this bead and basket work and my embroidery. And the best of it is that I'm making a good living at it besides being able to stay at home with my invalid mother and old grandmother. Mrs. Lewis is my best customer, too. When I make a sale I put it in a little book, and make out what a tenth of it is. And I have a small jelly glass that I keep it in. The very thought of filling that glass makes me happy. That's what tithing has done for me. I was a mighty sullen kind of a girl until I found Mrs. Lewis to straighten me out. The trouble about my jelly glass is that I can't keep any in it; for I hear so many calls for help from different places. Did you know we'd adopted a little French child? Grandma's knitted some stockings, a cap, a muffler, mittens and a sweater for the poor little tot."

Eunice and Lois thanked Kathleen for her donation, and started on their way. There seemed no ends to the things Mrs. Lewis was doing along lines in which mere money had no place.

"Suppose you and I try tithing, too, Eunice," suggested Lois. "We both spend lots of money on little, foolish things. My allowance comes to-night. I'm going to put by a fifth of it for this month, and a tenth the balance of the year. Won't you, too?"

"Yes, I will," assented Eunice. "I'll begin with the five dollars I have left of what Uncle Bart gave me for my birthday. Think of those girls of Mrs. Lewis' denying themselves to support a war child! We ought to be ashamed of ourselves."

"Well, I am," answered Lois. "Did you know that Mrs. Lewis went several times a week to Washington to teach the soldiers French and Italian?"

"Yes, father told mother at breakfast, he thinks Mrs. Lewis one of the world's wonders."

"I'm sure Mrs. Lewis wouldn't agree with your father, Eunice. I never heard of a more unassuming woman."

The last day of January came. The Junior Auxiliary girls were gathered in the parish house.

"Who ever would have believed such a pile of money could have come from our tithing?" laughed Eunice. "And here's a nice check from Mrs. Lewis, and this short message: 'Isn't the new way more fascinating than the old?'"

"Indeed it is," answered another girl, thoughtfully.

"And I never was so joyously happy in my life," declared another girl.

"Girls," said Lois, "I know we are all doing a great deal of Red Cross work. But, don't you think we might manage to adopt a poor little war child? Mrs. Lewis' girls are going to take a second French child. It seems to me among us we ought to be able to deny ourselves if those girls who have to work for their living can."

"I think so, too," agreed Eunice. "Think of that deaf, crippled, old grandmother of Kathleen's doing so much!"

"Well," teased May, "I reckon being deaf doesn't disable her hands or her mind."

"And certainly not her eagerness to do for others," said Edna.

The first Sunday in February Dr. Collins preached from the text, "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house, and prove me now, herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

Then he told the story of Mrs. Lewis' club of girls, and the Junior Auxiliary girls, and urged his people to begin the system of tithing, as only such giving can bring the greatest joy to the giver, as being most acceptable to the Lord. "Of course many of you can give far more than only a tithe. But do give the tithe first always and as much afterwards as you see fit. As the girls at their last meeting said it made their whole lives different."

"Did you know," asked Lois' mother, when some of the church members waited in the vestibule after service for the rain to cease, "that Mrs. Lewis gives not only one tithe, but nine of them? Oh, no, she did not tell me. She does not even guess that I know. I am simply telling you of the fact because many persons have been criticising Mrs. Lewis for not dressing more fashionably."

"Yes," chimed in Lois, "and for living in an unfashionable neighborhood. She lives in an apartment in one of her own houses near the business section, because it is convenient for her girls to go there. And those girls do have such glorious times there. I went with Kathleen one day last week to visit the club. Those girls never waste one moment. Their hands were occupied all the time, sewing and knitting. And Mrs. Lewis was playing such ravishing music on the 'Strad' she seldom shows us society people. I tell you, Mrs. Lewis' crown is going to be just brilliant with stars of service. Kathleen took me because she wanted me to have a wee glimpse of the enormous amount of good Mrs. Lewis is doing, and of which the world knows nothing. She says all sorts of social service people misjudge because Mrs. Lewis prefers to make no display of what she has accomplished. You see she does not want her light made to shine too brilliantly."

"No wonder Mrs. Lewis always looks so cheery," said Mrs. Placker, "when she is putting so much cheeriness into the lives of other people. Did you know her Christian name is Cheerful Amy?"

"Oh, Mrs. Placker," laughed Eunice. "And that means cheerful friend. And she is that kind of a friend to a wider circle than her club girls," thinking of the old ladies at the Invalids' Home.

"Well, I should say," exclaimed Tommy Collins. "I know more'n any of you think. Well, I do guess!"

How American Red Cross Helped Give Christmas Cheer in France.

American and French soldiers in hospitals and in the trenches in France, and thousands of children in the war zone, received the aid of the American Red Cross in celebrating Christmas.

The American Red Cross provided for a Christmas party and entertainment in every American base hospital, and a Christmas tree in every ward where there were sick and wounded American soldiers and sailors. Every American soldier had a Christmas bag containing tobacco, cigarettes, soap, shoe strings, wash cloth, towel, tooth brush and large handkerchief filled with candy.

Christmas trees were arranged for at some of the training camps. One hundred thousand socks containing gifts were given to the French soldiers in trenches, and fifty thousand Christmas bags were distributed among the wounded.

In two towns the American Red Cross hospitals arranged Christmas parties for the children. The first real old-fashioned, before-the-war kind of Christmas since 1913 was prepared for children of French refugees, cripples and tuberculosis soldiers by the American Red Cross. After three Christmas-less years, the children of the devastated region had almost forgotten to put out wooden shoes, which the French place where American children hang stockings. The American Red Cross sent books, toys, bunnies, dogs and balloons for thirteen hundred children near Ham, Nesle, and Noyon. It provided for the distribution of toys sent by an American newspaper, to six thousand children, and sent thirty-six boxes of toys and clothing to two thousand refugee children south of Verdun.

Extensive preparations were made to bring Christmas cheer to children in many other districts, and to give useful presents to refugees and sick in different hospitals throughout France. Christmas fetes were held in fifteen tuberculosis hospitals, at one of which the soldiers will act a play of their own construction in honor of the American Red Cross. Games, cigarettes and comforts have been sent to twelve schools where war cripples are being trained for new trades. The Society of Friends distributed three-quarters of a ton of American Christmas candy to children in twenty villages where the Quaker groups gave Christmas tree parties.

The Cross of Red.

Over the dying, over the dead
Silently bending; her Cross of Red
No longer a shield from shot and shell,
No longer a truce from ruthless hell;
But wavers she never when sounds the cry
From the field where our heroes bravely die.

Forward she goes with untiring tread,
Gently she tends them till life has fled
From the mangled forms of the soldiers brave

Dying for freedom they hoped to save;
Tenderly folding their hands at rest
She stills the sobs in her aching breast.

Onward, still onward, in fields of blood,
The Red Cross Nurse midst the battle flood

Gropes her way through the wounded and slain

Soothing the victims in mortal pain,
Never a falter, though great the fear,
For God with sustaining Love, is near.

The Dew-Drop Shared.

"Poor Isabel. What will she do? Think of lying in bed, quite flat, not even bolstered up, and not being able to use her eyes either, so she can't read, nor do anything to divert herself for months. How is she going to bear it?"

"The question is how are we going to help her? Surely in this neighborhood garden of girls as we have been called, we can find blossoms enough and sweetness enough to make it a little brighter and better for Isabel. Here comes Lucia. She is better than the rest of us at planning. Let us see what the neighborhood can do."

Lucia joined Katherine, Helen and the rest upon the broad piazza, and the friendly circle of neighborly, loving-hearted girls talked over the circumstances that had taken one of their choice members from all outside life and shut her into a sick-chamber, for a long recovery.

"It is a happy thing for Isabel, and for us, too," said Helen, "that she is not denied company. The doctor says she must not have too many with her at once, but that she must have companionship and diversion, to help her get well, by making it easier for her to lie still, and do almost nothing herself."

"Suppose we see if we can systematize matters a bit," said Elizabeth, the orderly one, who fished always to have a plan to work by, and then to work the plan. But Elizabeth was not especially imaginative, and the conditions were so new that she was baffled by them.

It was Lucia, as might have been expected, being fertile in expedients, who led on to a satisfactory arrangement by asking, "What is your specialty, Katherine, Helen, each of you, that can be turned into entertainment for Isabel? Think a minute."

"Could I read to her?" asked Helen in a tone half doubtful, half hopeful.

"You are the very one," said Lucia. "But we have several in our garden of girls hereabouts, who should take turns in this." And so they planned the reading—the sort of books, the readers, and the regular times possible for them to serve, Katherine's instrumental music, and such items as would help in the cheering-up business in which they wished to engage.

It would take too long to enumerate all that was to be done for Isabel, the dainties to be concocted for her delectation, when allowed to devour them without restriction, the flowers to be taken and other expedients tried to relieve the monotony and weariness of the dear one's sick chamber.

"I wonder what Patty can do," said Eleanor, as the circle scattered. "She is so busy all the time, and so quiet, that maybe we should not expect much of her. Yet she is a dear thing, and we must not leave her out of the planning and the expecting."

"I'll slip over when she comes home, and tell her all about it. She will help in some way," said Katherine.

Katherine kept her word. Patty, sometimes called "the old-fashioned girl," but in the kindest fashion was grateful for the thought of her in the concoction, and said she longed to help, and would think it over. There was a wistful look in her eyes as she said it. Afterwards she thought and thought, and all to no purpose, it seemed. "The others all have more to give, because they can do more, and have more time to do it than I," she decided. Patty helped her father in a very modest little business, where there was certainly no excitement, no novelty in the daily happenings.

She was pondering the matter painfully the next morning, when her eyes fell upon the quotation on her wall-calendar for the day. It was Mrs. Browning's beautiful encouragement:

"The least flower with a brimming cup may stand
And share its dew-drop with another near."

"I wonder what is my dew-drop," was the sudden suggestion that came to Patty. But she could not decide. Everything about me and in what I do is so commonplace," she lamented, forgetting that the commonness of the dew is beneficent. Without deciding, Patty went regularly to Isabel's chamber. Her leisure was time redeemed from other things, and came when the other girls were unlikely to be visitors.

Patty just went and made quiet little listening visits. She had a silent way of showing sympathy with whatever Isabel wished to talk of that was comforting, and her attention was unwavering. Isabel said Patty's visits came like the dew from heaven—quietly, refreshing, unfailing.

What was her dew-drop? Just companionship. Love made it sparkle as she shared it.—The Presbyterian.

Remember the Soup-Kettle.

"Don't put into the garbage-can what should go into the soup-kettle," writes Herbert Hoover in Good Housekeeping, and continues:

"Nourishing soups can be made from scraps of meat and from vegetables that are usually thrown away. You will be surprised to find what a little bit of this and a little bit of that will make. Let us, at this time, utterly refute the old saying that the wastes in the kitchen of a prosperous American household would feed a French family."

A high culinary authority adds: "It is much more important to have a scrap basket in the pantry than in the parlor. No housekeeper can over-estimate the value of utilizing even spoonfuls of left-over vegetables, the solitary steak bone—unless scorched!—the broth the corned beef was boiled in—the half cup of gravy, celery and parsley-leaves—which may be dried and stored in bottles—in fact, everything that is good, however small in quantity. Some housekeepers keep the regular stock pot going and into it put all sorts of remnants such as those mentioned above. Some prefer to make stock from trimmings sent with roasts (which should always be required,) cooked bones, carcasses of fowls, and minced vegetables. To this, cleared, they add the various distinctive vegetable leftovers as required. The soup course, planned and supplied in this way, need hardly cost twenty-five cents extra a week, the milk soups being served on those days when surplus from the regular milk supply permits of them."

A Father Owes His Children a Christian Education.

Practically all fathers recognize that they owe their children an education, but there are still multitudes of professing Christian men who do not seem to realize that they owe their children a Christian education. It is passing strange that fathers and mothers will bring up their children with the greatest care in the nurture and admonition of the Lord until they are sixteen or seventeen years of age and then send them off to school or college without the slightest inquiry into the religious influences of that school or college. As a result many of the boys and girls from our Christian homes are being sent to schools and colleges where their minds and morals are poisoned for life. I have seen one splendid young fellow after another go from Christian homes to such colleges and have seen them return utterly indifferent to religion. When you think of sending your child to college, your first question ought to be: "What will be the moral and spiritual influence of that college on my child?" Fathers, you owe your children a Christian education.—Christian Observer.

Shortly before Mr. Gladstone died he said that the sense of sin had died out in England. How about this country now?

For the Young Folks

It's Fun to Scrape the Pan.

When mother's baking day comes round,
I'll tell you what I do;
I wait until all's nice and brown,
And then I know she's through,
And then she'll call me pretty soon,
And say: "Come, little man;
I'll give you my big mixing spoon,
And you can scrape the pan."

And so I scrape the golden dough,
All fragrant with the spice,
I must admit, of all I know,
There's nothing quite so nice.
The cakes are crisp and brown and good,
And how I make them go!
But I would have her, if I could,
Just have them all stay dough.

Some day when I'm a great big man
I'll marry me a wife,
And then I think I have a plan
To be happy all through life.
I'll tell her when she goes to bake:
"Remember, if you can,
And use just half the dough in cake,
And let me scrape the pan."

What Little Dog Don Did on Sunday.

Little Dog Don was a Puritan dog; that is he was one of a household that kept Sunday very differently, from what is the common way now. Those who spend their Sunday mornings rowing on the lake, riding about the parks in their autos all Sunday afternoon and going to the theater Sunday evening, suppose that such a Sunday as Little Dog Don knew must have been "awful." But it wasn't. And even as a little boy himself grandfather had such good times on Sunday that he loves to think of them now. To be sure he went to Sunday-school once every Sunday and to church twice, but it was a beautiful day in the home and lovely in the orchard and the twilight in the fields was something to make one recall the poet's "light that never was on land or sea." And Little Dog Don loved Sunday too, in his little dog way.

He knew when Sunday came just as well as did his little master. On week days he was always up early looking out for some sort of fun; chasing the squirrels up the maples or scaring the hens into the apple trees or hunting for rats in the great barn where the twenty or thirty cows were fed and milked. But on Sunday he got up late and then trotted along sedately and very quietly behind grandfather when he went out to do the chores, like feeding the chickens—such flocks of them!—and giving the bossy calves each a pail of milk and making sure that the little gray colt had his handful of oats when the big horses had almost a peck apiece. On Sunday everybody about the house, even the hired girl in the kitchen and the hired man from the stables, lived like kings, indeed better than some kings live now in this awful war-time. They had all they could eat other days, but on Sunday they ate "bread and honey," or something just as good—from Thanksgiving to Easter, for example, sausages and buckwheat cakes! Why the last were so good that grandfather has his buckwheat sent to him yet from the same mills, and his apples from the same orchard, and his grandchildren think they are just as good now as he found them fifty or sixty years ago.

But the reason grandfather says Little Dog Don knew when Sunday had come is because on other days he used to follow grandfather all around the yard, but on Sundays never. Grandfather used to start for Sunday-school at nine o'clock, which is about the time his grandchildren are getting up, isn't it? Little Dog Don would sit very quiet while grandfather was reciting his seven verses at prayers after breakfast—those seven verses made up the Sunday-school lesson for the day. Grandfather is so glad he learned those precious Bible verses then because he can say them yet, although he has had to learn heaps and heaps of things since in six or eight languages, but those Bible verses are the best things he ever learned and they have done him lots of good, and he loves his Bible more than ever, just because he knows how much those verses have done for him. Little Dog Don used to follow him to Sunday-school, but he never went in because he went to church once and he thought the sermon too long and the bass viol too loud. So he never went again.

You see it was this way. It was such a lovely little church, not quite so big as St. Paul's in London nor so beautiful as Cologne Cathedral; but after attending great functions in the world's greatest temples grandfather sometimes thinks "dearer to God are the prayers of the poor."

The church to which grandfather used to go was a tiny little church, painted white, with green blinds and a little tin steeple, but some of the loveliest saints God ever made used to go in and out its door.

One Sunday Little Dog Don thought he would go to church too. He was a cunning little dog so he waited until everybody else had gone and then he trotted down the little lane between his home and the church; and he then waited about the church door until somebody opened it and Little Dog Don slipped in. He did not know what to do next because all the people were shut into their own pews and every pew had a door and every door had a "button" and was shut. But he saw at the other end of the church one place, kind o' high, and a man standing up there and talking. So Little Dog Don marched down the aisle and up the pulpit-steps and sniffed at the minister's boots. After that he went to the front of the platform and sat down to look over the pews, and sure enough there he spied grandfather! Down from the pulpit came Little Dog Don and he headed straight for the place where he saw his little master, who opened the pew door and pulled him quickly in and tucked him under the pew seat. He whispered to Little Dog Don to "be good," and he was "just as good as pie," until the choir began to sing, when out popped Little Dog Don, jumped up on the pew cushion, rearing up on his hind legs and placing his little white paws upon the back of the pew that he might see the choir in the gallery at the end of the church opposite the pulpit. What puzzled Little Dog Don most was the music between the verses. There was a "melodeon" in the gallery and a big bass-viol, too, and when the man made the big fiddle go loud, Little Dog Don thought it was a big dog growling and he began to bark, because little as he was he was a pretty good scrapper and he wouldn't take a growl from any dog. But grandfather clapped his hand over Little Dog Don's mouth and held on tight and carried him out of the church, all the other boys and girls in the pews laughing, the choir giggling, and they said the minister had to duck behind the pulpit pretending he was picking up something, a pin, I guess, it took him so long to find it.

Grandfather gave Little Dog a lecture about it that afternoon, and Little Dog Don understood enough of it not to go to church again. But every pleasant Sunday afternoon he would wander off by himself just as regularly as if he carried a dollar watch. He would be gone from two to four hours. Everybody in the village knew Little Dog Don and people used to tell us that they saw him Sunday afternoons miles away, down by one or the other of the two rivers which came together four miles from grandfather's home, or up on the wonderful hills that shut in the beautiful valley. Down by the river there were "oceans" of violets and up on the hills just a wilderness of wild honeysuckles. But before five o'clock Little Dog Don was sure to be seen coming into the garden through a hole in the fence, because five o'clock Sunday the folks had their Sunday dinner. My, what a dinner that was! Grandfather has had all kinds of feed since from a soldier's hard-tack to a menu-de-luxe in Paris, Berlin and Vienna, but he does not believe there ever was a better table spread than a well-to-do American farmer had every Sunday—fifty or sixty years ago. The cellar was full, the granary was full and the smoke house was full, and Little Dog Don never forgot the hour or was late one minute when Sunday dinner was to be served. And now in these meatless, wheatless, sugar-measured days every Sunday grandfather thinks of the happy, over-flowing days of his boyhood, and says to himself sometimes—kind o' low so Mr. Hoover won't hear him—I'd rather be a Little Dog Don in my father's house of sixty years ago than a cabinet minister in Washington when America has taken half the world to board.

Beautiful as were the Sundays of the long-ago, the Sunday evenings were more beautiful still. It was then the family would gather round the open fireplace and, if the weather was rainy or cool, we would have a fire of "pine knots," the indestructible knobs of wood, filled with resin, which remain after the log itself has all disappeared. And when they were laid on the hearth and a match touched to them, they would fill the room with warmth and light. The older folk would sit in the rockers and the younger on stools, and Little Dog Don, always present, would curl up in grandfather's lap. In the very earliest days we had only an accordion, they call it a "harmonica" now, for our instrument, but we thought it very fine. And so the last hour was spent in reading the Psalms—the 104th was our favorite—and then we would recite the Lord's Prayer together, and after that we would sing,

"Blest be the tie that binds."

Happy is the man who has such memories of days when Sundays were Sabbaths, when we all felt the powers of a world to come, when even little boys and little dogs seemed nearer to heaven than saints have seemed since for such is the ideal childhood of which Wordsworth said—

"Heaven lies about us in our infancy."

Popping the Corn.

This is the way we drop the corn,
Drop the corn to pop the corn;
Shower the tiny lumps of gold,
All that our heaping hands can hold;
Listen awhile, and tilthe and bold—
Hip, hop! Popcorn!

This is the way we shake the corn,
Shake the corn to wake the corn;
Rattle the pan and then, behold!
What are the tiny lumps of gold?
Pretty wee white lambs in the fold!
Tip-top popcorn.

Mary Ellen's Umbrella.

Mary Ellen was so very busy watching the big raindrops trickle down the windows of the school-room that she misspelled three words and could not answer when her turn came in geography. Mary Ellen had an umbrella which she loved better than almost anything else she possessed. She was so anxious to begin a plunge homeward, safely housed beneath it, that she had no mind left for lessons. To be sure, one of the umbrella's sides drooped miserably and its handle was broken. But it was an umbrella; and it was hers. It was the first umbrella Mary Ellen ever had.

When school was over, Mary Ellen held it proudly over Marion Jenkins, the little lame girl, till one of Marion's yellow curls caught on a button on her coat. Mary Ellen was helping undo the tangle, when suddenly a gust of wind swept around the corner, and, filling the umbrella with air like a balloon, it carried it rolling and tumbling, down the street.

"Oh, my umbrella! My darling umbrella!" cried Mary Ellen. She darted after it, catching it just as it was starting to roll down the steep bank toward the Key Highway, over near the city jail. Mary Ellen was too late. Another of her dear umbrella's bows was broken, making it unfit for even Mary Ellen to carry. Mary Ellen could not keep back her tears. She had loved her umbrella, and now it was little better than a wreck.

When Mary Ellen stopped at her gate to wipe away the tears, so that mother need not see how foolish her little girl was, she found her mother was not at home, but an old woman was standing on the vine-covered porch, waiting for the rain to cease.

"I've been very sick and dare not get wet," she explained to Mary Ellen. Mary Ellen politely invited her to come into her mother's little sitting-room, and pretended not to notice the woman's threadbare coat and frayed dress. She put the little woman in her mother's little sewing-chair, made her a cup of tea, and while the poor battered old black bonnet was drying by the kitchen stove, Mary Ellen was entertaining the little woman with stories about her school. At last the woman decided that she must wait no longer.

"If I only had an umbrella," she said, "I might at least keep my shoulders dry, and maybe could keep from being sick again."

"Is mine too awfully broken?" asked Mary Ellen, but the tears streamed over her cheeks as she tenderly opened it.

The little old woman took it gladly. "I don't mind its being broken, dearie; and I'll return it in as good shape as it is now," she promised. Then she limped away down the street, Mary Ellen eagerly watching her.

For days there was a sad weight at Mary Ellen's heart. But one morning a strange boy came to the door and thrust in Mary Ellen's umbrella, and a note that had been sent with it. Mary Ellen seized her beloved umbrella and hugged it before she noticed that it was not the old, warped, handle, but a new, whole one. She opened it cautiously, as she had often done before, but the side refused to droop. Mary Ellen shook it easily, then harder, but each triangle remained stretched to its fullest size.

"O mother, mother! Just look!" she exclaimed.

Mother finished reading the note. Then she looked up. "It was the umbrella-mender's mother to whom you loaned your umbrella, Mary Ellen," she explained. "He says that mending an umbrella is a very little thing compared with the kindness you showed a poor old woman."

Mary Ellen stared. "Why," she stammered, "lots of people wouldn't have carried my umbrella at all."

"It wasn't the umbrella, dear, that she appreciated," said mother. "It was the kindness you showed in offering your poor, crippled treasure to a stranger. I have no doubt that even she was a little ashamed of the umbrella, but the kindness was a very different thing."

Mary Ellen was thoughtful. "I suppose nobody can tell then, by looking at a thing, whether there's a kindness in it or not. But it paid that time."—Eugene Du Maurier, in The Christian Register.

Enlist For the War!

"If I were just old enough to enlist!" cries a boy with shining eyes looking eagerly at the line of khaki figures marching by.

"If I were only big enough to go as a Red Cross nurse!" sighs a girl longingly.

"What chance have we to show our patriotism?" say some other boys and girls, in tones of discontent.

You can't go as nurses or soldiers, but you have the best kind of chance to show your patriotism! It may not seem very exciting, but it will be serving your country better than any American boys and girls have ever been able to serve it before. It is such an important part of war work that the government has appointed a special department to look after it. You know that the great difficulty in the countries at war is to raise enough food for the soldiers and for those who stay at home. There are starving children in Europe. France has desolate stretches of ground where rich farms used to be. Crops must be tended by the women. "Food will win the war," say those who know. The United States must not only feed her own people, but she must help to feed her Allies; and in order to do this everyone must be careful about what they eat and what they throw away. "Food conservation" is the phrase you will hear often. It simply means using food rightly and not wasting any of it and doing without food that is not actually necessary to health and strength.

This is where the boys and girls can help. Your fathers and mothers will have a hard time having "meatless days" and "wheatless days," if the children complain: "Why can't we have white bread?" "Why can't I have some sugar to make candy?" "Why must we do without meat to-day?" Whiney remarks like these make the task of "food conservation" in the home much harder. More than that, the people who complain about such things are not true to their country! It's an unpatriotic way to talk!

Herbert Hoover, who is at the head of food conservation in this country, asks everyone to help him. He has indorsed the pledge of the Junior Army of the Food Release, which was written by Mrs. Hattie T. Harl. The public schools of Council Bluffs, Iowa, have adopted it also, and the national commissioner of education approves of it. Follow it! Tell others about it! That's a splendid way to serve your country in this time of war.—Christian Advocate.

A Child Helper.

Our Lord had cured so many sick and ailing people and had done so much good that whenever He appeared on the streets a little group gathered. Then He would stretch out His hand and heal someone and more and more people would come to listen and watch.

One day Jesus went up into a mountain with His disciples. It may have been that He had something special to say to them, or He may have gone for rest and quiet. We do not know.

Very soon the people found out where He was and they gathered about Him until there were five thousand in the company. They listened all day to His teaching, and Jesus knew they must be hungry. So He said to Philip: "Where can we buy bread, so that they may have something to eat?"

Philip did not know. They were far away from any town and he may have thought that no one among the apostles had money enough to pay for bread for so many. So he said: "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not enough for them so that every one may have a little."

Then into the company came a boy, eager to help. He had only five loaves and two fishes, hardly enough for one person, but he gave it gladly, and Jesus accepted it. He told His apostles to have the people sit down on the soft green grass.

What a hush of expectancy there must have been when they were all seated. Even the little children would fold their hands and be still as they watched.

Jesus took the bread and thanked God for it. Then He gave it to His apostles to distribute among the people. In the same manner He gave God thanks for the fish and the disciples gave them to the people until everyone had all they wanted. Afterward Jesus told them to gather up the pieces that were left over and they filled twelve baskets. Yet, until they brought them to Him there were only five loaves and two fishes.

It was because our Lord was God that He could do such wonderful things; but you see the little boy and the apostles had a share in it, too. Isn't it good of Jesus to let us help in His work? We ought to be very eager to bring whatever we have to Him, money, talent, or time, so that He may bless and use it.—Shepherd's Arms.

Pussy's Burial.

The cemetery was beneath
A green cedar so high;
The mourners were the Jersey cow
And pussy's child and I.

The tombstone was a piece of slate.
And daisies were the shroud;
I cried a little to myself;
The kitten purred aloud.

Why Myra's Report Was Good.

"I'm most sure Myra isn't going to keep up with our grade," Alice said to her mother. "She's the nicest little girl, but she does make funny mistakes in her lessons, mamma. You just ought to hear her spell, and her writing is dreadful! The other day Miss Smith had us write letters to her about our vacation, you know, and if you'll believe it, Myra began 'Miss' with a little instead of a capital, and Smith with a little 's.'"

"Myra hasn't been going to school very long, has she?" Alice's mother inquired.

"No, mamma; she started in only two weeks ago, but I'll tell you what I think." Alice dropped her voice a little. "Myra isn't half so quick and bright as some of the other girls. Now there's Sadie, her cousin. She's just the same age, and they've been in school just the same time, but her letter to Miss Smith was fine. She didn't make any such funny mistakes."

"Well, we'll see," mother said wisely. "Perhaps Myra will surprise you yet."

But the next day Alice came home from school with something more to say about Myra's "funny mistakes."

"We wrote our letters to Miss Smith on the blackboard to-day, and you ought to have seen how funny Myra's was. She began Monday with a little m!"

"Well, well!" said mother. "And did she write Miss Smith's name with little letters, too?"

"No, mamma; she got that part right this time. But she didn't know the days of the week had to begin with capitals."

Still another day and Alice had something else to tell mother.

"Myra isn't getting along so very well with her number work. She said to-day that three times eight was twenty-six! But she told me that she was going to study the three table like everything when she went home."

"Myra got 'perfect' in number work to-day," Alice announced next afternoon. "Miss Smith says she knows the three table best of any of us now. And it's a funny thing, mamma, but her Cousin Sadie got a low mark in arithmetic. It wasn't such a very big mistake, but it's the same one she's made several times, and Miss Smith said that's what she doesn't like—to have us go on making the same mistake over and over again."

"I see," said mother, thoughtfully.

It was at the end of the month that Alice reported with mingled surprise and satisfaction that Myra had received one of the very best reports in school.

"Most all her marks were good, and Miss Smith read them out to the rest of us. She said she felt proud of Myra—she'd been afraid at first that Myra wasn't going to be able to keep up with our grade, but that she had done finely. She never'd seen anybody improve so fast. And the reason, Miss Smith said, is because Myra never lets herself make the same mistake twice. She said that kind of girl always comes out right in the end. It's a funny thing, mamma, but Sadie didn't have such a good report. She passed in everything, but she didn't have such high marks as Myra did. Miss Smith didn't say anything about it, but I know what Sadie's trouble is. She goes right on making the same mistake over and over again!"—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

The Biggest Snowball.

Mr. Briggs is an old gentleman who is always doing something to make children happy.

Last winter he promised a sled to the youngster who could roll the biggest snowball. Jamie tried, and Maud tried, and so did Loretta and Jean. But they were little people, and the snow was damp and heavy, and they got very tired.

GIRLS! MAKE A BEAUTY LOTION WITH LEMONS

At the cost of a small jar of ordinary cold cream one can prepare a full quarter pint of the most wonderful lemon skin softener and complexion beautifier, by squeezing the juice of two fresh lemons into a bottle containing three ounces of orchard white. Care should be taken to strain the juice through a fine cloth so no lemon pulp gets in, then this lotion will keep fresh for months. Every woman knows that lemon juice is used to bleach and remove such blemishes as freckles, sallowness and tan and is the ideal skin softener, smoothener and beautifier.

Just try it! Get three ounces of orchard white at any pharmacy and two lemons from the grocer and make up a quarter pint of this sweetly fragrant lemon lotion and massage it daily into the face, neck, arms and hands. It should naturally help to whiten, soften, freshen and bring out the roses and beauty of any skin. It is truly marvelous to smoothen rough, red hands.

Wood's Seeds

Then Loretta said, "Let's all roll a snowball together! It will be ever so much bigger and rounder!"

So they did.

When Mr. Briggs saw the great snowball they had rolled, his face shone with delight. But then it grew puzzled.

"Now, who rolled this snowball?" he asked.

"We all did!" they cried.

"But I promised one sled to one little boy or girl," Mr. Briggs sighed. "And here is one snowball, but four children. Whatever shall I do?" And he wrinkled his forehead. "I have it! I shall give one sled; but it shall be big enough for the four of you, and I shall give it to you all. Won't that be jolly?"

So the sled was bought, and they have the finest times you can imagine. Mr. Briggs even slid down hill on it once himself, just to show the four happy little folks that he wasn't too old to have a good time.—Shepherd's Arms.

At Kingston, the home of her sister, Mrs. Foxhall A. Dalgnerfield, near Lexington, Ky., on December 31, 1917, entered into rest, ANNIE DOUGLAS GRAY.
She was born in Harrisonburg, Va., on the 3rd of October, 1842, the daughter of Colonel Algernon S. Gray, of that place, who was conspicuous in social and political life in the years preceding and following the war, and of his wife, Annie Henderson, of the well known Henderson family of Loudoun County, a woman of unusual ability and accomplishments. While attending Dr. Phillip's School for Girls at Staunton, Va., now
Stuart Hall, Miss Gray was confirmed in the Church of her choice and inheritance, by Bishop Johns, and continued a faithful servant of the Cross until her life's end. On the founding of Emmanuel Church in Harrisonburg by the late Rev.
Henry A. Wise, she took a large part in the work of the Parish, especially in the Sunday-school, and there are yet those who remember, with grateful affection, the sweetness and charm of her earnest, intelligent teaching.

The life of service and loyalty of this saintly woman was not confined to her own communion, but wherever sympathy was appropriate and assistance needed, she carried the spiritual comfort and consolation of her prayers and the benefaction that, only a delicate Christian thoughtfulness and generosity inspires.
Truly all her life she went about doing good, visiting the sick, comforting the sorrowing, aiding the poor and oppressed from whatever cause, always with the love of God in her heart and the light of the consecrated servant of Christ in her presence and personality. It was the large things of life that appealed to her—love, charity, gentleness, service and to these she gave all the strength of youth as well as of maturity, passing away with the last hours of the dying year in the sweet serenity and fullness of old age—with loving and tender hearts at her side and adoration of the Master on her lips, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever." Her remains were brought from Kentucky to Virginia, and interred in Woodbine Cemetery in Harrisonburg, there to mingle with the dust of her kindred until light everlasting shines upon her.

RESOLUTIONS ON DEATH OF VIR- GINIA WHITCOMB TAYLOR.

At a meeting of St. Stephen's Guild, Wethampton, on Monday, January the 14th, a committee was appointed, and the following resolutions were drawn up:

Whereas, it has pleased our heavenly Father to take unto Himself His faithful servant, our co-worker and friend,
Virginia Whitcomb Taylor;

Whereas, the death of this Christian woman is a sad loss to our community;
therefore be it

Resolved, That St. Stephen's Guild has lost a generous and efficient member.

Resolved, That the community has lost a friend ever-ready to help in time of need, and one always sympathetic in any enterprise for the good and happiness of others.

Resolved, That we, the members of St.
Stephen's Guild, gratefully cherish the memory of this noble Christian woman, and are encouraged by her fine example and enthusiasm in all good works.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Guild, and that a copy be sent to her bereaved husband, Mr. Edgar D. Taylor, and her sister, Mrs. Hugh M. Taylor, and to the Southern Churchman with an expression of sincerest sympathy from the Guild.

time. The tonic is called "More Eggs."
Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, Poultry Expert, 6401 Reefer Building, Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be re-

Order Fertilizers Now or You May Have to Do Without Them This Season

The freight congestion is serious. You will help yourself, us, the railroads, and the Government by giving your order for Fertilizers NOW to your dealer. If all the farmers do this, the dealer can then "bunch" his orders, and be able to order his cars of fertilizers loaded to full capacity. The Government urges that all cars be so loaded.

When the goods arrive haul them home, and put them into your barn until you are ready to use them. If the movement of railroad cars becomes any more serious you may not get a pound of fertilizer at any price.

Our 50 factories, and distributing points are so well located geographically as to enable us to get fertilizers to you with minimum amount of hauling.

If You Value Your Health

Read Every Word of This Remarkable Story

It is told by one who has himself experienced the Regeneration in Health which he encourages you to seek by the self-same means.

THE STORY OF A GREAT DISCOVERY.

The hardships of a traveling salesman's life had wrecked my health. My family physician diagnosed my case as chronic gastritis, brought on by disease of the liver and complicated by kidney trouble. I consulted specialists in Columbia and New York who confirmed his diagnosis. Months passed, I grew worse and was finally compelled to give up my work.

By chance I heard of some wonderful recoveries which had resulted from drinking the water of a little spring in the Mineral Belt of South Carolina, a picture of which spring appears on this page. In desperation I tried it. On the second day I thought that I could notice some improvement; at the end of the first week my appetite and digestion had returned and I was much stronger; at the end of the third week I felt that I was completely restored. That was eight years ago and I still enjoy perfect health.

Knowing that it had restored my health and believing that it had saved my life, I bought the Spring.

I then determined to see whether the water would restore others as it had me. During the year I shipped ten gallons absolutely free of charge to each of one thousand sufferers from chronic diseases. Only four reported "no benefit" from the ten gallons. The other nine hundred and ninety-six reported decided benefit or complete restoration. Many claimed that the water had saved their lives.

I realized that I had discovered one of the world's greatest mineral springs, and I decided to devote the remainder of my life to it. But how could I make the world listen; how could I make them believe my story? The precious water was running to waste while thousands were suffering. I said, I will make them believe me by showing my faith in them and in the restorative power of the Spring. I will tell them that the water shall cost them nothing if it fails to benefit.

The world listened!! Some wrote for proof and I sent them the letters which I had received from their fellowmen. Others accepted my offer without question. Thousands have written me reporting relief and permanent restoration from a great variety of chronic diseases.

But some of the water still ran to waste for lack of belief. I determined that every drop should be used to relieve the suffering of humanity. To this end I requested a physician friend of mine to come to see me. At my desk I opened my mail and showed him the letters from men and women from all parts of the country who had suffered and who had found relief. I gave him my letter file and induced him to spend several days reading my past correspondence with those who were using the water. I showed him the chemical analysis and letters from physicians explaining the medicinal properties of the water.

He believed, and as a result he has written this announcement for me.

WILL YOU BELIEVE?

I do not ask your implicit faith; only enough to try the water for three weeks as I did. I estimate that I drank about ten gallons, and I, therefore, offer gladly to ship you two five-gallon demijohns on my guarantee that if you find that it does not benefit you I will promptly refund the price, which is only $2.00. You must promise to drink the water in accordance with the instructions which I will send you and return the empty demijohns. I make you the sole judge as to whether the water has benefited you. I guarantee to refund your money if you are not benefited. I hope you will feel perfectly free to accept my offer.

This offer is extended to all who suffer with any chronic disease, except cancer and consumption; but I especially recommend the water for the treatment of stomach, liver, kidney and bladder diseases and for rheumatism, gout, uric acid poisoning, gallstones, diabetes, nervous headache and general debility resulting from impure or impoverished blood. These are the diseases most frequently mentioned in the thousands of letters which I have received; but my offer is open to any one who suffers from any chronic ailment. Yours sincerely, N. F. SHIVAR, Proprietor.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.:

Dear Sir—As you are well aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered 10 gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months from date I began drinking it gained 29 lbs., was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

Shivar Spring, Shelton, S. C.

Gentlemen—I have suffered for years with nervous indigestion and kidney troubles. Derived more benefit from the Shivar Spring Water than from months at Hot Springs, Ark., and numerous other springs. I consider it the very best water extant.

AUGUSTUS DU PONT,
Lexington, Virginia.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—I suffered with intestinal indigestion and the Shivar Spring Water has completely restored me. I would gladly recommend it to all suffering with indigestion, kidney and liver trouble. My father had kidney trouble last fall and he thought Shivar Spring Water saved his life. Respectfully, MRS. HARVEY DIXON.

I am anxious to get more of the Water. It has done me more good than anything I have ever tried for rheumatism.

MRS. H. C. EDWARDS.

It is doing my rheumatism so much good. My limbs are beginning to feel like new ones.

MRS. JAMES R. CARTER.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—Until a few weeks ago my wife was a chronic sufferer from gallstones. She was stricken critically ill and nothing but morphine seemed to relieve her pain by rendering her unconscious. Rev. A. J. Foster, pastor of Shandon Baptist Church of Columbia, S. C., advised me to take her immediately to Shivar Spring. On consulting my physician he agreed that it would be best to do so without delay. In about three days after arriving at the Spring, she was apparently relieved and had regained her appetite. She has suffered no ill effect of the trouble since. Please publish this for the benefit of sufferers.

J. P. D.

P. S.—I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Singing in sorrow is the sign of God's saints."—Ex.

The prospects are as bright as the promise of God.—Judson.

Whatever the Christian prays for, he ought to be willing to live and die for.—Ex.

All God's spiritual gifts are eternal. His peace is eternal peace.—Rev. Jno. Clark.

When the best things are not possible, the best may be made of those that are possible.

"If you want Christ in your home be sure He will see the open door, come in, and abide there. But He will not force an entrance."

I hold it an impossibility for a man to have his heart full of God's love, and yet be doing nothing for his brother.—Quintin Hogg.

Every Christian should be like Christ, should live with Christ, and find the fountains of His being in Christ. Through such lives Christ can speedily win the world to Himself.—R. E. Speer.

"The only true basis of the social structure is self-renouncing love. One with God is not only a majority, but victory; which is not measurable by immediate results, but by the fruitage of eternity.—N. W. Wells.

I believe that wherever guidance is honestly and simply sought, it is certainly given. As to our discernment of it, I believe it depends upon the measure in which we are walking in the light.—A. L. Newton.

It is not our own patience, justice or kindness that we are to show to those around us, but the pity and forbearance of Christ, whose Spirit dwells within us. Our own virtues will not endure the strain and friction of daily life; we must lean wholly on Him.—Selected.

As some rare perfume in a vase of clay pervades it with a fragrance not its own,

So when Christ dwelleth in a mortal soul,

All heaven's own sweetness seems about it thrown.

—Selected.

We need to cultivate the sense of God. If we had a friend to whom we never wrote or spoke and of whom we almost never thought she would soon cease to be a friend. God wants to be thought of, to have all of life referred to Him, to be made the central power in our lives.—Selected.

Be thy duty high as an angel's flight, Fulfil it and a higher duty will arise Even from its ashes. Duty is infinite, Receding as the skies.

Were it not wisdom, then, to close our eyes

On duties crowding only to appall? No; duty is our ladder to the skies,

And, climbing not, we fail.

—Robert Leighton.

The science of to-day has taught us that there are rays of light that can penetrate the densest substance. But these rays can be evolved only when the atmosphere of earth has been excluded. And such wonders have their counterpart in the spiritual sphere. Those who can escape from the influence of earth, and rise above the seen and temporal, have eyes to see and ears to hear the sights and sounds of another world; and with united voice they testify that God is with His people, and His word is true.—Sir Robert Anderson.

The value of the Southern Churchman, we trust, speaks for itself.

It is the oldest of all our Church papers.

To thousands of individuals and families it has been long endeared.

To-day, in the living present, it seeks to bring to all its readers, both old and young, the evangelical message of Christ's spirit in the life of His Church.

"THE CHILDREN'S YEAR" is a volume of fifty-two talks with children by the Rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond.

Of this book, now in its second edition, the dean of the Theological Seminary in Virginia has written:

"These five-minute talks by Dr. Bowie should be extensively used by the clergy as a stimulus and a model. Sunday School teachers also must find these talks very useful in their delightful illustrative quality as helps in pointing lessons through pictorial language and familiar objects. The volume should have its place in every Sunday School library as well as on every rector's study table."

To take advantage of this offer you should act quickly.

If you do not now subscribe to the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, seize this opportunity. If you yourself are a subscriber, secure a subscription from someone else.

The book and the paper may be mailed to different addresses.

When the Roses Died.

Do you remember when the roses died,
(So long ago we scarce can count the years!)
And whispered as they passed, a message grim
That brought to our charged hearts a thrill of fears.

Across the sunlight of our lives there crept
A shadow that bespoke a storm of pain;
We dared not look into each other's eyes
Lest we behold our own dread grief-restrain.

Long, long ago that shadow came,—and fell;
And then another, and another, too,—
Even as petals from the roses fall
When Death's sad lips their beauty seek to woo.

But what if roses die? 'Tis not for aye;
And what if loved ones pass beyond our ken?
They enter Gardens where the roses live,
And some day we shall find them all again.

So, in that faith we find serenest peace
As o'er the dull old ways of earth we plod,
Leaving our prayers of love, like deathless blooms,
To lie, all-fragrant, at the feet of God!
—From "A Voice From the Silence," by Anna B. Bensch.

A single act may change the current of a man's whole life. One choice made in a moment, often lightly—and the future will never be the same again. Let a man do one noble deed, and play the hero even for one hour, and the world will be richer to him ever after, and he will have the comradeship of noble souls. But let a man play the coward or the cheat, not twice but once, not openly but secret, and life will be meaner, and the world a poorer place, until the threescore years and ten are run. There are great joys which meet us in an instant, but the light of them shall shine on till the grave. And there are choices we are called to make which made in a moment will determine everything.—G. H. Morrison.

There is only one way by which we can reach our desired goal—that is, to get up and go.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered, at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

A Voice From the Silence. Poems. By Anna B. Bensel. With an Introduction by Bishop Brent. Sherman, French & Co. Boston. Pp. 90. $1.00.

A reading of Miss Bensel's "A Voice From the Silence" is like an evening's intercourse with a saint, one saintly not with piety only, but with the seven spirits, from "the spirit of wisdom" to "the spirit of the godliness." Let one read the book through at a sitting and one will find oneself "in the spirit," transported by the conversation of an other-worldly sage.

None of us has too many friends of this quality, intercourse with whom tones us up to celestial pitch, and the publication of Miss Bensel's book adds a treasure to any purchaser's equipment of friends. It will bring into any house a contribution that far transcends that of the ordinary visitor. It certainly has a mission which answers the author's query in her modest and touching verses "To an unpublished book."

"No, little book! I have dreamed your birth,

But you may not come while I live to know:

Suppose I should chance to be going forth

Into unknown space when you come in so!

* * * *

Little dream-book! but the world is cold,

And it may have nothing but scorn for you:

Perhaps it were best that you should not come

Unless God gives you a mission to do.

Say, little book, do you think it would be Best in the dream-land to sleep with me?"

The book's characteristics are all good. It is spotlessly ingenuous; for it is plain as day that every verse was written out of the need of giving words to feelings, instead of for public credit or revenue. It is interested in all life, temporal and spiritual; the author's lack in sight and hearing have not brought to naught her gift for active membership in a world from which the impairment of two-fifths of the senses would exclude a thinner personality. It has sanctity: it is full of evidences of deep intimacy with God imminent and transcendent.

Miss Bensel's spiritual life is, as her poems show, not a solitude with God, but a sharing in the life of the great family. Her sightlessness has not made her blind to the Church visible, nor prevented her from the most real participation in it. The two poems to two of her parish priests, "Our Chief" (now Bishop Brent), and "The Christmas 'All Hail'" (to her present vicar), tributes which any priest might covet, prove what a devoted and well-nourished child of the Church is the author.

Blessed is the Church from whose people come such meditations as those of this "Voice From the Silence."

H. E. K.

Christianity is no appeal to selfishness, but a call to self-surrender and self-dedication. It appeals to men only in so far as they "lose" themselves and lay aside all self-seeking. Nor is it, as some have contended, merely an individualistic religion, as if its mission were exhausted in the "saving" of individual souls. Its message is essentially social, and concerns the present order and present needs of the world. The salvation of a soul means something nobler and wider than mere deliverance from personal consequences of sin in a future state.—R. L. Ottley, D. D.

A CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH'S FAITH.

We have received from that stalwart advocate of Church unity, the Rev. Dr. Ainslie, of the Disciples' Church, the following note and the stirring and timely paper which accompanies it, to which we are glad to give a conspicuous place. It touches the most serious concern of the Church of Jesus Christ today and is deserving of the most candid and prayerful consideration.

Editor The Southern Churchman,
Richmond, Va.:

My Dear Brother:

At the instance of Dr. Newman Smyth, I am taking the liberty of sending you the inclosed paper, asking for its publication and approval in your journal, if possible. These are extraordinary days, and it is hoped we will be able to find some method whereby we can do the Christian work in the army with greater satisfaction.

Very sincerely,
PETER AINSLIE.

Baltimore, Md.

To Our Fellow-Believers in All the Churches; Greetings:

The present crisis confronts the Church with the possibility of coming forth from the war either with a diminished or a vaster power. To-day the churches must face realities. A divided Church cannot stand.

To-day everywhere the people are combining their industries to make the allied nations one mighty power in the war. Even on the lower plane of economics the churches are not uniting to save waste as in many places they might do. How many tons of coal and units of electricity might be saved if thin congregations in large edifices should consent this winter to worship together!

Far more than this: To-day the Young Men's Christian Association represents Christianity before the world. The many churches stand as an unorganized, scattered line of support behind its well organized line of volunteers. As they go forward the separate church-units are not in position to let the world know that behind them stands the reserve power of the whole Church of God. To-day some of our ministers at the front, forgetting the denominational names of the churches that sent them, on battle fields and in hospitals are working side by side as servants and priests of God. At home they are held apart.

To-day the government of the United States is apportioning chaplains among the different denominations. The Red Cross only for our charity; our denominational names and churchly vestments for our religion!

These things ought not so to be. The crisis of Christianity requires the subordination of all things divisive. Without prejudice to existing personal relations or official fidelities, the whole Church is called to-day to make one sacrificial offering of all things held to be of value in one great venture of faith for God. To-day we should take counsel not of our fears but of our hopes, as did our fathers before us. To-day our fears may be our disloyalties.

Bishops, clergymen, laymen—shall we loiter in the way, disputing about many things, when in the suffering of the world our Lord is crucified afresh for the sin of modern civilization? The hour commands unity. By some decisive act our faith in it should be made fact. That might be done if, for example, as a war measure we should put in cantonments, in regiments and on battleships chaplains and ministers, from whatever Church they may come, commissioned not by their own communion only, but by joint ordination or consecration sent forth with whatsoever authority and grace the whole Church of God may confer, bearing no mark upon them but the sign of the Cross. At some single point of vital contact—that or something better than that—the Church might act as one.

Something must be made visible fact of unity to-day, if the Church—the one Church of the many churches, the only Church which the Lord Himself had faith enough in God to pray for—is to become to-morrow the power of God to save the world. This cannot be too long postponed. These times require quick decisions. Can we suffer the churches to-day to forget that before the week of His passion our Lord gave the barren fig tree but one year more in which to bear fruit or be cut down? This parable may be for the Church now.

Therefore we, the undersigned, representing different communions, lay before you this appeal for action, asking for response and for such suggestions as may seem to you timely.

This paper bears the signature of eighty-two representative clergymen and laymen of the following Christian denominations: Baptist, Congregationalist, Disciples, Episcopalian, Friends, Lutheran, Methodist, Moravian and Presbyterian. We suppose they are those to whom the paper could be presented without delaying its publication, for there is no reason why thousands of names could not have been added if it had been necessary. The signers of our own Church are: George W. Pepper, the Rev. Dr. Edward L. Parsons, Bishop Charles D. Williams, the Rev. Dr. Randolph H. McKim, the Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, Samuel Thorn, Jr., the Rev. Charles C. Scoville, the Rev. Dr. Stewart Means, the Rev. George L. Paine, Burton Mansfield, the Rev. John N. Lewis, the Rev. Francis B. Whitcomb, the Rev. Dr. Hugh Birchhead, the Rev. John W. Suter and the Rev. Francis L. Palmer.

It seems to us this challenge is directed with especial emphasis to our own Church. Will she be bold enough, believing enough, inconsistently consistent enough, to answer it; to cut through quite a lot of red tape, to muzzle in the emergency a few of her canons, to adopt a war measure in war times when the King's business requires haste? If the suggestion made in the appeal is the most practical one by which "the Church might act as one," will she adopt it? Or else, will she suggest some other way more practical, more emphatic, more radical, more self-sacrificial?

Fortunately a special meeting of the House of Bishops has been called to assemble in New York on the tenth of April next. We believe that whatever action they might be led to take in this direction after prayerful consideration would meet with the approval of the Church and be ratified without question by the next General Convention. Or that even a called meeting of the General Convention would be justified if out of it might come some strong, vital, compelling action, worthy of this great Church and her avowed longing for unity, worthy of the great spiritual impulse toward that end which is being felt in all the Churches, and worthy of the time in which we are living and the momentous movements which are sweeping all the earth toward a new realization of brotherhood under the supreme law of liberty, righteousness and love.

Will this Church, taking the word of Christ as her sole guide, set her face to the future and meet the occasion?

SAFEGUARDING OUR LOYALTY.

One reads with regret just at this time the reports that come from Washington of criticisms, investigations and dissatisfactions in regard to the preparations for war made by the national government. To a large extent they are doubtless inevitable, however much to be regretted. Our government is a large and intricate institution. At present it is engaged, in its many departments, in an enormous and a very hurried task for which it was as unprepared by experience as it was in resources. Almost in an instant its activities, in certain directions at least, had to be increased an hundredfold. New and untried problems arose demanding instant solution. New machinery had to be put into operation to meet emergencies which allowed no time for experimentation or gradual adjustment. New methods had to be adopted for which there were no precedents to guide. The worst mistake would have been to delay action until possible mistakes could be foreseen and prevented. The greatest carelessness would have been a too deliberate carefulness. Of necessity there would arise differences of opinion, errors in judgment, oversights, and here and there a failure of efficiency in the enormous and involved accomplishments of the past nine months. What else could have been anticipated? And with that keenness of vision in which hindsight is proverbially superior to foresight these are now being discovered and exposed and exploited. Besides the proper agencies by which mistakes must be detected and corrected, there is enough political astuteness and personal jealousy and self-assertiveness to see to that. This again was to be expected at about this time. The result will be some improvement in efficiency and strengthening of weak places, together with some wasted energy and additional friction, some political capital made or lost, and, we fear, some lessening among thoughtless or misinformed people of that confidence in and support of the government which is so essential in the present crisis.

It is this last which is chiefly to be deprecated, and which every patriotic citizen ought to guard against and neutralize to the full extent of his influence and opportunity. It is a responsibility which should be felt by every thoughtful man and woman, not only to maintain his or her own loyalty and enthusiasm but to clarify and guide the currents of feeling and opinion which flow through the community, encouraging, instructing or rebuking as the need may be. This is the people's war, as we have often been reminded and as is becoming more evident every day, and it is to be lost or won by the united, intelligent and self-sacrificing purpose and determination of the whole people in supporting and furthering the demands and efforts of their government. The country has responded with a remarkable unanimity and alacrity to the calls both for service and sacrifice which have thus far been made upon it. It shows a solidarity of sentiment, a reasoned enthusiasm, a common instinct of patriotism, a morale, which is our greatest asset and the foundation of all our strength. Upon this broad base is built the hopes we are holding out to the distressed nation of Europe, our allies, as well as our own confidence in victory for faith and freedom. But this common sentiment and courageous purpose must be kept unimpaired, must be made yet more united and determined, if it is to meet the demands which will increasingly be made upon it and remain staunch, unwearied and undismayed. Its fibre and consistency will be tried again and again, and woe betide us if it should fail!

This high spirit of patriotism, the morale of the great army of the people, will not necessarily take care of itself and maintain its heroic quality. It cannot live on presidential proclamations or the expectation of splendid victories quickly gained. Except where it is founded on intelligent apprehension and deep convictions it is subject to fluctuation and loss of vitality. It may stand the test of immediate sacrifice and break under the long strain of repeated disappointment and capacious faultfinding. Enthusiasm is easily dampened and confidence undermined when ignorance and pessimism get in their work. And these will have their day sooner or later. The wisacre who knows it all, the persistent inventor of evil tidings, the carping critic of whatever he does not understand, the slacker at heart with his petty grievances, the narrow-minded champion of selfish rights—wherever found these are the enemies of the republic whose insidious work must be counteracted and whose voices must be put to silence by wiser and more worthy counsels. They must not be allowed to discourage the soul of this people upon whose constancy and good-will so much depends or to weaken their hands. It is not difficult to expose the ignorance or the animus of these foolish talkers, indeed they will expose themselves in answer to a few well-directed questions. But their unfortunate influence should not on that account be underrated. There is need of the willing, courageous, self-sacrificing loyalty both of the wise and the unwise in this difficult time. The cultivation and guardianship of such a loyal spirit, with an intelligent public opinion and a high standard of patriotism, is no small part of the duty of every right-minded citizen to his community and no unworthy contribution to his country's cause.

For several weeks we have been obliged, on account of the tie-up in freight traffic, to use a somewhat inferior quality of paper in printing the Southern Churchman, which we hope our readers will pardon. A large supply of paper has been for long weeks somewhere on the way from the mills. "Fireless Mondays" will for a while interfere somewhat with our office work, and if there should be a slight delay in the appearance of any issue we are sure of the indulgence of our subscribers.

Letters to the Editor

In this department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE AUTOMATIC PENSION FUND.

(Note.—The following letter was intended by the writer for publication before the meeting of the Trustees of the Church Pension Fund on December 18. It was received by us too late to appear before that date, and was therefore withheld on the supposition that the records of that meeting would give a full answer to the questions in which so many of the contributors to this fund, and the former recipients of its benefits, are interested; namely, the present amount and status of the fund, and why its income is not being distributed according to the intention of its donors and of the Church. The minutes furnished us, however, are silent on these points, simply stating that "the General Convention of 1907 account shall consist of the moneys and securities collected by the Commission appointed by the General Convention of 1907 and transferred to the Church Pension Fund under the resolution of the General Convention of 1913 and the Canon of the General Convention of 1916." We are therefore publishing the Rev. Mr. Prevost's letter, slightly abridged, for the information of those who are interested in the terms under which the Automatic Pension Fund, or the General Convention of 1907 Fund, with the additions made to it by the General Clergy Relief Fund, was created.—Editor, S. C.)

Mr. Editor: The Church has a vital interest in the securities and wills and other assets and trust funds turned over by the General Clergy Relief Fund to the Church Pension Fund. None of these is of more vital importance to the Church, but especially to the clergy, who contributed largely, than that known as the fund for Automatic Pensions at sixty-four. The idea first took form and was inaugurated by the General Clergy Relief Fund, which collected some $30,000 before the General Convention of 1907, took the matter up by appointing the General Clergy Relief and Pension Fund Commission, "to raise a sum of not less than five million dollars to be added to the General Clergy Relief Fund, for an old age pension for the clergy of the Church, which shall be available as a right by reason of age and honorable service." This Commission raised about $300,000 for the purpose, which it turned over to the General Clergy Relief Fund Trustees, who for seven years faithfully distributed the income of said Fund to all the clergy in the Church who had reached the age of sixty-four, and which was in accordance with instruction received from the Convention.

If what I hear on all sides is true, then a great injustice, not to call it by any harsher name, has been done to those who have been beneficiaries of this Fund. Every one of the many clergy with whom I have spoken or corresponded have confessed that they had not received their Automatic Pension, which was due them October 1. By right of age and honorable service these men are entitled to receive their Automatic Pension, and no one has the right to stop payment.

Any one familiar with the history of "Automatic Pensions at sixty-four" is aware that funds collected by the Five Million Dollar Commission were turned over in sums of $10,000 or more to the General Clergy Relief Fund with the distinct understanding that the interest on these sums forming the Fund was "to be used only in relieving the needs or in giving pensions to those having reached the age of sixty-four."

What did the Church Pension Fund have in mind when its officers in conjunction with those of the retiring General Clergy Relief Fund issued a mutual statement to the Church as follows: "After that date (March 1, 1917) all liabilities of the General Clergy Relief Fund will be assumed by the Church Pension Fund and the assets of the General Clergy Relief Fund will be held under the trusts with which they are imprest." The recent stoppage of payment of the Automatic Pensions would suggest that these are words of opportunism irrespective of any moral obligation.

In the year 1907, at the General Convention in Richmond, Va., formal action was taken on the report of the committee on the Los Angeles Memorial constituting a commission to take in hand the raising of five million dollars for the General Clergy Relief Fund. The Commission was organized with Bishop Whitehead as its President and Dr. Wilkins as General Secretary. Many circular letters, folders, etc., were issued by the Commission under the names of its officers. I shall give only two extracts out of many that may be quoted to show the purpose and the character of information given to stimulate charitable impulses: "This, the Five Million Dollar General Clergy Relief Pension Fund Commission, appointed by the General Convention of 1907, and approved and commended by the General Convention of 1910, proposes to do, by providing an adequate pension by right of service for her clergy at age sixty-four, as distinguished from any sort of relief conditioned upon a confession of penury." Another quotation acknowledging the "Automatic Pensions at sixty-four," as being identical in purpose with that of the Commission, the Secretary in a folder declares: "We have enabled (giving due credit to the interest earned by 'the fund known as Automatic Pensions at sixty-four') the General Clergy Relief Fund to institute a clergy pension by right of service."

The Secretary of the General Convention, in a circular sent out to the clergy, referring to the action of the Convention and purpose of the Commission, uses the following language: "To be used by the General Clergy Relief Fund in payment of pensions to clergymen of our Church who have arrived at the age of sixty-four years."

The General Clergy Relief Fund also from time to time issued statements to the same effect. I quote one of many similar statements: "In addition to the General Clergy Relief Fund there is a Commission appointed to raise five million dollars, the interest alone to be used for the pension of the clergy when they reach the age of sixty-four."

There seems to have been no doubt in the mind of the Church, the Commission, the General Clergy Relief Fund Society, or in the minds of the contributors to the Five Million Dollar Commission, as to the purpose of the Fund, namely, to give a pension at sixty-four by reason of long and honorable service. Can there be any question to-day as to the intent? In a legal opinion of the law firm, Messrs. Davies, Auerbach & Cornell, of New York, immediately after the General Convention of 1913, and called forth by the protests of certain beneficiaries as to the further uses to be made of the funds in the hands of the Five Million Dollar Commission, the following sentence was used: "The General Clergy Relief Society, whenever $10,000 has been accumulated, that sum will be handed over for investment." Continuing, they say: "Without taking time to make quotations, it is apparent from the correspondence and literature submitted to us that response was made by the clergy and laity to the appeals of the Commission upon the distinct understanding that the final disposition of their gifts should be the investment of the same by your corporation (General Clergy Relief Fund) and the use of the income thereof for 'the pensioning by right of every clergyman of this Church at the age of sixty-four,' etc." And again with reference to authorizing disposition of funds that have been collected for a specific purpose. "The Five Million Dollar Commission, being the creation of the General Convention, is subject to the control of the Convention; that control does not embrace the right to direct the Five Million Dollar Commission to make a disposition of its funds contrary to the obligations assumed by the Commission, acting within the scope of its authority, towards its donors or pledgers."

Curiously, the General Convention of 1910 tried to pass a Canon giving the General Clergy Relief Fund full discretion in the distributing of what it then held of the Five Million Dollar Fund, but this was defeated, and afterwards the General Clergy Relief Fund expressed itself as having no discretionary powers, "except only that the years of service may be considered as fixing a proportion, the payment of pensions being a matter of course to every clergyman who has reached the age of sixty-four."

Why should the Church Pension Fund abrogate to itself a power greater than that of the General Convention and fail to meet not only the obligations which it promised to fulfil, but possibly even essaying to divert a fund into channels that were never intended by the contributors to that fund?

The legal opinion given two and a half years ago, referring to the merging of the General Clergy Relief Fund and the Church Pension Fund, declares: "The Enabling Act just passed by the Legislature of New York State, permitting the merger in question, cannot be effective, if by so doing an illegal act is committed."

In the meantime the sad fact remains that those who expected to get at least their usual annuity are now getting nothing. A still more regrettable fact, unlooked for by the vast majority of the Church, is that a large number of annuitants are receiving less than they did before the Church Pension Fund became effective, March 1, 1917.

THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN.

(Abridged.)

Mr. Editor: "We must arouse the churches to a greater responsibility for their children." These words are taken from an address by the Hon. Charles H. Johnson, Secretary New York State Board of Charities.

When outside organizations of the world are watching the Church and noting its shortcomings, is it not time that we who are in the Church and constitute its working and guiding force should arouse ourselves to the full measure of our opportunity and responsibility?

The world has at least a philanthropic interest in itself, and in many instances and ways it goes further. "The world for Christ" is the longing of many men who are now watching what others do who have taken up this work and on whose vigor and push it depends.

The source of earthly initiative and direction and spiritual administration for the Sunday-school must come, it seems to me, from the Church's commissioned ministry. If they neglect this work it will not only be uphill work, but almost impossible, for the laity to do it, or to get inspiration to make the attempt. Is it any wonder that some wayfaring men exclaim with disappointed and heavy hearts. "We must arouse the churches to a greater responsibility for their children."

LEWIS OSTENSON.

WILL THE ARMY "LEVEL UP" OR "LEVEL DOWN."

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew Believes in the "Level Up" Process, and Its Camp Secretaries Are Quietly and Unostentatiously Working to Bring This About.

"You see," remarked B. F. Finney, chief secretary in charge of the field work of the Army and Navy Department of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, "a leveling process is going on in the camps. Now the question is whether those fellows are going to level up or level down. It depends entirely on the Christian worker."

Which expresses the situation in a nut-shell.

The new United States Army is a vast melting pot, in which the young manhood of the nation, rich and poor, educated and uneducated, are thrown together. Army life has its advantages and its disadvantages; its trials and temptations. Thousands of the young men of America will benefit by their military training; they will develop strong, sound bodies and the discipline under which they find themselves will have a lasting and beneficial effect upon their character and lives.

On the other hand, many will succumb to temptation; they will feed the base passions and their military experience will develop in them all that is brutish and vile.

Here then are the two extremes between which hundreds of thousands of mothers' sons are marching. Here are the two magnets, each of which possesses great drawing power, which contend for the possession of the soldiers' souls.

The Christian workers in the camps, the Y. M. C. A. secretaries, the chaplains, and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew camp secretaries have hurled themselves into the fight between good and evil, using every ounce of energy, every atom of influence they possess, to turn the faces of the enlisted men toward the higher goal.

One hears of strange things in the camps.

For instance, there is a brawny private in a certain Illinois regiment, a man of no religious profession, who has threatened to thrash any fellow who molests a quiet little Jew in his company, while the Jew says his prayers.

In another cantonment there is a young Jew who is so fond of his Irish "bunkie" that he makes it a point to be wakeful so as to rout the Irish boy out every morning "in time for mass."

These men will make good. They have the right spirit, and, with or without the assistance of the Church, they will come out of the war better and stronger.

It is the indifferent fellows who are in danger; the ones who do not care what happens. The man who is in this state of mind succumbs to almost any temptation.

The indifferent man is the one who gets drunk.

The indifferent man is the one who consorts with lewd women.

The indifferent man yields quickly to the seductions of the "little game of cards."

The camp secretaries of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew are reaching out for the "indifferent man."

Their "key men" in every company form little groups, and these groups exert an influence for righteousness.

Who can estimate the influence of these groups?

It is a work of man to man, soldier to soldier, comrade to comrade.

It is personal work; the word of advice quietly spoken; the firm handshake; the brotherly hand laid upon the shoulder.

Soldiers, as a rule, have no great respect for "sky pilots," but they are impressed when one of their own number, a brother in arms, quietly and unobtrusively does the little thing which only a Christian would take the trouble and find the courage to do.

And that is the Brotherhood way of working in the Army. It is the Brotherhood method of making the Army "level up" instead of "level down," to use Mr. Finney's words.

There are no big meetings, no preaching, no shouting, no psalm-singing.

The men go quietly about among their comrades, helping them in the hospital, helping them at their work, giving the right word of encouragement, urging them to attend the chapel services, bringing them to the celebrations of the Holy Communion; keeping them in touch with the Church.

God alone will know what will be the fruits of this quiet campaign.

It is the Brotherhood way, and it is a good one.

CRITICAL FOOD SITUATION IN FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

From the U. S. Food Administration.

A cable from British Food Controller Rhondra to the United States Food Administration declares that the food situation in England and France is critical.

"Compulsory rationing of essential foodstuffs is probable," said Rhondra, "and I view the situation with grave anxiety."

"I have repeatedly said in public and private that there is no reason for immediate alarm, although there is every reason for strict economy and precautionary measures. These statements have in some instances been twisted into a declaration that there is plenty of food in England and France.

"The food position in this country, and as I understand it in France also, can now without any exaggeration be described as critical and anxious."

"As I am now unable to avoid compulsory rationing, I fear it will have to come with long queues of people awaiting in the severe weather in practically every town in England for the daily necessities of life."

Only the very poor, and men and women doing the hardest kind of manual labor, may have more than seven ounces of war bread a day in France from now on, according to advices from the French government. The entire French wheat crop has been requisitioned by the government.

This sacrifice has been accepted by the French people uncomplainingly on the government's explanation that only by such restriction can American reinforcements be transported in ships that otherwise would carry grain for their bread, and that in addition this grain for French bread can come from America only by virtue of its actual saving by reduced consumption of bread by the American people.

"These extremely severe measures," said the French statement, "especially the seven ounces a day, have deeply impressed public opinion."

Men who do hard manual labor get about twenty-one ounces of bread a day; women who are very poor or who are employed on hard work get about seventeen ounces a day; everyone else gets seven ounces, which is less than half of a pound loaf, or not more than four or five slices.

This bread is made of flour comprising all the elements of wheat except bran, with a heavy admixture of flour from other cereal grains, which is obligatory.

The price of bread is fixed by various government agencies all along the line between producer and consumer.

Baking of pastry or biscuits from flour that is fit for bread is prohibited. Confectionaries and other such shops are closed two days a week, and eating pastries in public is forbidden.

This is France, war ridden, uncomplaining. Speed the supply ships to France!

SAVE, SUBSTITUTE, SEND, OR SURRENDER!

The Great Commission

In Arizona.

Bishop Atwood sends the following information about progress in Arizona:

"The war adds very much to our work and our burdens. But on the whole we have been able to manage our work pretty well, although we cannot expand as much as we might desire. It was fortunate that we had begun several important enterprises a little while before war was declared. The Bishop's House is very satisfactory in every way, and, with the land on which it is built, is worth nearly $20,000. All this has been paid with the exception of about $2,000, the money for which has been advanced, so no obligation rests upon the property. It is a great asset to this Missionary Diocese. A good parish house has been built at Prescott at a cost of from $8,000 to $9,000, and this also is paid for. It is a center of work for the whole community there. I dedicated it two weeks ago. The combined chapel and guild house in the important mining camp of Clarkdale has just been completed. Eight thousand dollars was given for this building by the daughter of Senator Clark, of New York. Money was given to us by two women not members of our Church for the building of "St. Luke's in the Desert" in Tucson. This will be opened in February and will carry on a work similar to what is being done at St. Luke's, Phoenix. I have recently ordained one man to the diaconate and one to the priesthood. I am hoping soon to secure two clergymen to take permanent charge of the work at Ray and at Clifton and Morenci. At Clifton we have bought a double house and are using a part of it for church services, retaining two rooms for the minister. Both Ray and Clifton are the centers of a mining population of twelve or fifteen thousand people, and they need permanent missionary ministers in place of the services now supplied by the Bishop and other clergy."

Country Missions in Haiti.

Miss Julia C. Emery.

On Saturday, January 19, the Rev. A. R. Llwyd, late rector of St. Luke's Church, Hot Springs, Ark., and now appointed, as Bishop Colmore's commissary, Archdeacon for Haiti, sailed from New York for Port au Prince. Archdeacon Llwyd goes to a field which to many of our Church people is practically unknown. The following letter received three days after the Archdeacon sailed presents an interesting account of the conditions that may welcome him, outside the city. It is written by Mrs. Battiste, who as a girl was with the Sisters in Baltimore. She is now Secretary of the Haiti Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, and wife of the Rev. A. Battiste, in charge of the District of Leogane. The date is January 11.

"Just now everything seems to have come to a standstill in the life of the Church. The war has paralyzed nearly every branch of operation. Being entirely out of the way of contact, the people feel the effects of the war, but not the stimulating motive making it necessary to act.

"We began our round of Christmas visits on Christmas Eve, arriving in Leogane in time for the midnight celebration; and really we had such a cold wave we could have believed ourselves up North! The church was so packed that there was no kneeling room.

"Christmas morning we were at Bignon; St. Stephen's at Dufort; on St. John's at Deslandes; on Sunday it was Mitton Citronnier; Monday the farthest point, Asile Citronnier, where it began to rain, making the roads slippery and nearly impassable, and some places so dangerous that we had to get down and be dragged up the mountains by our guides, putting our feet in the footsteps of the horses that had preceded us, and all that in the bitterest of cold weather. We were so cold we had no heart to admire the beautiful scenery laid out before us and to give more than a passing glance at the orange and shaddock trees laden with their golden fruit, wasted for means of transportation on the crest of those mountains. New Year's Day we were at the real Oranger, still wet and cold. But weather makes no difference to those sturdy mountaineers; they simply drink a cup of coffee and go on.

their way rejoicing. This being the coffee season, every house is well provided with this wholesome beverage, and the chapels were full to overflowing with grown people and children. The day after New Year's we were at Petit Boucau, and still it rained; but the next day saw us, still in the rain, on our way to the city of Leogane, and on the Epiphany our little congregation at Thor kept their Christmas for which they had been preparing for weeks and weeks. The place was crowded, and we will soon have to build a chapel for them; but there is no help—everybody has their hands full as it is."

From Bishop Roots.

The many friends of Bishop Roots, of Hankow, who were not a little concerned about his health last summer, will be glad to know that in a recent letter the Bishop says:

"I never felt better in my life and I am sure that the visit to Shihnan has been not only a good thing from the point of view of our Mission work in general, but also of my personal health in particular. I have traveled a distance of about 300 miles over the hills and walked about two-thirds of the distance, possibly more than that, and the whole trip has been a delightful one in almost every way. I am quite sure, however, that there is no place in the Diocese where conditions are more primitive or the darkness and ignorance of heathenism more oppressive than they are in this Shihnan region, all of which, of course, makes this work all the more important."

Typewriters for Japan.

Japanese young women are beginning to make the acquaintance of the typewriter. Not a machine that writes the weird Chinese characters that constitute Japan's written language, but a real American machine that writes perfectly good English. This is one of the recent developments of St. Agnes' School, Kyoto.

Miss Etta McGrath, who went from St. Luke's Church, Montclair, N. J., last summer to be Bishop Tucker's Secretary and to help in a number of other ways, writes that on April 1 she is to become instructor of typewriting at St. Agnes'. The trouble is she has not a single machine other than the one she uses for Bishop Tucker's work. She needs three machines of standard make. Rebuilt machines, costing approximately $50 each, will serve the need.

Would any young woman who is familiar with writing machines like to form a Typewriter Guild to supply at least one machine?

Would any business man, who knows the necessity and mechanical assistance of a typewriter in modern business, like to give another?

If the first two are given, there will be no difficulty in getting the third.

Mr. John W. Wood, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, will be glad to supply further particulars.

While Miss Julia C. Emery has given up her accustomed responsibilities at the Church Missions House, she still retains an office there, where she will be glad to welcome any of her friends.

The Church Periodical Club announces that its national headquarters, which have been at the Church Missions House, will be at 2 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City, after February 1.

ARMENIAN AND SYRIAN RELIEF.

Where the Money Goes.

An allotment of $650,000 has just been cabled abroad through the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief for distribution as follows:

Two hundred thousand dollars to Constantinople, to be distributed by American citizens attached to the Swedish legation.

Seventy-five thousand dollars to Beirut for the Lebanon region. The American College will have charge of these funds.

One hundred thousand dollars cabled to Jerusalem for distribution throughout Palestine. Consul Garrels, of Cairo, is in charge of the relief here until Consul Glazebrook, returns from America to Jerusalem.

These appropriations were made by the Executive Committee: Samuel T. Dutton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, William B. Millar, George T. Scott, James L. Barton, Charles R. Crane and C. V. Vickrey, after consultation with Charles Beury, a Philadelphia lawyer who has just returned from a trip through western Persia and the Russian Caucasus. Others who have given valuable advice as to the proper proportioning of funds are Consul (the Rev.) Otis H. Glazebrook, of Palestine, and Consul W. Stanley Hollis, who has just returned from Beirut.

Sailors' Club House for Canal Zone.

Dr. George Sidney Webster, Secretary of the American Seamen's Friend Society, announced to-day the results of the conference with Governor Chester Harding, of the Panama Canal Zone, in which plans were made for the erection of a large sailors' club house at the zone which will provide social features for sailors in port at the Atlantic end of the canal.

According to Dr. Webster, whose society last year with its affiliated organizations cared for over 400,000 sailors in port, accommodations for the sailor at Cristobal, Colon, are badly needed. Governor Harding and other officials of the Canal Zone have stated the need for a sailors' headquarters and promises to give the project their co-operation.

Dr. Webster recently announced that $65,000 had been raised to insure the building of a structure and to provide for partial maintenance. A lot centrally located in Cristobal has been secured from the government.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Mid-day Lenten Services, under the auspices of the Richmond Clericus and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, will be held as usual this year in St. Paul's Church from one to one-thirty P. M. every week-day during Lent except Saturdays and Holy Week. Following is a list of the speakers for the six weeks:

First Week—The Rev. Robert Nelson, rector of Christ Church, Blacksburg, Va.

Second Week—The Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina.

Third Week—The Rev. Daniel G. MacKinnon, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Newbern, N. C.

Fourth Week—The Rev. S. Roger Tyler, rector Trinity Church, Huntington, W. Va.

Fifth Week—The Rev. H. H. Covington, rector of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, Va.

Sixth Week—The Rev. A. B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, Maryland.

The Rev. William J. Morton, rector of Christ Church, Alexandria, is delivering a series of sermons on "The Unrecorded Sayings of Christ," which will deal with some of the most important and interesting of these sayings of the Master recorded outside of the New Testament, and which are yet believed by conservative Christian scholars to be authentic reports of Christ's sayings.

A service flag bearing thirty-six stars has been unfurled at Christ Church.

The Rev. J. Winslow Clarke, formerly rector of the Church of the Ascension, Highland Park, Richmond, and who is still canonically connected with the Diocese, is under the care of physicians in Utica, N. C. He is, however, able to attend to his duties at the Orphan Asylum there, of which he was virtually chaplain many years ago.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the meeting of the Ministerial Union of Richmond at the annual dinner, Tuesday night, January 22nd:

"In consequence of the fuel shortage and the necessity laid upon all good citizens to loyally co-operate with the government in its efforts to relieve the situation, the Ministerial Union recommends that the churches form themselves into groups and conduct union services Sunday evenings, and on such evenings during the week as services are desired."

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.

Death of the Rev. J. E. Curzon.

The Rev. John E. Curzon, rector of St. John's Church, Fort Smith, Ark., died suddenly on Saturday, January 19. On Wednesday the Holy Communion was celebrated and the burial service said by Rev. J. W. Thompson in St. John's Church; the Bishop of the Diocese having had a celebration of the Holy Communion with the family on Monday. The interment will take place in the course of a few weeks at Clearmont, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Mr. Curzon was born December 26, 1865, at Darien, Conn. He was educated at St. Stephen's College, New York, and received his theological training at Nashota, began his work in the Diocese of Fond Du Lac, and was ordered deacon by the Rt. Rev. John Henry Hobart Brown, and advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Henry Niles Pierce, of Arkansas. His ministry was spent in the Diocese of Tennessee, Arkansas, Pennsylvania and Marquette. At one time he was Secretary of the Fifth Missionary Department.

He married Miss Evelyn Elizabeth Huston, of Clearmont, Penn., who, with two daughters, survives him.

Though rector of St. John's for less than a year, he had endeared himself to his congregation, and the people of Fort Smith by his devoted pastoral work. The Diocese of Arkansas has sustained a great loss in his death.

Letter From King George.

Bishop Winchester received the following letter from King George of England:

"Buckingham Palace,
"8th January, 1918.

"Right Reverend Sir:

"By command of the King I write to express to you His Majesty's sincere thanks for your kind letter.

"From it the King learns with deep appreciation of the feeling of joy and sympathy with which the Anglican Church of the United States received the news of the taking of Jerusalem by the British troops under the command of General Sir Edmund Allenby.

"The King can realize how the fact of your having visited Palestine and your personal knowledge of the Holy City, brings home to you, as it does to His Majesty, this stirring event in the history of Christianity.

"The King is touched by your assurance of America's joint prayers for the welfare of the President of the United States and of His Majesty, and he fervently reciprocates your inspiring sentiments that a righteous peace may ultimately be established among the nations of the world.

"I have the honor to be,

"Right, Reverend Sir,

"Yours very faithfully,

"Stamfordham,

"Private Secretary to the King."

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Mrs. Albion W. Knight.

Mrs. Albion W. Knight, wife of the Rt. Rev. Albion W. Knight, Vice-Chancellor of the University of the South, died suddenly on January 12 in Jacksonville, Fla., where she had gone with the Bishop only a few days previously, having been called there on account of the illness of her sister. Mrs. Knight, who was Miss Elise Hallows, of Florida, had been an invalid for many years.

Funeral services were held in St. John's Church, Jacksonville, by Bishop Weed, assisted by Bishop Gailor and Bishop Reese. Other clergy present were the Rev. Dr. V. W. Shields and the Rev. Messrs. I. H. Webber-Thompson and Milton R. Worsham. The interment was in Evergreen Cemetery, Jacksonville.

Memorial services were conducted in All Saints' Chapel, Sewanee, simultaneously with the services in Jacksonville.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Joe B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Francis M. Osborne, special representative of the Board of Trustees of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, states that the campaign in North Carolina is about completed, and that the people of the Church are responding faithfully and generously to the appeal made in behalf of this school.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Darst celebrated the third anniversary of his consecration as Bishop of the Diocese at St. James Church, Wilmington, on Epiphany Day.

The Clergy of the Diocese were well represented in the training camps of the South on Sunday, January 20, Bishop Darst and the Rev. R. E. Gribbin, volunteer chaplain, at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C., and the Rev.

Dr. W. H. Milton, member of the Church War Commission, at Camp Greene, Charlotte, N. C.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop William P. Remington, who was recently consecrated Bishop of Minnesota, is chaplain of the Unit No. 26 at the base hospital, now located at Fort McPherson, near Atlanta. Bishop Remington was consecrated in the uniform of the United States Army, and then left immediately for his post as chaplain.

The Rev. J. S. McCloud, of Nashville, Tenn., has been called to be rector of St. James Church, Macon, and it is understood that he will accept. Mr. McCloud is a graduate of Sewanee. He was formerly the assistant of Bishop Mikell when he was rector of Christ Church, Nashville.

The Rev. Randolph R. Chaborne has been appointed Chairman of the War Savings Committee for Cobb County, Georgia.

All Saints Church, Atlanta, the Rev. W. W. Memminger, rector, is keeping open house every Sunday afternoon for the soldiers at Camp Gordon. The soldiers respond in numbers. They are entertained and refreshed, and it is made as much like home as possible.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of the Archdeaconry of Albany.

The Archdeaconry of Albany held its semi-annual meeting in St. Matthew's Church, Fitzgerald, the Rev. J. W. Bleker, rector, January 22, 23, 24. The Bishop preached the opening sermon, other sermons being preached by the Rev. Messrs. W. B. Sams, W. W. Webster, and J. B. Lawrence. An interesting thesis was read by the Rev. R. N. MacCallum on "Democracy and Christianity." The Rev. J. W. Bleker read a review of "The Church Enchained." The One Hundred and Forty-third Psalm was carefully studied by the Clergy and discussed under the leadership of the Rev. John Moore Walker.

Three cottage prayer services were held, two of the Clergy going together to each place. It was decided to hold the next meeting in October in Christ Church, Valdosta. The main object of this meeting will be the Apostles' Creed.

At the business meeting held in Fitzgerald great interest was shown in the search of scattered communicants. The reports showed that in the past few years communicants have been found in ten counties hitherto untouched by our Church. It is arranged that regular ministrations be supplied to these communicants so far as possible. This shows very good progress in working out one of the main missionary policies of the Diocese, which is, to extend the Church into every county within our bounds.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of South Carolina held its thirty-third annual Convention at Union, January 15-18, and throughout the proceedings sustained a record of high purpose and achievement. The opening service was conducted in the Church of the Nativity, with the Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., and Dr. William C. Sturgis, speakers of the evening. The Bishop commended in glowing terms the work of the Auxiliary and stressed with forceful words the supreme necessity of putting first and foremost the Church and its activities as representing that power to which alone we may look for permanent and righteous peace, and held as a mistaken sense of proportion the neglect and sacrifice of spiritual things to the advancement of other interests, however vital and compelling. The Convention heard with pleasure the Bishop's announcement of the creation of a War Commission by the Church and the campaign to be inaugurated for its support.

Dr. Sturgis spoke, by request, on the subject of Prayer, and in eloquent, earnest appeal brought home to a large congregation present a realization of the power of prayer and the futility of the prayerless life.

At the celebration of the Holy Communion Wednesday morning the united offering was presented—the voluntary thank-offering over and above all pledges amounting to $916 for the six months since the change of the fiscal year from May to January.

The business session of the Convention was called to order by the President, Miss Katie Lee, and the invocation was pronounced by Bishop Guerry. Addresses of welcome were delivered by the Rev. L. W. Blackwelder, rector of the parish, and by Mrs. J. W. Mixson, president of the local branch. Letters of greeting were read from Miss Lindley, General Secretary; Miss Alice Gregg, China, and Miss Uta Saito, Japan, and to them and Miss Emery, former General Secretary, messages of cordial appreciation were sent. Reports from all officers received close attention, and a marked feature of the Convention was the sustained interest of the delegates throughout the sessions. Especial interest was manifested in the daily noonday prayer for our country, our soldiers and sailors recommended for observance in the churches throughout the Diocese.

The Study Classes conducted by Miss Ford were attended with much interest. Mrs. C. T. Lundgren presided over the Junior Auxiliary sessions, and the Convention body enjoyed a Junior demonstration given by the local branch.

Thursday evening the Convention heard talks on "The Catawba Indians," by Mrs. Alexander Long; "Work Among the Negroes," by Mrs. W. P. Cornell; "The Mill Operatives," Graniteville, Miss Ford; Columbia, Miss Singleton; "The Red Cross," Mrs. Mixson; "Rural Districts," the Rev. A. R. Mitchell, Archdeacon.

The cordial hospitality of the people of Union was manifested in every way compatible with the crowded program, the reception at the home of Mrs. F. H. Garner proving a delightful occasion.

The month of January having been found undesirable as a Convention experiment, it was determined to revert to May in the Convention month, closing the fiscal year, however, in January, as recommended by the Board of Missions. Resolutions of appreciation of the faithful administration of the retiring President, Miss Lee, and other officers were voted.

The officers elected for 1918 are as follows:

President, Mrs. W. P. Cornell; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. A. P. Gaillard, Mrs. D. D. Taber, Mrs. J. J. Miles; Secretary, Mrs. T. M. McCarrell; Treasurer, Miss I. B. Heyward; Educational Secretary, Miss M. P. Ford; Box Secretary, Mrs. F. P. Henderson; United Offering Custodian, Miss Virginia T. Singleton; Secretary of Junior Department, Mrs. C. T. Lundgren.

SOUTHERN FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., Bishop

Meeting of Woman's Auxiliary.

The twenty-fifth annual Diocesan meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in the Cathedral Parish, Orlando, on January 9th, Bishop Mann celebrating the Holy Communion for the women of the Auxiliary and guilds. The business session was called to order in the Chapter House by the President, Mrs. Cameron Mann, who gave an interesting and helpful address. Reports were given from Mrs. O. M. Eaton, of Lakeland, Vice-President; Mrs. J. J. Bridges, Secretary; Mrs. A. C. Moore, of Tampa, Treasurer; Mrs. E. W. Shaw, of Tampa, Treasurer of United Offering; Mrs. E. L. Bliss, Educational Secretary; Mrs. Huguenin, of Lakeland, President of the "Little Helpers," and Mrs. S. C. Thompson, of Ocoee, for the Church Periodical Club.

At noon prayers for missions were offered by the Bishop and an interesting address was given by Rev. B. W. Soper, of Coconut Grove, regarding the industrial school for colored people located at that point.

A resolution of sympathy was sent to Deaconess Parkhill, with regret over her absence through sickness.

The Committee on Nominations reported in favor of re-electing the present officers, the only change being placing Mrs. Benjamin Freer, of Winter Park, as Vice-President.

The annual meeting of the Junior Auxiliary was held in the afternoon in the Chapter House, the President, Miss Marian Cary-Elwes, presiding and giving a brief address. Mrs. H. Voorhis, Secretary-Treasurer, also spoke in behalf of this work.

Daughters of The King.

The twenty-second annual Local Assembly, Daughters of the King, was held on January 10 in the Cathedral Parish, Orlando, Bishop Mann celebrating the Holy Communion, and giving a helpful address to this Order.

A brief service, with earnest address by Dean Glass, was followed by a business session. The following officers were elected. Miss Corinne Robinson, Orlando, President; Miss Louise Hindry, West Palm Beach, Vice-President; Mrs. R. G. Lamberton, Tampa, Secretary, and Mrs. Fred Hand, Miami, Treasurer.

After completing routine business, a closing service was held in the Cathedral by the Rev. J. M. McGrath, of Ormond, who gave a forceful address on the power and work of the Holy Ghost.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop

The Institute For Religious Education of the Diocese of Delaware was held in St. John's Church, Wilmington, the Rev. A. Richey, D. D., rector, on January 28, 29, 30. On Monday evening an address on "Religious Education" was made by the Rev. Dr. S. U. Mitman, and on Tuesday evening, the Rev. Dr. H. K. W. Kumm made an address on "Africa." The leaders in the several subjects were as follows: "Normal Mission Study," Dr. H. K. W. Kumm, of Summit, N. J.; "Teacher Training," Miss Helen I.

Jennings, of Pottsville, Pa.; "New Junior Plan," Miss Dorothy Giles, of Cold Spring-on-Hudson, N. Y.; "Missions in the Sunday-school," Rev. H. W. Stowell, Provincial Secretary for Missions.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop

Church of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, Destroyed by Fire. Letter from Bishop Burton.

Church of the Good Shepherd, Lexington.

Shortly before the hour for night service on Sunday, January 20, the Church of the Good Shepherd in Lexington, Ky., was destroyed by fire. A new location in a substantial and growing part of the city has been purchased, and the church removed thereto.

Under the inspiring and energetic ministry of the Rev. Dr. Richard Wilkinson, the indebtedness involved in this removal has been wiped out, and the church had later been enlarged and beautified at a cost of some $9,500; and all but about $1,500 of this sum had been pledged, and most of the pledges had been paid.

Pastor and people left their burning church when any salvage was clearly hopeless, and at a meeting nearby heroically resolved to build again, notwithstanding the exhausting effect of their previous gifts and labors.

It was my privilege to meet with them, and I promised to secure as much aid as possible from outside this city. Dean Massie and his Cathedral congregation, with quick sympathy, sprang enthusiastically to the financial assistance of the afflicted congregation; and Dr. Wilkinson has many friends in the community at large who will contribute toward the new church.

We must rebuild at once, and as attractively and commodiously as possible, if our beloved church would hold its own in the popular eastward part of the city of Lexington.

Lewis W. Burton,
Bishop of Lexington.

January 25, 1918.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop

The War Commission of the Diocese issued a letter to the people of the Diocese, urging them to co-operate with the Commission in their efforts to raise Louisiana's full quota of the $500,000, the sum necessary to carry on the war work of the Church for one year. Contributions should be sent to Mr. Warren Kearney, Treasurer, 520 South Peters Street, New Orleans.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan

Prize Awarded.

Last April a prize of one hundred dollars was offered by an unknown donor through the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Pennsylvania for the best essay on "The Field of Service Open to Members of Religious Orders in the Preaching of Social Righteousness." The Commission asked Bishop Brewster, of Maine; Professor Miller, of the General Theological Seminary, and Miss Vida Scudder to serve as judges. They have decided unanimously in favor of the essay of Mr. Alfred Scott Priddis, of the Cambridge Episcopal Theological School, to whom the prize is therefore awarded.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention.

The opening session of the fifty-third Annual Convention took place at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, the Rev. Wyatt Brown, D. D., rector, on Tuesday evening, January 22. After a brief service the Bishop gave his annual address, followed by a brief charge.

He commented at some length on the war, its just cause, and the terrible lack of any nobleness of purpose or method on the part of the enemy. He cited several German utterances of years ago, foretelling the present conflict, and clearly indicating that the ultimate purpose of it on the part of the Germans was the humiliation of the United States and the demand for billions of money from this country to pay for the war.

He adverted to the wonderful delivery of Jerusalem from the Turkish domination, regarding it as an augury of the final triumph symbolized by the Holy City. The Bishop added an exhortation to the people to manifest true patriotism by the speedy payment of income tax now levied on six millions of persons, necessary for the prosecution of the Government's plans; at the same time the need of being careful not to neglect home duties, the Church, Sunday school, and the religious heads of the community; in order that when the war is over there will be a worthy result, and not demoralization. Ninety-five million, at least, are those at home, and a mere handful go down to the battle for the preservation of the country, which lies, after all, in the hands of the great multitude at home.

The Bishop had much to say about the Episcopal War Commission. Four clergymen of the Diocese of Pittsburgh are serving in the Army, the Rev. Mr. Howell, of Sewickley; the Rev. Mr. Hawkesworth, of Sheridanville; the Rev. Mr. Brown, of Wilmording; and the Rev. Mr. Sanwell, of St. George's, Pittsburgh.

The Bishop created some surprise and much interest by saying that there ought to be elected for the Diocese a Suffragan Bishop; and that matter, no doubt, will come later for consideration.

In closing his address, the Bishop spoke as follows: "This year has for me personally a special interest. It is the fiftieth or Jubilee Year of my priesthood, and it is the golden wedding year of Mrs. Whitehead and myself. Both of these occurred a half century ago, but not, of course, on the same date. If I live until my seventy-sixth birthday in October, I invite the Diocese, its clergy and people, to celebrate with me the triple events. Already the courteous rector of this parish has accorded me the use of church and parish house for a Jubilee service and reception. In no other way can I invite all the members of the Diocese without exception to rejoice with me, except through the representatives of all the parishes and missions here assembled. Pray God our lives be spared for such a unique and joyful observance."

At the close of the service the Convention organized by the election of the Rev. Mr. Lamb as Secretary.

Wednesday morning was taken up with the reading of various reports.

A representative Committee was appointed to arrange for the proper observance of the Jubilee of the Bishop's ordination, comprising the Rev. Drs. Brown, Hills, and the Rev. Messrs. Slayton and Richards, and Messrs. E. T. Dravo, F. S. Bissell, R. W. Bailey, J. E. Brown, and G. H. Danner.

The Bishop strongly recommended in his address the wisdom of Insurance Endowment for the Diocese, and the Convention appointed a Committee to give this matter consideration and report to the next Convention.

The report of the President of the Saint Margaret Memorial Hospital showed very gratifying improvement in the condition of affairs.

As there would be a great demand for the work of the Social Service Commission in the present time, instructions were given that an assessment of $500 be made for the use of the Diocesan Commission, the proportion due to the Joint Commission to be paid therefrom. Several items of special interest in connection with the war were placed in the hands of the Diocesan Commission for action.

There were repeated strong appeals made in behalf of the War Commission's Campaign, and the Bishop strongly commended the work of the Commission in its efforts to raise funds for its purposes. He read letters from Bishop Israel and from the rector of St. James' Church, Florence, telling of the needs in these churches, and requested the Convention to ask the War Commission to make an adequate appropriation if possible for the churches in Paris and Florence. for the purpose of helping the work and relieving the anxiety of those in charge.

The afternoon session was almost wholly devoted to the consideration of the Missionary work of the Diocese. The Treasurer reported the largest balance in the treasury for many years. The Archdeacon and several of the missionaries from the field made stirring addresses concerning the work; the President of the Woman's Auxiliary spoke in behalf of that organization, and Mr. W. A. Cornelius for the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The Rev. Dr. Flint made a report for the Committee on the Missionary Survey of the Diocese appointed last year.

The Central Missionary Committee reported that for three successive years the Diocese had paid its apportionment for General Missions, and that a larger number of parishes than usual had this year paid or overpaid their allotment.

Changes in the Constitutions and Canons were ratified and adopted to bring them into harmony with the action of the Convention concerning better business methods in Diocesan matters.

A Special Committee was appointed to consider and report to the next Convention that part of the Bishop's address which had to do with a Bishop-Suffragan.

The Vestry of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, presented a resolution to the effect that the parish was willing to consider the turning over of its property to the Board of Trustees for Cathedral purposes, and asked that the matter be referred to the Cathedral Committee of the Diocese.

A Diocesan War Committee was appointed, consisting of two clergymen and three laymen, to be known as the War Committee of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, the purpose being that such Committee should assist the General War Commission of the Church in every possible way. The Rev. Dr. Flint, of Crafton, is chairman of this Committee.

The following were elected members of the Standing Committee. The Rev. Drs. Hills, Brown, Vance and Shero, and Messrs. Hyndman, McClintic, Shoemaker and Snowdon.

Bishop's Anniversary: On the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, Bishop Whitehead celebrated the thirty-sixth anniversary of his Consecration at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh. The service consisted of a celebration of the Holy Communion, with a brief address.

SALINA.

Rt. Rev. J. C. Sage, D. D., Bishop.

Consecration of the Rev. Dr. Sage as Bishop of Salina.

The Rev. John Charles Sage, D. D., was consecrated Bishop of Salina on Thursday morning, January 17, in St. John's Church, Keokuk, Iowa. Holy Communion was celebrated at 7:30 by the Rev. W. C. Hengen, and Morning Prayer was read at 9:30. The Consecration Service began at 10:30, with the processional hymn 249. The Rev. George Long was master of ceremonies, and the Rev. Felix H. Pickworth, deputy register. The Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Church, was the Consecrator, and the Co-Consecrators were the Bishop of Iowa and the Bishop-Suffragan of Chicago. Bishop Griswold read the Epistle and Bishop Morrison the Gospel. The Rt. Rev. Irving P. Johnson, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Colorado, was the preacher, taking for his text Acts 20:24.

The Bishop-elect was presented by Bishop Williams, of Nebraska, and Bishop Wise, of Kansas, and the attending presbyters were the Rev. E. H. Rudd, D. D., and the Rev. Charles J. Shutt. The certificate of election was read by the Rt. Rev. Harry S. Longley, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Iowa. Certificates and testimonials were read by Dr. D. C. Morrow, the Rev. A. M. Lewis and Mr. H. W. Upham.

At the close of the service the visiting bishops and clergy were the guests of the vestry of St. John's Church at a dinner in the new Iowa Hotel, when short addresses were made by all the bishops present, and the Rev. John Dysart, of Dubuque, and the Rev. H. M. Babin, of Dixon, Ill., rectors of the parishes where Bishop Sage had been rector; Mr. Upham and Mr. G. C. Tucker, senior and junior wardens of St. John's, and several other of the clergy and laymen present. Bishop Sage made a graceful and appropriate address in response to all that had been said.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. Wm. F. Adams, D. D., Bishop

Southern Convocation.

The winter meeting of the Southern Convocation was held in St. Peter's Church, Salisbury, the Rev. Herbert D. Cone, rector, January 8 and 9. The sermon Tuesday night was by the Rev. Louis L. Williams, using for his text 1 St. John 3:17, and therefrom making an appeal for the suffering Armenians and Syrians.

At the celebration of the Holy Eucharist the following day the appointed preacher being absent the sermon was preached by the Very Rev. Dean, S. A. Potter from Genesis 18:23-25.

In the afternoon a business session was held, followed by a discussion on "How Can the Attendance at Evening Prayer on Sundays be Increased?" In the debate which followed two theories were advanced: the loss of the idea of worship, due to the attempt to entertain and amuse, and the failure of parents to bring their children to the services of the Church. All Hallows Church, Snow Hill, the Rev. G. M. Galarneau, rector, was chosen for the May meeting, during the meeting of the Worcester County Woman's Auxiliary. At night the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. A. Brown from St. Mark 4:26-27.

The Rev. J. A. Brown, rector of Stepney and Spring Hill Parishes, who has labored in this Diocese during the past six years, has asked to be retired, from January 1. Mr. Brown has been actively engaged in the sacred ministry during the past fifty-three years.

The Rev. Hunter Davidson, of Bristol, Va., formerly from this section of Maryland, has accepted a call to Christ Church Parish, Stevensville, and has entered upon his work.

SPOKANE.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop

An increased interest is being shown all over the District in the work of the Sunday-schools. Two successful meetings of the Spokane Clergy and their Sunday-school teachers have already been held this year at All Saints Chapter House, the first being addressed by Bishop Page, and the second by the Rev. Gilbert W. Laidlaw, rector of St. James Church, Pullman. In each case much interesting discussion resulted.

Holy Trinity Church, Spokane, the Rev. J. A. Palmer, rector, has undergone some extensive improvements, and it is now one of the most churchly edifices in the District of Spokane. Considering the limited space it would be very hard to conceive a better arrangement than has been made, and much credit is due to all who had a share in the work of reconstruction.

St. Thomas Church for the colored people of Spokane has as its new vicar the Rev. M. J. Stevens, of Epiphany, Hillyard. The congregations are steadily increasing, and the outlook is brighter now than for many years past.

NEVADA.

Rt. Rev. G. C. Hunting, D. D., Bishop

Death of Mrs. Ross Turman.

A very great sorrow has come to the Church in Nevada, in the sudden death of Amy S. Mott Turman, wife of the Rev. Ross Turman, vicar of St. Mary's Church, Winnemucca. Children and parents were in the Parish Hall for the Sunday-school Christmas tree. Presents were being distributed when Mrs. Turman was suddenly stricken and died in a few moments. The whole community grieves, for she had endeared herself to all. Her splendid life and faith were an inspiration. She willingly made her sacrifices and gave herself fully in leaving California and coming to Nevada to take up missionary work with her husband.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The mid-winter session of the Archdeaconry of Williamsport was held in Christ Church, Williamsport, Wednesday, January 16. With few exceptions all the Clergy of the Archdeaconry were present, including the Bishop. The regular session was preceded by a layman's meeting, which was held in Trinity House. For years past this occasion has been attended by from three to five hundred men. Owing to storm conditions and uncertainty of trains the number this year was reduced to about a hundred. Splendid addresses were made by Mr. George E. Wendle on "The Nation's Relations to Its Industries," and by Mr. Harry S. Knight on "The Individual's Opportunity in the Economic Readjustment." The Bishop made the closing address on "How to Win the Cross of Honor." St. Agnes' Guild of Trinity Parish served refreshments. The session of the Archdeaconry was chiefly characterized by an address made by the chancellor of the Diocese, C. LaRue Munson, Esq., on "The Need of Men," and an address by the Rev. F. M. C. Bedell, of Shamokin, on "Securing Men for the Ministry."

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Archdeaconry met in Christ Church synchronously with the Archdeaconry. At the special election Mrs. Stephen T. Hayt, Jr., was elected Vice-President of the Archidiaconal branch. Deaconess Newbold, missionary in Japan from this Diocese, made an address.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The 1918 Convention of the Diocese of Bethlehem will be held in Trinity Church, Pottsville, and the Bishop of the Diocese, with the concurrence of the Standing Committee, has fixed the date for the fourth Tuesday in May (the 28th).

The winter session of the Archdeaconry of Reading was held at Christ Church, Reading (the Rev. Frederick A. MacMillen, rector), on January 7 and 8. On Monday evening at Evening Prayer, after greetings by the rector and by Archdeacon H. E. A. Durell, and a salutation by Bishop Talbot, there was a sermon by the Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, Bishop-Suffragan of Pennsylvania. On Tuesday morning, the Rev. John Porter Briggs, rector of All Saints' Church, Shenandoah, read a paper on "The Loyalty of the Clergy to the Bishop and of the Bishop to the Clergy." This was followed by Bishop Talbot's talk on "The Loyalty of the Diocese to the General Church." In the absence of the Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, of Philadelphia, who was to have conducted the Quiet Hour at noon, the Rev. Guy H. Madara, of Saint Clair, read his paper, "The Loyalty of the Clergy to the Clergy." Luncheon was served by the ladies of the Parish.

The Archdeaconry of Scranton held its winter meeting at St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre (the Rev. Frank W. Sterrett, rector), January 16 and 17. On Wednesday evening, Dr. J. Fowler Richardson gave an organ recital. After Evening Prayer the following addresses were given: "Work Among the Italians in the Diocese of Bethlehem," by the Rev. F. C. Capozzi, Italian missionary; "Missions in War Time," by Bishop Talbot. On Thursday morning there was an Exegesis by the Rev. Percy T. Olton, of Towanda, followed by "The Autobiography of a Modernist," by the Rev. E. J. Morris, pastor of the Puritan Church, Wilkes-Barre. "The National Service Commission" was the subject treated by the Rev. Seldon J. Haynes, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Kingston. The Rev. Robert P. Kreidler, of St. Luke's Church, Scranton, presented a paper on "The War Commission." Luncheon was served at the Hotel Sterling.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

The Diocesan Board of Religious Education met and elected as officers, Chairman, the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent; Secretary, the Rev. D. C. Huntington. They acceded to the request of the southwestern part of the Diocese to be set apart as a special division, and that they be allowed to develop the rural work in their district.

The Syrian Orthodox Church held their Christmas Midnight Service, according to Eastern time, January the 6. Grace Church, Grand Rapids, was loaned to them for this service.

Church Work Hindered: The terrible blizzards and shortage of coal and the order by Mr. Garfield closing the churches and parishes to but six hours a week, has hindered the work of the Church greatly.

rett, D. D., associate rector, will be acting rector.

The Rev. Clarence E. Ball has assumed his duties as locum-tenens at the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity, South Bethlehem, Pa.

The Rev. Julian D. Hamlin, of Trinity Church, Bethlehem, Pa., has resigned, and has been appointed by the Bishop of Pennsylvania to army work at Camp Meade, Md.

The Rev. William Hall Williams has resigned as rector of All Saints' Church, Austin, Texas. After the first week in February he should be addressed at the Harvard Club of Boston, Boston, Mass.

The Rev. R. N. Willcox, formerly rector of St. James Church, Henderson, N. C., assumed his duties as rector of St. Luke's Church, Watertown, N. Y., last month. The Rev. A. W. Farnum, of Minnesota, succeeds Mr. Willcox at Hendersonville.

The Rev. J. Henry Brown, who has accepted the position of vicar of St. Augustine's Church, Savannah, Ga., expects to take up his new work about February 11. His address will be 440 Bolton Street, West.

For the present the address of Bishop Francis is chaplain of Base Hospital 32, American Expeditionary Force, via New York.

The Rev. Paul O. Keicher has resigned his work at the Church of St. Ignatius, New York, and is now at work in the Y. M. C. A. camp at San Antonio.

The address of the Rev. John Addams Linn, who is a Y. M. C. A. Secretary in France, is 12 Rue d'Aguesseau, Paris, France.

The Rev. Wilfred A. Munday, of Anthony, Kansas, has enlisted in the medical department of the United States Army, and is at present at Fort Logan, Colo.

The Rev. E. L. Tull has become assistant to Dean Hart at the Cathedral, Denver, Colo., and will have charge of the Sunday-school boys' work and the juvenile choir of the Cathedral.

The Rev. George St. G. Tyner has resigned as vicar of St. Augustine's Church, DeWitt, Nebr., to accept work in France with the Y. M. C. A.

The address of the Rev. Clarence D. Frankel, who is supplying in vacant Parishes and Missions of the Diocese, has been changed to 6330 Marchand Street, E. E., Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Rev. J. Norton Atkins has been transferred to Blowing Rock, N. C., in the Missionary District of Asheville, and plans are under consideration for the erection of a new church there.

Ordinations.

On Sunday morning, January 13, in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, Bishop Greer ordained to the diaconate Messrs. Acton Griscom, Leonard Twinem, Leighton Williams, D. D., and Gustave J. d'Anchise; and advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. Harold A. E. McClean, Albert J. M. Wilson, Lindley H. Miller, Kenneth R. Buchanan, Harold O. Boon and Kenneth I. Rice (for the Bishop of Oklahoma). The sermon was preached by the Very Rev. Dr. Fosbrooke, Dean of the General Theological Seminary. (Continued on page 22.)

Personal Notes

The Rev. H. H. D. Sterrett, rector of All Souls' Memorial Church, Washington, D. C., has been granted a leave of absence by his vestry, and is now chaplain, with rank of first lieutenant, in the Twenty-sixth Regiment Engineers, at Camp Dix. During his absence, his father, the Rev. J. M. Ster-

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

We put at the head of this page today with most cordial endorsement and with full desire to help in its wide publicity this recent statement by one of the secretaries of the Federal Council of Churches upon a matter to which the Christian people of this nation should be alert:

The pernicious doctrine sedulously instilled for two generations into the rank and file of the German people, asserting the intrinsic superiority of their race, religion and kultur and prophesying that they and their kultur are to secure world domination by military prowess, has been the chief cause of the present world tragedy.

A similarly pernicious doctrine of "white race superiority" is being sedulously instilled into the minds of the American people. Its advocates talk continuously of "white race world supremacy" and the "inevitable conflict of the white and yellow races for world dominion." This propaganda is preparing us for another world tragedy. If this psychological poison is not overcome soon enough by the appropriate anti-toxin, it is not difficult to foresee what the future has in store for the world.

The latest injection into the veins of the American people of this international poison, is a two column editorial in a recent edition of the New York American, from which the following quotations are taken. The editorial is no doubt reproduced in all the Hearst papers throughout the United States, which are more widely read by the rank and file of our people than any other papers in America:

"Americans * * * must be deeply alarmed by the success of Japanese diplomacy and the situation created by that diplomacy.

"We do not know whether there is a danger of the Japanese joining with Germany which makes our government so considerate of Japan, or whether our government is merely unsuspecting of the very obvious designs of Japan. * * *

"It is a thousand times more dangerous to the United States to have west Siberia fall into the hands of Japan than to have it in the hands of the Bolsheviks, or even to have it fall under the influence of the Germans. * * *

"What is to protect the United States itself from the attack which the then great Oriental nation, embracing China, Japan, Korea and western Siberia, may launch upon us? * * *

"The war in Europe, hideous as it is, is merely a family quarrel compared to the terrible struggle that will some day be fought to a finish between the white and the yellow races for the domination of the world. * * *

"The only battles (of the past) which count are the battles which saved white races from subjugation by the yellow races, and the only thing of real importance to-day is the rescue of the white races from conditions which make their subjugation by the yellow races possible. * * *

"The great problem with which the white races have to deal is the inevitable and irresponsible (irrepressible?) conflict of the white races with the yellow races for the dominion of the world. * * *

"Is it not time that the white nations settled their quarrels among themselves and made preparations to meet their one real danger, the menace to Christianity, to Occidental standards and ideals, to the white man's civilization, which the constantly growing power and aggression of the yellow races continually and increasingly threaten?"

Shall Americans complacently let this doctrine run its course until it plunges the world into another ocean of blood?

The true antidote for this poison is a campaign of education promoting fair dealing, honest statements of facts and constructive legislation. We should remove the humiliating conditions we now impose upon Asiatics. By such measures America can win the lasting good will of Asiatics and make of the alleged "yellow peril" a golden opportunity for the practice of genuine Christianity.

The report has been published and is now in circulation of the notable Conference on Law and Order, which was held last summer at Blue Ridge, North Carolina, to discuss particularly the problems of the right relationship of the races in the South. The delegates included college presidents, State Superintendents of Education, business men, lawyers, doctors, social workers, ministers, secretaries of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations.

For three days they discussed with great earnestness the conditions of lawlessness in the South and possible remedies for these conditions. The report of the proceedings under the title "Lawlessness or Civilization—Which?" may be secured from W. D. Weatherford, 1005 Independent Life Building, Nashville, Tenn.

The addresses dealt with the causes of the Northern migration of negroes, as the response not only to an economic law of supply and demand, but also as the reaction to certain social or anti-social aspects of life for the negro in the South; with court procedure and with lynching; with the falsity of the idea that lynching is in the end a protection to womanhood; with "Religion the Basis of Respect for Personality," and with "The Churches' Obligation."

The notable aspect of the conference was that it sought to crystallize the thought and opinion of Southern leaders for constructive treatment in and by the South of its social needs.

Here is an interesting news item from New York of recent date:

Rallies having for their aim the recruiting of new men to work as volunteers in churches of New York, in places of workers who have gone to war, will begin to-day. It is stated that the number of such workers now at cantonments or in France is at least four thousand for the metropolitan district of New York alone.

The rallies are to be held under the direction of the Institute of Applied Christianity. Bishop Greer and the archdeacons of New York and Brooklyn, the authorities of the New York Presbytery, the Methodist Conference and others are calling for volunteer workers, especially men of ability who can give time on Sundays and some week nights. Laymen are wanted in some places to serve as ministers.

A problem which all sections of the country are likely to find themselves called upon to solve is typified by the situation in the State of Virginia as reported by the State Board of Health:

About four hundred and fifty doctors from Virginia have been called to war service, and more will be called. In many sections of the State there is only one doctor to a population of from one to two thousand. People are suffering now from lack of medical attention, and as the war progresses the suffering will be greater unless something is done at once. The sad experience of England and France has shown that the health of the civilian population cannot be neglected.

Public health nurses are to-day the most effectual means of off-setting the shortage of doctors. They must be had to help prevent sickness in order to reduce as much as possible the necessity for physicians.

The hospital graduate without special training in public health work cannot do much to relieve the situation. Under ordinary conditions a four to eight months' course is considered necessary to equip nurses to go into the field. To-day a serious war emergency confronts us, and it must be met.

The School of Social Work and Public Health in Richmond is offering, at the request of and in co-operation with the State Board of Health, a short emergency course in public health nursing, of six weeks. This course is, in addition to the regular four months' course which the school itself offers (beginning February 1st), which leads to a certificate.

There are to-day six positions, paying from $900 to $1,200, in the State unfilled and no nurses with adequate training can be found to take them.

God's Work.

In every moment of our days, when once our hearts are yielded to His service, God is working in us and through us. Hitherto, perhaps, our little world has only been large enough to hold self and the present. But gradually, through tender leadings and unfoldings, and, it may be, through pain and suffering, we come to learn life's lesson—that it is God's world, not ours; that our existence is not finished and rounded off here, but forms part of one vast scheme to which mind and heart and spirit expand and grow, while all the horizon round them grows and expands, too, until it touches the shore of the illimitable future, and we become conscious that earth and heaven are not so far separated but that the first is but the vestibule of the second—imperfect, cloudy, full of broken fragments, but still part of the same temple of God as that to which we shall pass in by and by.—H. Bowman.

Sexagesima: The Report of the Canterbury Commission on Revision of the English Lectionary contains a suggestion that has been for some time in the minds of some of the American Commission, viz., to introduce each lesson by a few explanatory words. How would it do, for instance, to start the first lesson this Sunday morning in some such way as this: "Here beginneth the twentieth verse of the nineteenth chapter of the second book of Kings, being God's answer through His prophet Isaiah to the prayer of Hezekiah the King for deliverance from the army of the King of Assyria"? And perhaps the second lesson might be prefaced by the words: "Here beginneth the twelfth chapter of the Book of Revelation, being the prophecy of final deliverance from evil." The Old Testament selection comes in the regular sequence of the historico-topical course, and the New Testament lesson was taken according to the principle of correlating the two lessons with each other and at the same time carrying forward and upward to the Christian stage the principal point of the Divine Revelation on a lower plane. The deliverance of Jerusalem from the army of Sennacherib is not only an historical instance of God's Church defended by the power of God against adversity (Collect), but even fits the basis of petition, "Who seest that we put not our trust in anything that we do." It is in the same class with the capture of Jericho. But deliverance does not always come this way. Oftener faith means being co-workers together with God; and this is brought out in the second lesson. That the Church itself must go through the experiences of the Christ would seem to be plain amidst much that is mysterious in Rev. 12.

The same topic of deliverance is carried over into the evening by the Isaiah selection, being part of a discourse by the prophet against reliance upon Egypt (flesh). If in our efforts at self-deliverance we refuse the strength that comes from "quietness and confidence," then must God "wait that He may be gracious" unto us. The second lesson (rather long, it must be confessed) not only tells of the One who alone fully exemplified Isaiah's plea for the use of spiritual weapons, but supplements the prophet's one-sided argument against reliance upon the flesh. Isaiah 31:3, for instance (continuation of chapter 30), if it stood alone, might justify that pseudo-spirituality which denies the existence or rightful use of matter and secondary causes; but the life of the "Word made flesh" shows that true spirituality consists in the consecration and use of matter and material things not in their denial.

The week day selections in the morning continue the Old Testament course and begin Jeremiah, paralleling that with the continuation of St. Mark's Gospel; and in the evening there are selections from Micah (who prophesied deliverance—see close of last chapter), accompanied by selections from I and II Corinthians which have as their theme spiritual power leading up to final victory over both sin and death and the transformation of Christians at last into the glory of their Lord.

C. B. WILMER.

For the Southern Churchman. The Purification of Saint Mary the Virgin.

Rev. Carroll Lund Bates.

Just two score days had passed away,
Since, in a lowly manger bed,
With Mary watching o'er His head,
Pillowed in straw, the Christ-Child lay.

"When the Hebrew mother forty days Hath numbered," so the Scripture spake,
"Let her to God's House go, and praise Jehovah, and an offering make."

"If worldly goods her lot have blessed,
A lamb shall then her offering be;
If poor, let her not be distressed,
Two turtle-doves shall be her fee."

Glad, then, when forty days had run,
Just at the rising of the sun,
With the sweet Christ-Child warmly pressed
Close to her beating mother-breast,

With humble gift of doves a pair,
Bought with such coins as she could spare,
Mary set forth along the way
To God's blest City, there to pay

Her Hebrew vow, and to make sure
Her peace with God, with fervor pure—
Lo! at the Temple Simeon waits;
Vigil keeps he beside these gates.

Full many a year; and thus he prays:
"Most Holy Father, though my days
Wax many, hear me now this word—
Grant me to look on Israel's Lord."

And when she comes, sweet Mary mild,
Bearing on reverent arm her Child,
Simeon stands forth, the Christ-Child takes,
While from his lips this glad song breaks:

"Now let Thy servant, Lord, depart,
As Thou hast promised: for mine eyes
Have seen that Saviour whom my heart
Has longed for, like a star arise."

"'Tis the world's Light—this holy Boy!
He will divide the night from day.
Sin from His face shall flee away:
Faith shall find here both Light and Joy."

Sharp must the contending battle be
Ere it shall end with man made free,
Yea, e'en this holy Mother's heart
Sin will impale with cruel dart."

The Purification of St. Mary the Virgin.

(February 2d.)

Almighty and everliving God, we humbly beseech Thy Majesty, that, as Thy only-begotten Son was this day presented in the temple in substance of our flesh, so we may be presented unto Thee with pure and clean hearts, by the same Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Sexagesima Sunday.

O Lord God, who seest that we put not our trust in any thing that we do; mercifully grant that by Thy power we may be defended against all adversity; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Then spake another watcher there Named Anna, whom many a fast and prayer

Had chastened, till her soul's clear view
Saw deep into God's counsels true:

"Oh, Israel, now thy Saviour see!
Long hath the darkness brooded drear!
This Babe shall man's Redeemer be.
Hope of the world, I see Thee here!"

Saviour, we come Thy Name to bless.
Thee as our Lord we now confess,
Here lay our offerings at Thy feet,
Wait at Thy Cross for pardon sweet.

Take of our gold: no wealth can tell
The love of those who love Thee well;
But, Lord, if riches take their leave,
Our turtle-doves of Faith receive.

When darksome night succeeds our day,
When joys are hushed, when hopes decay,
When, through our suffering human heart,
We feel the pang of sorrow's dart—

Then, even as the aged Simeon's eyes
Saw, in his age, God's Christ arise,
May we see Christ: and, conquering,
At last our Nunc Dimittis sing!

God's Leading.

The clouds hang heavy 'round my way,
I cannot see;
But through the darkness I believe
God leadeth me.

'Tis sweet to keep my hand in His
While all is dim;
To close my weary, aching eyes,
And follow Him.

Through many a thorny path He leads my tired feet;
Through many a path of tears I go,
But it is sweet.

To know that He is close to me,
My God, my Guide.
He leadeth me, and so I walk
Quite satisfied.

To my blind eyes He may reveal
No light at all,
But while I lean on His strong arm
I cannot fall.

The Master of My Boat.

I owned a little boat a while ago
And sailed a Morning Sea without a fear,
And whither any breeze might fairly blow
I'd steer the little craft afar or near.

Mine was the boat, and mine the air,
And mine the Sea, not mine a care.

My boat became my place of nightly toil.
I sailed at sunset to the fishing ground.
At morn the boat was freighted with the spoil

That my all-conquering work and skill had found.

Mine was the boat, and mine the net,
And mine the skill and power to get.

One day there passed along the silent shore,

While I my net was casting in the sea,
A man who spoke as never man before;
I followed him—new life began in me.

Mine was the boat, but His the voice,
And His the call, yet mine the choice.

Ah, 'twas a fearful night out on the Lake!
And all my skill availed not at the helm.
Till Him asleep, I wakened, crying, "Take,
Take Thou command, lest waters overwhelm!"

His was the boat, and His the Sea,
And His the Peace o'er all and me.

Once from His boat He taught the curious throng,

Then bade me let down nets out in the Sea;

I murmured, but obeyed, nor was it long Before the catch amazed and humbled me.

His was the boat, and His the skill,
And His the catch, and His my will.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Odd Wreath.

Frances Harmer.

"Margaret Burns has made our wreaths for the parade," said Lotty Sharp. "She has the cleverest fingers!
The flowers look just as if they grew so! Do come and see."

So Mabel Carrington, the prettiest of them all, and Sophy Grand, the sweetest, and all the others whom we need not name, went into the little schoolroom and saw Margaret's handiwork.

The wreaths—one each for the "Banner" class—lay on an old table cloth, double folded and drenched in water, and itself reposing on part of an old rubber sheet. The petals of the flowers must be kept from moisture, but the stems needed all they could get. Margaret, delighted with the results of her toil, was delicately placing the last wreath where it would receive its due share of the sheet.

"Just seven, and 'We are Seven,'" laughed Mabel. "When we have our white dresses on, and these, we shall look pretty nice. And Mabel, you must be the odd one, to carry the banner, and we will go in twos after you."

But all their plans for the Sunday-school "Class Day," which was also "Flower Day," failed to mature, for one of the girls was hurried away to join a party of relatives bound for the mountains. Clara was delicate, and her parents thought she must not miss this chance of a summer in the Adirondacks.

"There's an odd wreath," said Lotty, when Clara's telegraphic summons and almost telegraphic departure had been fully discussed. "Now, who can be Clara's substitute?"

"I vote," Sophy reddened with the effort she was making, "I vote that we ask Winifred Clarke to come back!"

It was just as if she had thrown a tiny bomb! There was a sudden silence, of a different quality from that of any ordinary pause in the gay conversation of the Banner Class.

Winifred Clarke's story had been one of those tragic ones that sometimes have to come into the knowledge of the young and the gay. Every one knew that her father's disappearance had coincided with the loss of a large sum of money from the store in which he had been for so long one of the most trained assistants. His wife owned their small home. She was able to make enough for her own needs and Clara's by sewing. Departure from the town did not seem wise, and was, indeed, hardly possible. So she stayed on. But Clara had left school. School had been too hard. For two or three Sundays she had clung to her class, but the difference in the manner of her companions was quite perceptible to nerves and sensibilities grown suddenly acute. She had turned away, five weeks ago, and the girls had drawn a breath of relief—trying to be kind, somehow, had proved a strain. Clara seemed no longer one of them as she had been.

"It wouldn't be the truest kindness to her, dear," Mabel Carrington answered, after that electric silence. "She would feel we only did it from charity, and—"

Sophy made another effort.

"And charity is love, and oughtn't all we do to be done by it?" she interrupted.

The silence fell again, because they all recognized the quotation. Dr.
Mayne had said those very words in his last Sunday's sermon. His congregation had wondered if he had Mrs.
Clarke in mind. But some of them had been kind to her, only—not socially.

"If you want to completely spoil our Banner parade from the schoolhouse to the church, and up the aisle to the platform, by having in it a girl who'd probably rather not be in it," began Mabel, rather hotly, when Margaret spoke.

"I shan't like to think of that wreath, lying all by itself," her lips curled in a little, whimsical smile. "That will spoil my pleasure."

But they all knew now where Margaret stood! Sophy gave her a grateful glance. Still the group broke up, with nothing settled.

It was Saturday, of course, when the wreaths had been made. Saturday afternoon when the news of Clara's departure reached them. Now it was Saturday, just before supper, when they separated. Most of them were rather silent at supper, thinking about Sophy's suggestion. Mabel, who had opposed that suggestion most determinedly, was particularly quiet. And when the meal was over she went out into the garden. It was a beautifully warm evening. She dropped onto her favorite seat, a low chair under a tree, and watched the people go up the street. Presently a slight, bowed figure passed. With a start Mabel recognized Mrs. Clarke. She was taking home some work, evidently. Mabel felt unaccountably uncomfortable at the sight of her. Three months ago she had walked so differently.

Then two other women passed.

"That Mrs. Clarke?" said one.

"Yes. I'm so sorry for her."

"So am I," the other speaker seemed accepting a challenge. "At the same time, I don't feel we can—"

They had passed on. Mabel, viewing her own attitude in another, didn't like it!

Two more women passed by.

"Won't that poor Mrs. Clarke miss her daughter?" said one. "Too bad to have lost her, as well as—"

Mabel sprang to her feet. How had
Mrs. Clarke lost Winifred?

"Very sudden, wasn't it?" asked the other, and then Mabel heard no more.

She stood still for a moment. And then she realized that the girl she wanted to talk to was Sophy. Any of the others, except, perhaps, Margaret, would try to comfort her, would tell her that she had only done what was perfectly natural in opposing Winifred's return to the class. But, in crises, it is not comfort we want so much as the truth.

She sped along to Sophy's house.

"Have you heard," she said, "about Winifred?"

Sophy shook her head.

"Mrs. Brown said her mother had lost her," went on Mabel. "Is she really—"

The word was too terrible. She did not say it.

"Oh," cried Sophy, shocked. "Oh!"
The others came in, one by one. They heard Mabel's news with deep regret.

"Just think," said one, "if we only had gone to her this afternoon and told her there was a wreath for her—how different we would be feeling now!"

"Dr. Mayne would say we always ought to do just what we'd do if we weren't to have a chance to do it again," said Margaret, a little obscure-ly, but her listeners knew what she meant.

And just then Winnie Clarke walked by!

For one moment the six girls held their breath. The next, Sophy flew out to her.

"Winifred!"

Winifred turned

"Winnie, we want you to—to—"

"To come with us and carry the Banner tomorrow, in the Banner Parade."
Mabel did nothing by halves. "You will, won't you?"

"Your wreath is all ready," added
Margaret.

Winifred smiled happily.

"I'd love it," she answered, brightly, not crushed with obligation, apparently. "Especially as it's my last Sunday here. My mother is making me go to Aunt Hope's for a time. Did you know?"

"Not a word of it!" the girls cried the negation in chorus, if their words differed. "We—we wanted you."

When Winifred had gone the girls looked at each other.

"Just in time, and only just," murmured Margaret.

(Later, they knew that some relatives were refunding the money taken and that Mr. Clarke was making the tremendous effort of trying to live down his crime in the place where it was committed. That was why Mrs. Clarke wanted Winifred to be spared the earlier difficulties of such a step.)

After the "Banner Parade" and the pleasant, musical service, the flowercrowned girls went out to a little hill at the back of the town. They were all happy in Winifred's happiness—she did not realize how hard a row her father would have to hoe—but under all was that sense of keen thankfulness that they had not lost an opportunity to extend a helping hand. Beneath their gay words was an unspoken determination never to lose any such chance. And, perhaps, in some of them, a dim sense of citizenship and of duty. But to outsiders they were just flower-crowned girls having a good time!

For the Southern Churchman.
"Lord, Teach Us to Pray."

Grace Imogene Gish.

Teach us to pray, when sunbeams dance around us everywhere,
And earth seems wonderfully sweet and fair
And ever gay.

Teach us to pray, in the great stillness
when we feel Thee near,
When day is done and shadows dark appear
O'er all our way.

Teach us to pray, that we may learn to love and serve Thee well,
And, when life passes, be prepared to dwell
With Thee for aye.

Food Conservationisms.

"If we discontinue exports we will move the German line from France to the Atlantic seaboard. That is the sententious way in which the Food Administrator puts the situation. Tons of statistics and argument could add nothing to it.

"My husband will not eat corn-bread and insists he must have meat every day as usual," says a troubled housewife. "What can I do?" This being war time, we are not in a fair mood to advise. But every such selfish man is doing his part to "discontinue exports" and "move the German line from France to the Atlantic seaboard."

In order to protect the nation's food supply from insect ravages the President has placed the arsenic industry of the country under direction of the Food Administration. A threatened shortage in the supply of arsenical insecticides caused this action. The potato bug, grasshopper, and crop-destroying worm must be looked after.

Do not be worried by any scare rumors about shortage of one thing after another. There are unscrupulous persons abroad, trying to produce runs on the retail stores by "starting" some unfounded report. One day it will be matches, another laundry blue, another salt, and so on. Set all these down as either malicious or designing. Live and buy and do as usual. When a real shortage in any staple article is likely to occur the Food Administration will give ample warning.

The war-emergency food inventory taken by the Department of Agriculture yielded some amusing results. Wrestling with the English language, a Syrian dealer in fruits and vegetables listed all his stock of vegetables as "vegetable fats." One woman was informed by a mischief-maker that the government intended to take all of her canned preserves in excess of a hundred jars. She promptly dug a large trench and buried all the rest where she was sure it would not be discovered.

Over in Europe there are millions of men fighting our battles, and tens of millions of men and women back in the factories supplying the fighters with munitions and war supplies. The efficiency of all these fighters and workers can be measured and actually put upon a pair of scales and weighed. If we send them only as much wheat as we could spare from this year's crop after using what we have been accustomed to there would not be enough to nourish them. If we can by substitution save and send them only a small portion of what we normally consume they will be properly nourished. We can do it without harm to our stomachs and with great good to our consciences. Try it.

How long will the homes of our country allow it to be said that the hotels and restaurants are doing far more in proportion than they in saving the foods which we must ship to our allies if we are to win the war? This is a serious reflection upon the patriotism of our good people, and we do not believe they will willingly rest under it.

New York City is fast rivaling its former reputation for extravagance by a new one for food conservation, particularly in its magnificent hotels and eating places. The figures received by the Food Administration show immense savings in meat and wheat through the rigid observance of meatless Tuesday and wheatless Wednesday and other conservation measures. For instance, in the hotels and restaurants of New York on Tuesday, November 13th, the saving in meats amounted to 193,545 pounds, or 96.75 tons. The saving of wheat flour on Wednesday, November 14th, was 101,295 pounds, or 50.6 tons, or 517 barrels. And it must be remembered that this movement is only fairly under way.

What the homes are doing in comparison with the public eating places cannot be told as easily. The weekly report cards will show, in part, but the butcher's sales and the grocer's will furnish further figures. The interesting estimate is made by Mr. Bowman, chief of the hotels division of the Food Administration, that if the hotels and restaurants of the whole country save in the same proportion as those of New York, from this source alone the savings will furnish several shiploads of meat and wheat each week for our armies and allies.

Why Peter?

One of the strong characteristics of Peter was his willingness to admit his mistakes and try to do better. He has been criticized by countless generations of Christians for his denials of Jesus on the night of his trial in the home of Caiaphas. Many are they who have made harsh remarks concerning the fisherman-disciple's "fall from grace" on that occasion. But how did it happen that the gospel writers emphasized his experience so strongly? Why, Peter, is it you who are held up to condemnation on that eventful night? Where were James and Andrew? Where were Matthew and Philip? No testing of them is recorded. Did they flee so far from the guard about the Master as to escape all notice by the crowd? We wonder. And while wondering there comes a great rejoicing that Peter, the great resolute preacher of the Day of Pentecost, did not cover up the facts concerning his growth in discipleship. He lost out badly that early morning when the maid said, "You were one of 'em." But he made good later. He paid the price of penitence. He accepted the rebuke of his Risen Master in the presence of the others.

Then, profiting by his failure, he humbled himself and began over. Why is it Peter that we summon up when those who fail are in our mind? Because he showed men the practical value of forgiveness when one is honestly sorry for his sins. We know not where the ten were while Peter was denying Jesus. But we have the encouragement of Peter's experience and are bold to look up to our Lord and listen while He asks us, "Lovest thou Me?" And, as our hearts burn with shame as He forgives us and bids us render service to His "sheep," we thank God for Peter, and understand why that ardent disciple, in the hour of his reclaiming, made no secret of his fall.—Ralph Welles Keeler.

Something for the Churches to Think About.

Howard B. Grose.

That there should be dire want among the peoples associated with us in the war and luxurious living or wanton waste in our own land is out of tune with the divine teaching of true brotherhood. As a people we should realize the wrong of feasting sumptuously and forgetting the starving, suffering peoples of the world who are entitled by all the ties of humanity and religion to our prompt and full assistance.

There is one thing that our churches and all religious and fraternal organizations should at once take into serious consideration. That is the proper conduct, in such a time, of all the social functions at which meals or refreshments are served. In not one which I have attended, and the number has not been few, since I speak for the food conservation cause as often as I can find time, has there been any recognition of the fact that our people are asked to substitute some other breadstuff for white bread and other foods for meat. Apology after apology has been made, after the address had brought the necessity of substitution home to those in charge, but no attention had been paid evidently to the appeals put forth during the past months—appeals that ought to have made every church supper or lunch a model of food conservation and thus a patriotic object lesson.

The matter is now so serious that I put it squarely to the women in our churches, and in the synagogues and fraternal orders, that here is a splendid opportunity to set an example that will tell in the homes. A food conservation kitchen would be a most interesting feature in the churches; and church suppers that illustrated not only the principles of conservation and substitution, but also the palatableness of the substitute foods prepared from the recipes furnished by the Home Economics Division of the Food Administration, would assuredly be popular.

War breads, war cake, cornmeal dishes of a dozen varieties, rye-bread peanut-butter sandwiches, all sorts of novel dishes and delicious sugarless candies will make the social gatherings a help instead of a reproach and be preaching silent sermons along much-needed lines.

Many women have asked for some suggestions as to what they could do. Well, here is one way, and a way that would do more than many speeches to make food conservation a reality and a practice in multitudes of homes. And no one can impress the need of it too deeply in the light of the distress in France and Italy and the announcement of a war ration for the people of Great Britain.

For the Young Folks

The Prisoner.

You have a little prisoner;
He's nimble, sharp and clever,
He's sure to get away from you,
Unless you watch him ever.

And when he once gets out he makes
More trouble in an hour
Than you can stop in many a day,
Working with all your power.

He sets your playmates by the ears,
He says what isn't so,
And uses many ugly words
Not good for you to know.

Quick, fasten tight the ivory gates,
And chain him while he's young!
For this same dangerous prisoner
Is just your little tongue.

The True Story of Kitty White.

Kitty White listened attentively to all the plans. The family were eating breakfast, and Kitty White, dressed in a new blue ribbon, heard every single word.

She heard mother announce: "We will put her in that basket with the cover. It is loosely woven, so she will get plenty of air. On such a long trip that is really the only safe way to carry her."

She heard father say: "I have ordered the taxi to be here at nine o'clock sharp, to drive us down to the wharf. It takes some time to cross Boston at this time of year. We must allow plenty of time for checking the trunks."

She heard Frankie say: "I wish I could carry Kitty White in my arms instead of putting her in a basket. I'm afraid she'll be frightened with all the noises and queer smells, when she can't see a single thing but the inside of a straw basket."

Kitty White walked solemnly to Frankie's chair. She rubbed her spotless white fur coat against Frankie's new tan stockings. She decided to stay near her little master. She saw trunks, golf bags, and tennis racquets carried downstairs. She saw mother in her neat traveling suit, with Delia standing close behind holding umbrellas. She saw father go from the house carrying bags and suit cases and hand them to the driver. But what Kitty White looked the hardest at was the big wicker basket which Frankie held. At last her master spoke. She knew she must obey.

Come, Kitty; come, Kitty White, I'm going to put you into this nice clean basket and take you for a lovely trip. First we'll drive in a taxicab; then we'll sail in a boat; after that we'll take a ride on a train; then we will reach the station at Winthrop. Last of all, we will drive to our summer home. The very first thing I'll do is to give you a nice big saucer of fresh milk. You and I will both take a little kitty-cat nap. When we wake up the summer fun will begin."

Kitty White allowed Frankie to lift her gently into the basket. She sat rather awkwardly upon the soft pillow that her kind master had placed inside. One last pat, and Frankie bade her be a good Kitty White; then he fastened the top of the basket firmly. She could see no more. Kitty White felt herself lifted carefully by Frankie.

She knew he was stepping into the taxi. She listened to the chunk! chunk! chunk! of the engine, and decided to sit more peacefully upon her cushion.

Suddenly thump! thump! thump! went the whole world. Kitty White found herself rattling round her basket in a fashion most peculiar. She felt she could not stand it, till she heard a dear voice say:

"Now, Kitty White, that's all over. We're getting on the great big boat." Again she felt the basket gently lifted and carried. Presently she felt the basket set down on something solid.

A wild shriek caused her to jump wildly about. Kitty lost her head. There's no telling if she ever would have found it again even in that not-overlarge basket had she not heard her master's kind, firm voice say:

"Why, Kitty White, I'm 'pletely 'sprised! You're tipping the basket over an' over! As fast as I pick it up, you upset it! Don't you know that that sound is the whistle that starts the boat? Don't you know that we shall never cross this ferry unless the boat starts? Now behave like a well-mannered Kitty White or I'll be 'shamed of your traveling manners."

Kitty White hung her head with shame, though the basket covered her confusion. She hung her head so low that before she knew it she was fast asleep. The next sound she heard was "Chu! chu! chu!" What could that mean. No one told her, so she asked politely. "Mew?"

Again her master gave her comfort by saying: "We're on the train. No don't worry. I'll take care of you."

Her master gave Kitty White comfort, but it wasn't exactly the kind of comfort she liked best, still it helped. The basket trembled and shook. Her poor little heart beat wildly as the train stopped at the different stations. Her poor little claws clutched the basket desperately as the train puffed out again to resume its "Chu! chu! chu!"

It was one long nightmare, a nightmare never to be forgotten by Kitty White—one which she told to her children and to her children's children. With its telling, her fur and theirs never failed to stand on end.

At length it was over, drive and all. She felt the basket lowered for the last time. Frankie opened the lid to find poor Kitty in a truly disreputable condition. The new blue bow was torn to bits, the feathers of the pillow rose in a cloud as Kitty White leaped thankfully from her prison to the shelter of her master's arms.

The promised milk tasted most refreshing. Kitty White drank hers from a nice blue-and-white Japanese saucer, while her master drank his from a blue-and-white Japanese cup. When Frankie saw Kitty forget to wipe her milky mustache away, he remembered first to wipe his own mouth with a fresh handkerchief, then he wiped Kitty's with one of the feathers left in the basket.

I cannot tell you of all the joys and pleasures Kitty White and her master shared that summer. You know yourself what wonderful things happen almost every day when one is on a vacation. Yet how hard it is to tell just what one did when some grown-up says:

"Well, now, tell me all about your beautiful summer vacation!"

Still there is one thing more I must tell you, because it is really a very strange thing indeed. No one has ever been able quite to understand it.

When the last week of vacation came the family were again eating breakfast. The family were again talking plans.

Mother said: "Frankie, you'd better find the basket to-day and get what is left of the pillow ready for our trip to Boston, so Kitty White can have a comfortable trip home."

Frankie answered: "I will, mother dear, but I don't think she liked it very much."

Father said: "There are many things one may not like very much, Frank, still even we big people have to do them."

Softly Kitty White arose. Softly she stole from the room. No one saw her go! When night came she could not be found! Her master was worried, but mother said:

"She'll come back in the morning, Frankie; close your eyes, dear, and go fast asleep!"

However, Kitty White did not come back in the morning, nor the morning following, nor indeed any morning at all. She was gone. Frankie thought she was stolen, but no one really knew.

Again the trunks, the golf bags, the tennis racquets, and luggage were carried downstairs. Again mother stood in her neat traveling suit while father helped the man with the bags. Quietly the little master walked to the shed. A queer lump rose in his throat as he picked up the empty basket to carry back to the city. No Kitty White! No need of comforting words or cheer! And summer all gone!

Yet when the trip was over and Frankie rushed from room to room of his own dear home, things didn't look quite so sad. In truth they would have been altogether perfect if only Kitty White were purring around.

School began, and four weeks went by. One morning as Delia was taking the milk bottles in she felt something push past her into the house.

Frankie thought he was dreaming, although he was sitting in the middle of the floor lacing up his new school-shoes, for he heard, "Mew, mew!"

The door pushed gently open, and in crept a thin, rather tired-looking Kitty White. Straight to the arms of her master she leaped. Such a purring song of joy you never heard!

"How did you ever go all that long distance the train went, Kitty White? How did you ever cross the water where the ferry-boat carried us? How did you ever find your way home through the crowded, noisy city? Tell me that, Kitty White!" cried her happy master.

A tear dimmed Kitty White's blue eye. Memories of that nightmare basket trip made her little heart stand still, but she never told how she managed that long, long trip by land and by sea, alone. She never told how she decided to steal from the house when these plans for returning in the basket were talked of. Kitty White never told, and, unless you can tell us how she managed it, I am afraid no one will ever know the true story of Kitty White.—Ethel Bowen White, in Christian Register.

For the Southern Churchman.
The Chimney Swallows.

Eugenie du Maurier

One evening, just when the sun was going down behind that portion of the town directly west from the wharves, and all the roofs and spires were purple against a glowing orange sky, some children ran up the dock towards the huge old furnace smokestacks. These poor little bits of humanity loved that particular spot because the dock was wider than at any other place. And the dock was the playground of the children of the vicinity around the great wharves. From this point the small creatures could watch the incoming boats, the changing colors of the sunset sky and at high tide in summer dangle their bare feet in the waters of the river.

"Now, Billy," said a "little mother," "you sit down and watch the top of the chimney. And you sit here, Jimmy, where you can't fall in. Look up there, Mazie, what do you see?"

"Birdsies," lisped Mazie.

"Gee! Look at the birds! Will you?" exclaimed Billy. "Wait till I shy a rock at them."

"No, you don't," replied Mary firmly. "Those are Daddy's birds. I'll tell him to thrash you if you bother them. He showed them to me last night. Now watch."

All the children watched. The birds began to fly in a wide circle above the top of the old chimney. They had formed themselves into a regular procession. They circled and circled and circled. And all the time more birds arrived to join the procession, twittering in a curious excited way. This lasted for at least ten minutes. Then, suddenly part of the huge circle seemed to touch the chimney top and disappear.

"Why," gasped Billy. "they look as if they were pouring themselves right into that chimney like—like—"

"Like so much water. Yes, they're going in. See, they're almost gone. They're putting themselves to bed. They're chimney swallows. They sleep in there. See there!"

Two belated birds, too late to join the procession, scurried out of the darkening sky, and twittering frenziedly, hurled themselves into the mouth of the towering stack.

"They're policemen," said Billy. "They've sent all the others to jail."

"Then, what about that one?" asked Mary, as a last lone bird, all but shrieking as it scurried through the sky, hurled itself down the chimney.

"That one almost got caught," said Jimmy. "Gee! There's a big bird that was chasing it."

"A night hawk," said Mary. "Daddy says there's always one late bird and one big hawk to chase it. Now, we must hurry back—it'll soon be dark."

As the old wharf, owing to the rotting of the thick planking, was full of pitfalls, even by daylight, the children hurried back to their home, chattering about the swallows.

"Will they do it again to-morrow night?" asked Billy.

"Yes, Daddy says they do it every night all summer long. That's their home. Early in the spring there's only a few swallows, but as the summer goes on there are more and more."

"Will oo take us to see the birdsies some nother nights?" asked Mazie.

"Yes, if you're real good."

"Does 'em take they's feathers off when they gets all ready to sleep," asked Mazie.

"Oh, Mazie, dear, of course not."

"Does 'em sing all night?"

"No, they sleep. And that's what you ought to be doing."

The Lame Boy.

He was little. He was lame. He was only six years old. His mother was a poor washerwoman, and they lived in a tiny room on a narrow street of a great city.

All day long he sat in his high chair, looking down into the narrow street. He could see by leaning forward a bit of blue sky over the tall warehouse opposite. Sometimes a white cloud would drift across the blue. Sometimes it was all dull gray.

But the street was more interesting. There were people down there. In the early morning men and women were hurrying to their work. Later the children came out and played on the sidewalk and in the gutters. Sometimes they danced and sang, but often they were quarrelsome. In the spring came the hand-organ man, and then everybody seemed happy.

The boy's sad little face looked out all day long. Only when he saw his mother coming did he smile and wave his hand.

"I wish I could help you, mother," he said one night. "You work so hard, and I can't do anything for you."

"O, but you do," she cried quickly. "It helps me to see your face smiling down at me from the window. It helps me to have you wave your hand. It makes my work lighter all day to think you will be there waving at me when I come home."

"Then I'll wave harder," said the little fellow.

And the next night a tired workman, seeing the mother look up and answer the signal, looked up, too. Such a little pinched face smiling down at him from the window, but how cheery the smile was! The man laughed to himself and waved his cap, and the boy, a little shyly, returned the greeting.

So it went. The next evening the workman nudged his comrade to look up at the "poor little chap sitting so patient at the window," and again the gay smile shone out as two caps waved in the air below him.

Days came and passed and the boy had more friends. Men and women went out of their way to send a greeting to him. Life didn't seem quite so hard to them when they thought how dreary it must be for him. Sometimes a flower found its way to him, or an orange or a colored picture. The children stopped quarreling when they saw him watching them, and played games to amuse him. It pleased them to see how eager he was to share in their good times.

"Tell the lad we couldn't get on without him," said the weary laborer to the mother one night. "'Tis a great thing to have a brave heart. It makes us all brave, too. Tell him that."

And you may be sure she did.—Exchange.

A Forgiveness Account.

John and Gladys were out at the front of the house. Gladys was making a bead necklace for her doll. The beads were on a little work-table beside her. John was playing at trains. His train was a toy cart, with a funny collection of dolls and animals in it for the passengers. He was the engine himself, and he was steaming and whistling with all his strength.

"Don't come here, John," said Gladys, as he came near the table.

"Puff, puff," went this snorting human engine.

"Take care," cried Gladys again, as he came nearer to the table, "you'll spill my beads." Away John went, and soon forgot his sister's warning. The train came round the corner, and, before he knew, the table was upset and the beads scattered in all directions.

"Oh, John," cried Gladys, with an angry face, "what did I tell you?"

"I'm awfully sorry," said John, as he helped to pick up the beads. John was always sorry, but it did not make him careful. Gladys did not answer for a moment, but then she said, "Never mind, John, I'll forgive you." She remembered the lesson she heard on Sunday about Jesus telling Peter how he ought to forgive his brother seventy times seven times. Gladys was a hot-tempered girl, but had resolved to obey Jesus. She had been saying to herself—although John did not know—"I will forgive him 490 times, but after that—" She shut her lips tight. "I'll keep a forgiveness account," she thought, "so as to know when it's seventy times seven." Before she went to bed she wrote at the top of a clean page in a last year's exercise book:

"The Times I Forgive John."

And under this:

"Monday—For spilling my beads."

Then she remembered that very day she had upset a tower John had built with his bricks to show father when

Lemons Whiten and Beautify the Skin! Make Cheap Lotion

The juice of two fresh lemons strained into a bottle containing three ounces of orchard white makes a whole quarter pint of the most remarkable lemon skin beautifier at about the cost one must pay for a small jar of the ordinary cold creams. Care should be taken to strain the lemon juice through a fine cloth, so no lemon pulp gets in, then this lotion will keep fresh for months. Every woman knows that lemon juice is used to bleach and remove such blemishes as freckles, sallowness and tan, is the ideal skin softener, smootheners, and beautifier.

Just try it! Make up a quarter pint of this sweetly fragrant lemon lotion and massage it daily into the face, neck, arms and hands. It should naturally help to whiten, soften, freshen, and bring out the hidden roses and beauty of any skin. It is wonderful for rough, red hands.

Your druggist will sell three ounces of orchard white at little cost, and any grocer will supply the lemons.

he came home and John had not been the least cross with her. "I suppose I ought to count that on the other side," she said slowly. She then wrote on the opposite page:

"The Times John Forgives Me."

"Monday—For knocking down his tower."

That made them even.

One day she had the longer list, and another day John had it—sometimes they were even. So Gladys was beginning to feel very humble, and after a while said to herself: "I guess if I forgive all I can without keeping any list, it will take me all my life to make 490 times. Perhaps, after all, that was what Jesus meant. I will try."

The Forgiveness Account was not kept any longer; it had done its work. —Messenger for the Children.

He was born in Stafford County, Va., many years ago he moved to King William County. He was a Confederate soldier. On the field of Chancellorsville he was promoted for gallantry, and later still rose to higher rank with a commission. He served (16) sixteen consecutive years as sheriff of King William County—four consecutive terms. He was a courtly, chivalric, noble-hearted man, much beloved and esteemed. He was a communicant of the Episcopal church, and gave to his pastor in his last days a beautiful testimony of his faith in our Lord Jesus. He married Miss Bessie Douglas, daughter of Major Beverly Douglas, late member of Congress many years. His wife survives him, and two brothers, John G. Moncure and Hector Moncure. May God our Saviour fill with His own Presence the void He has made in the lives of those who love him. They are sustained by the hope of meeting him in glory. T. H. LACY, Richmond, Va., Jan. 28, 1918.

Wheat: Entered into eternal life on January 6, 1918, at his home, "Lewiston," Lynwood, Va., JOHN CLARENCE WHEAT, son of the late Rev. Dr. James Clifton and Elizabeth Lewis Wheat. A brave man and true.

LIZZIE JACQUELIN MARSHALL.

Entered into life eternal, December 11, 1917, at Leeds, Fauquier County, in the seventy-third year of her age, LIZZIE JACQUELIN MARSHALL, daughter of the late James Keith and Claudia Hamilton Marshall.

She was called home suddenly, but the call found her ready to meet her Lord and Saviour, for she ever lived with Him.

A devoted and faithful communicant of the Episcopal Church from early girlhood, her religion was of that sweet and wholesome kind that the Church develops in those that love her ways and appreciate her ideals.

Unselfishness was the keynote of her character. Her time, her talents and her means were held in trust and were cheerfully given to those who needed them most.

To her the voice of conscience was duty, and her obedience was literal and uncompromising regardless of the sacrifice that it demanded, for so she learned Christ.

She sleeps in the shadow of Leeds Church, awaiting that day when she will hear the voice of her Master saying: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

HENRY ARMAND LONDON.

HENRY ARMAND LONDON, of St. Bartholomew's Church, Pittsboro, N. C., departed out of this life into a better, the second Sunday after the Epiphany, January 20, 1918. He was born in Pittsboro March 1, 1846, and spent all his life in this small town, excepting the time of his service in the Confederate Army. He was a graduate of the University of North Carolina; became an able and distinguished lawyer; served his people and his State with advantage to them and with honor to himself, in various positions of public trust, in both local and State affairs; and was known throughout North Carolina as one of her most useful, capable, upright and patriotic citizens. Few were more widely known or more universally esteemed.

He married early, and leaves a large family of sons and daughters to inherit his good name and to continue his faithful service in Church and State.

Brought up from infancy in the Church and by family tradition from colonial days associated with the most interesting and important events in the history of the Diocese, he was from boyhood a loyal and devoted Churchman, sustaining all departments of his work and interests by his devoted service, and illustrating her teachings in a pure and godly life. He had been for many years a vestryman and the treasurer of his Parish; faithful and useful member of the Diocesan Convention; and ever ready to respond to any call for his personal help or service. His was one of those quiet, but diligent and effective lives, which, however much valued as his was, while they are with us, are never fully appreciated until we miss them. J. R. C.

APPEAL FOR THE ENDOWMENT FUND OF "OLD POHICK," THE PARISH CHURCH OF MOUNT VERNON.

Again the 22nd day of February, Washington's birthday, is near at hand, with the Sunday following it, which is now generally regarded, not only in our communion, but in many others, and the country at large, as the Sunday set apart for contributions to the endowment fund of the historic Old Pohick Church, Truro Parish, Virginia, where Washington was a vestryman for twenty-two years. He was a member of the building committee of the present church, and a worshipper within its walls.

The restoration of this old church, which had been going on for a number of years under the generous support of many friends, has lately been completed through the devoted interest of the Vice-Regent of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, from the State of New York. There now remains in connection with Old Pohick the completion of its endowment fund, which has increased through a period of several years to the amount of a little more than $3,000.00. This has been invested in good securities. Inspired by the success which has now crowned the efforts of the friends interested in the restoration of the church, this committee feels that it has but to hold steadily on its course in faith and unwavering purpose to reach its goal of at least $50,000.00, as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be devoted in part to the increase of the rector's salary, and in part to keeping the church in repair.

We, therefore, repeat the strong words of our Presiding Bishop, Dr. Tuttle, from last year's appeal: "It is a worthy one, if only it can get a hearing in these days of want and woe," and we might add to-day, of high purpose to win this war against the enemies of true righteousness and world liberty. There are appeals which must be answered, appeals for means to carry on this righteous war and appeals "clamoring on every side for help," but are there not some churches and some private contributors who can give of their offerings, large or small, to this worthy object this year?

Please make cheques to the order of the Pohick Church Endowment Fund, and remit to the banking house of Burke and Herbert, Alexandria, Va., or to the Rev. Samuel A. Wallis, D. D., Chairman of the committee.

Order Fertilizers Now or You May Have to Do Without Them This Season

The freight congestion is serious. You will help yourself, us, the railroads, and the Government by giving your order for Fertilizers NOW to your dealer. If all the farmers do this, the dealer can then "bunch" his orders, and be able to order his cars of fertilizers loaded to full capacity. The Government urges that all cars be so loaded.

When the goods arrive haul them home, and put them into your barn until you are ready to use them. If the movement of railroad cars becomes any more serious you may not get a pound of fertilizer at any price.

Our 50 factories, and distributing points are so well located geographically as to enable us to get fertilizers to you with minimum amount of hauling.

PERSONAL NOTES.

In Christ Church, Exeter, N. H., on the Feast of the Epiphany, Bishop Parker advanced to the priesthood the Rev. William E. Soule, who was presented by the rector of the Church, the Rev. V. M. Haughton. The Bishop preached the sermon. Mr. Soule, who is registrar of the alumni of the Academy at Exeter, will maintain services at the Church of the Redeemer, Rochester, and also have charge of the rural work in forty-five towns.

On the third Sunday in Advent, in St. Stephen's Church, Providence, R. I., the Bishop of Rhode Island advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Frank Thurston Hallett, who was presented by the rector, the Rev. George McC. Fiske, D. D. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Herbert McK. Denslow.

Deaths.

The Rev. William E. Allen, Sr., rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Atlantic City, died suddenly on Thursday afternoon, January 10, aged sixty-six years. The funeral was held from the Church of the Good Shepherd on Thursday afternoon.

The Rev. Alfred Louis Fortin, a retired minister of the Diocese of Albany, died at Waterloo, New York, on January 1.

The death is reported of the Rev. Douglas Ottinger Kelley, a pioneer minister of the Diocese of California. While one of the non-parochial Clergy of that Diocese, Mr. Kelley had for several years been first on the list of the Cathedral Staff for missions under the lead of Archdeacon Emery.

The Rev. Peter Wager, a non-parochial clergyman of the Diocese of Tennessee, died at his home in Memphis, Tenn., on December 28. Funeral services were held at St. Mary's Cathedral on Sunday, December 30, interment being in Elmwood Cemetery.

The Rev. William A. Long, rector of St. James Chapel, Lake Delaware, Delhi, N. Y., and formerly of Gloucestershire, England, died suddenly at Lake Delaware, on January 16, in his seventy-third year. Funeral services were held on Saturday, January 19, at the Church of the Transfiguration, New York, and interment was at Kensico.

The Rev. James William Jackson, in charge of the missions at Allendale and Ramsey, in the Diocese of Newark, died on Saturday morning, January 19, following an operation. Funeral services were held on January 22 in the Church of the Epiphany, Allendale, N. J.

The Philosophy of Joylessness.

"The philosophy of joylessness, pessimism, was revived just a century ago in Germany. Like the evil genie in the fairy tale that escaped from the fisherman's jar and, spreading along the shore, formed a mist; so the mist of pessimism has gotten out of the confines of philosophy and cannot be conjured back again. It is in the air. A recent age has experienced, as perhaps

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Good taste is the flower of good sense.—Poincelot.

The greatness of our service depends on the Master, and not on the work.—Ex.

Obedience to the known will of God is the highest evidence of sincerity and belief.—Ex.

It is better to be saved in God's way than to be lost through having our own way.—Ex.

Success in life depends far more upon decisive action of character than the possession of what is called genius.

It is one of the beautiful compensations of life that no man can sincerely try to help another without helping himself.—Philip Bailey.

In a world of wider scope,
What here is faithfully begun
Shall be completed, not undone.
—Tennyson.

We may imitate Jesus by setting our hearts on doing our duty to the full; on giving our whole soul and spirit to the work God has given us to do, and never doubting the presence of heaven in our daily life.

Those who admit a general providence, but deny a particular one, seem to forget that generals are nothing but a collection of particulars; they are nothing but the sum total of particulars.—J. Seed

In the life of some poor, helpless sufferer the bed of pain may be the meeting-place of many hearts, which are cheered and elevated by the sight of Christian endurance, and soothed and softened by the warm tide of Christian affection.—D. J. Vaughan.

Problems really add to the interest of life, and the solution of them gives the joy of victory. Jesus Christ's life was not a failure, it was a victory; He was never so victorious as when they tried to kill Him.—Dr. W. T. Grenfell.

The Lord needs not the tongue to be an interpreter between Him and the hearts of His children. He can interpret prayers, though not uttered by the tongue. Our desires are cries in the ears of the Lord of Hosts.—Thomas Manton.

The hope of the New Testament means absolute certainty about the future. Things hoped for are things not yet seen, but things which God guarantees to us, a something which absolutely belongs to us. Faith is the "title-deeds of things future."—J. H. Moulton.

Blessed is the man who has the gift of making friends, for it is one of God's best gifts. It involves many things, but above all the power of giving out of one's self, and seeing and appreciating whatever is noble and lovable in another man.—Thomas Hughes.

I need not leave the jostling world
Or wait till daily tasks are o'er,
To fold my hands in secret prayer
Within the close-shut closet door;
There is a viewless, cloistered room
As high as heaven, as fair as day,
Where, though my feet may join the throng,
My soul may enter in and pray.
—H. M. Kimball.

Mahomet delivered his message, men received it: of Mahomet himself they have no experience. But Christ—not the truth He taught apart from Himself—Christ Himself is the effective Saviour of men in every age and country, and what is verified in Christian experience is that Christ Himself gives eternal life, quenches or subdues evil passions, and is the strength of all Christian righteousness.—R. W. Dale.

Whatever God will be to us in heaven He is to us in large measure on earth. We need not go through the world as paupers, seeing we have such treasure at hand. Our life need not be a wilderness waste, a flowerless garden, a waterless well, a bankrupt bank, a sunless day, since God is ours. Let us appropriate our treasures; let us seek a present heaven; let us believe that we have in God an unspeakable fund of blessing—a present love higher than the heavens, deeper than the sea, broader than the earth, and closer than the atmosphere; a present joy, keeping the heart young and warm, the face bright, the tongue musical; a present peace, keeping the soul unchafed and the life tranquil amid the strife of unfriendly voices; and a present grace enough for our sorest need, our darkest hour.—W. Pearce.

The man who claims that he is kept out of the church by the hypocrites in it doesn't object to them anywhere else. Business is full of them, and yet if he sees a chance to make money among them he will not stop for that. The theatre is full of them, and yet he will go there and pay out his money to see them. Society is full of them, and yet he never thinks of becoming a hermit. Married life is full of them, but that doesn't make him remain a bachelor. Perdition is made up of them, and yet he is not doing a thing to keep from going there. He would have you think he is trying to avoid the society of hypocrites, and yet he takes not a single step toward the only place where no hypocrite can go; and by his conduct proves that he himself is the biggest kind of hypocrite.

Low Levels and Positive Sin.

There is a great temptation to us all to suppose that things are well enough with us so long as no one can point to any glaring transgression on our part. But one feels instinctively, if he cannot put it into words, that there is something deeply wrong about the life whose whole defense is simply that no one can charge it with outrageous doings. For the truth is that living on low levels is just as much an offense against God and our spiritual nature as it is to commit the positive acts which conscience condemns.

It is altogether probable that low standards of thought and feeling and belief are harder to fight against than direct and tangible evils. Oftentimes the real trouble with our lives is not in this or that particular thing which we are fighting against, but in the whole atmosphere of our life and the levels upon which we are living. And many a time it happens that we cannot fight the particular vice or evil tendency in ourselves by direct onset, but only by seeking a different spirit in which to live. Dr. Watkinson, in one of the illustrations of which he is a master, has told us of the African cattle which at certain seasons are visited by the terrible fly that drives them mad. They fight against it until they are exhausted, and in vain. Then there works in them an instinct which drives them gradually up into the higher lands, and at a certain level the pest stops. The pest cannot live at that altitude. Below that line all the efforts of the poor cattle to free themselves are in vain. Above it they are safe—and immune.

The same is true with ourselves. No matter how strenuously we fight with certain evils it is all in vain. While we still inhabit our present levels the fight will be uneven, and after really noble efforts are followed by many defeats we shall feel that things are over-weighted against us—and lose faith.

But it is easier for most of us perhaps to acknowledge downright transgressions than it is to plead guilty to a whole unworthy and ignoble plane on which we are living. Let us admit it if our atmosphere is bad and low. No one may charge us, perhaps, with many positive transgressions, we may reflect the average decency around us, but is the worst indictment which can be brought against us the low plane on which we have lived? When any one confesses that to himself things begin to go better. Sometimes a man is willing to take up that aspect of things. The publican was, as he cried, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." The Pharisee was not, but just kept to those details which hid from him that the whole tenor and savor of his life was bad.

The surest way to better acts is by way of a better spirit. And the most filial thing we ever do is when we come to God with the confession that the whole atmosphere of life has been wrong and ungenerous and ask him to renew in us a right spirit. Hammer away as we will at sins and failings, they never budge until we begin to live in His spirit. And our most Christian and courageous act is when we drop for a time our struggle with the definite faults and deliberately seek higher levels to which little by little we have become strangers. Walk by the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

Just as the terrible insect perishes and falls away from the cattle when they reach a certain height, so too do vices and fears and disabilities and doubts wither when we get up into certain heights, and never until then. They cannot live in that air. Our malice and envy and quarrelsomeness cannot be directly smashed, but there is a Fellowship in which they do not fulfil themselves. Just as with earthly friends in whose presence our worst does not arise, so there is an opening for divine fellowship, and in it these bad emotions wither. The evil promptings may still come, but they do not flourish. There are spiritual results which only come to pass on the higher levels. Give them mountain air.

It is pleasant and surprising to see how a condition which would not change at all when we struck at it directly will begin to yield when we boldly drop the definite attack and begin to seek a different climate. As there are cases of sickness which will not alter in answer to medication, and not until the patient is taken into another air and put under different skies, so there are personal defeats which will continue as long as our spiritual level is unchanged. The point was well brought out by the parent who said that often, in spite of all his best endeavors to correct some tangle in his children's make-up, nothing came of it, but whenever he dropped the definite faults and asked God to give the children his Holy Spirit, somehow everything went better. On our present levels our vices will master us; only with the mountain air of God's Word and Spirit may we deprive them of their power.—Sunday-School Times.

LINES.

I break the soil with anguished pain,
And sow with bitter tears;
My soul doth reap like golden grain
The gladness of the years!

I hear the winds that roar and roar,
The elements that rush.
My soul doth hear for evermore
The high celestial rush!

I toil with clouds till day is done,
In pastures dull and bare;
My soul doth shapen like a sun,
The common earth and air!

I win in darkness black as death
The scant bread of the sod;
My soul doth bring from fields of faith
The living sheaves of God.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND AND THE GENERAL CLERGY RELIEF FUND.

The Southern Churchman does not question the purpose of the Church Pension Fund to fulfil every legal obligation which it assumed when it absorbed by merger the former Clergy Relief Fund of the Church with its assets actual and prospective. There are, however, certain considerations which ought to be remembered in this connection, and which, as it seems to us and to many, impose a moral obligation upon the managers of the Pension Fund to extend to the old pensioners of the Clergy Relief Fund a more sympathetic considerateness, and a larger measure of relief out of the abundant funds provided by the Church for such a general purpose, than possibly the letter of the bond requires at their hands.

I. Until the day of its merger with the Church Pension Fund the General Clergy Relief Fund was the official agency of the whole Church for the special work committed to it. Its definite purpose and efficient methods were approved and commended by the General Convention and the Diocesan Conventions as in accord with the duty and the desire of the Church. It was not therefore a thing to be wiped out of existence as a failure, its sacred purpose ignored except as imposing an unwelcome financial burden which must be grudgingly borne for a time until its liabilities should be liquidated by the hand of death and its mission of charity forgotten. As its legal successor the Pension Fund should be the inheritor, not only of its assets, but of its traditions, its generous methods and large-hearted purposes, to the fullest extent possible.

II. The almost exclusive purpose of the Clergy Relief Fund was the immediate relief of the present needs of the already disabled clergy and the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen. It had accumulated from legacies, etc., exclusive of the Automatic Pension Fund, investments to the amount of approximately $400,000; but the interest on these was used for current pensions, and when need arose there was no hesitation in selling the necessary securities to meet the present necessities of those dependent upon it. This policy was known and approved by its supporters and, indeed, was the secret of the esteem and confidence which was accorded this Society by the whole Church.

III. For the good-will of the Church was the great asset of the Clergy Relief Fund. It was being realized in the ever-increasing contributions for its support and the co-operation of the diocesan societies in its work. The plea of Dr. McIlvaine for "The Forgotten Man" was taken to heart. During the fifteen years of the Rev. Mr. McClure's incumbency as Treasurer and Financial Secretary the annual contributions from churches and individuals mounted up from $23,000 to more than $100,000 per annum, given to be immediately expended for pensioners. In addition it was known that bequests amounting to nearly one million dollars had been written into wills and life insurance policies which would accrue to the Society on the death of the testators. The story of the Clergy Relief Fund for the past twenty years shows in unmistakable terms that the Church desires her present pensioners to be increasingly well cared for.

IV. It was largely the work of the Clergy Relief Fund that prepared the way and made possible the far greater and more stable enterprise of the Pension Fund. It was the Relief Fund, more than any other agency, that stirred up the mind of the Church to a realization of her duty to provide an efficient pension system and to a willingness to undertake it, while the very success of the Relief Fund in appealing to the charity of the Church proved the inadequacy of that old method of meeting the desired end. For twenty years before the Pension Fund was thought of the Church was being educated for such a design and prepared to make its splendid offering of nearly nine million dollars for liabilities which were weighing heavily on its conscience.

V. It was considered imperative for the success of the Pension Fund that it should have possession of the whole field of pension relief, and that all other societies, general and local, should practically be absorbed by it.

To this end the Clergy Relief Fund surrendered its funds, surrendered its great prestige, surrendered the more than $100,000 a year it was gathering from the free-will offerings of the Church for its beneficiaries, lost its life that it might gain it in the larger, stronger, more adequate operation of the Pension Fund. Only it would that they should remember its poor, the present pensioners for whose relief its life had been consecrated, with sympathy and at least undiminished aid. The latter was promised in terms of dollars and cents as of a fixed date and without regard to the decrease in its purchasing power. The sympathy had, unfortunately, to be taken for granted; it could not be written in the bond.

VI. The General Convention was the creator and ultimate custodian of the Clergy Relief Fund. It approved the merger of this Fund with the Pension Fund, but if the exact terms of the merger were ever presented to the Convention we cannot recall it, nor can we find them in its records. This does not mean that the General Convention, dazzled by the glamour of a splendid pension system so ably advocated, was forgetful of its debt to the beneficiaries of the Relief Fund. It was impossible to guard every point and stipulate every condition. In adopting the canon drawn up and presented by the Pension Fund for its own guidance, the broadest, most liberal and most indefinite canon that ever adorned our statute books, the Convention was simply trusting the Pension Fund, which it was making its sole agent in pension relief, to deal always fairly and generously as the Church ought to deal. It was understood that with an Accrued Liability Fund of five million dollars, with an additional $450,000 to meet interest on deferred payments, the Pension Fund could only promise to continue the payments then being made to pensioners already dependent on the Church's bounty. But in any event it was pledged that they should not be losers under the new system. It was not supposed that a much larger amount than the required minimum could be raised, and so no legislation based on such a contingency was suggested. It was understood that the Pension Fund would do the best it could for the old pensioners committed to its care, with whatever funds it could command.

VII. So also did the contributors to the Accrued Liabilities Fund trust the Pension Fund. It is perfectly true that it was fully explained that five millions must be raised to meet the liabilities of clergymen not yet retired before the system could go into effect. It is also true that the majority of smaller contributors paid little attention to this limitation if they knew about it at all. To them accrued liabilities meant the debt they already owed to the old clergy for whose insufficient support they had been giving aforesaid. And it was supposed that the larger the fund raised the better these former beneficiaries would fare. So when their sympathy and consciousness of accrued obligations abounded in an overflowing generosity, surpassing the amount required by over three million dollars, the whole Church rejoiced that now these old ministers and their wives and children would be put beyond the reach of want or the demands of charity forever. They did not realize, they cannot yet realize, that the custodians of their bounty had quite other views as to the disposal of it.

We submit therefore, in view of these facts, that the Church Pension Fund, having become at its own instance the sole agent and representative of the general Church in providing for the support of her pensioners who by God's providence became such before March 1, 1917, and the sole medium through which her bounty can reach them, is morally bound to meet the claims which their immediate and crying wants are making with the sympathetic consideration and generous relief which the Church herself has always felt and would unquestionably afford. Having at its own instance accepted the office and the assets of the Clergy Relief Fund, it is under every obligation to adopt also the approved policy of that Society, which was, first of all, to search out and minister relief to the present necessities of its actual beneficiaries to the full extent of its power. Having at its own instance become the custodian of a bounty far beyond its avowed requirements, and having its legal obligations amply provided for, it ought willingly to dispense a small proportion of this surplus for a present emergency from motives of at least ordinary human generosity, viewing its sacred trust not with the cold, calculating acumen of a Wall Street Insurance Company, but as the representative of a great Christian Church whose supreme law is love, which has never intentionally forfeited to any trusteeship her prerogative of being both liberal and just.

In urging these considerations upon the attention of the proper authorities, we are actuated by feelings of the utmost loyalty to the Church Pension Fund. In common with the whole Church we value its work and rejoice in its already great achievements. Its future success is dependent upon its retaining unimpaired the confidence and good-will of the Church which has been given to it in such a marked degree, and on this account also we commend the facts given above to its candid and generous judgment.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered, at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

Some Lenten Books. Several of these little books have been on our desk for quite a long time, waiting to be noticed at the beginning of the Lenten season.

Before the Morning Watch. By (the Rev.) F. A. Iremonger. With an Introduction by the Bishop of London. Longmans, Green & Co. London and New York. Pp. 172. 90 cents net.

A whole book, and a most excellent one, on a single Psalm, De Profundis, Psalm 130. The writer, of whom the Bishop of London tells us a little in his appreciative introduction, is a wide reader and a deep, fruitful thinker who can follow a line of thought to an end. So many writers of devotional books come out just where they went in. Not so the author of these twelve chapters on themes vital to the Christian life, which are not only spiritual but instructive, full of sound learning, wise admonition and profound suggestion. To one who wishes to fortify the foundations of his personal religious life we recommend this book very strongly.

In the Day of Battle. By the Right Rev. H. L. Paget, D. D., Bishop of Stepney. With an Introduction by the Bishop of London. Longmans Green & Co. Pp. 157.

Written for the Lent of 1915 in England, this book is "an attempt to seek the guidance of the Lord's Prayer with regard to the present war." The author is sure that "neither thought, nor feeling, nor will can go astray under such direction. The freedom it gives us, the gentle restraint it imposes, are exactly what God means for us. Within its limits and confines we may indeed walk at liberty." Every chapter begins with a petition from the Prayer, and the writer applies its underlying truths especially to the duties and dangers of these days of stress. Another thoughtful and helpful book, and needful for these times.

The Riches of Prayer. By the author of the Splendour of God. With a Preface by the Rev. Canon Joyce, D. D. Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 101. 90 cents.

This is a study of prayer as a fundamental principle of religion, based upon the reality of God and our relation to Him. It is considered as the necessary result of God's revelation of Himself and man's acceptance of Him as so revealed. The subject is treated with great breadth and fulness and with a deep spiritual understanding. No one can read it without new conceptions of what it means—this "lifting up of the living soul to the Living God," and a new light upon the reason, the conditions and the blessedness of prayer. An excellent guide for intensive Lenten study.

Come Unto Me. Considerations on St. Mark's Gospel. By (the Rev.) Frank Inigo Harrison. With Commendatory Note by Bishop Cecil Hook, D. D. Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 172. $1.20 net.

Readings for every day in Lent, founded on the Gospel of St. Mark. Devout, and frequently fresh and suggestive, without being profound. But good examples of thoughtful study of Holy Scripture.

Self-Training in Meditation. By A. H. McNeile, D. D. Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin. Author of "Self-Training in Prayer," etc. Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 72. 50 cents net.

A very useful little book on one of the primary needs of the Christian life, that of knowing how to read the Bible for spiritual nourishment and growth. It is practical, simple and thoroughly helpful. One could not wish a better guide for real Lenten work in one's closet.

The Living Sacrifice. Readings for the Forty Days of Lent, based on the Prayer of Consecration. By the Rev. Alanson Q. Bailey, B. D. With Introduction by Bishop Woodcock, of Kentucky. Edwin S. Gorham, New York. Pp. 180. $1.00.

Here is something for those whose habits of religious thought are strongly sacramentarian. The book is pervaded with a tone of deep spirituality, though we cannot follow all of its teachings.

Church Year Sermons for Children. By the Rev. Phillips E. Osgood. George W. Jacobs & Co. Philadelphia. $1.25.

No better book of sermons to children has ever come to the notice of the present reviewer than this. In its imaginative understanding of the child's instinctive interests, in the remarkable skill with which its subjects are arranged to follow the beautiful lessons of the Church Year, and in the convenience of its typographical arrangement, the book is equally admirable. The illustrations, sketched by Mr. Osgood himself, are quite as fascinating as the text.

W. R. B.

You can't mock God with lies. You can't offer Him devotion that isn't endorsed by the action of the life; you can't offer Him a petition that does not rest on the sanction of the deed; and in that hour when you and I are praying for those who dwell far away, when we really enter into the great longing of Christ's longing heart for all mankind and pray as He prayed for the other sheep, not of that Jewish fold, that they may all come and that there may be one flock and one Shepherd, we shall bring our wealth and we shall lay down our obedience also at his feet.—Robert E. Speer.

A CALL FOR UNITED PRAYER FOR THE MONTH OF MARCH.

The General War-Time Commission of the Churches, at the request of the War Commissions of several communions, sends out this call to the Church throughout the United States for the joint observance of the month of March as a time of special penitence and prayer and intercession. A booklet, "New Ventures in Faith," for the use of churches or of small groups or of individuals, containing meditations and suggestions for prayer for the entire month, and so arranged as to be of service in following months, has been prepared and can be obtained at ten cents per copy or $10.00 per hundred copies from the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, and from the War Commission of each denomination.

The last week of March begins with Palm Sunday and ends with Easter Day. The various communions will have their own special forms of observance of this week, and the Federal Council of the Churches will issue a special call with suggestions for these days.

In behalf of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches we venture to suggest the possibility of finding special occasions this year for interdenominational and community acts of co-operation and unity.

1. Hundreds of men have been called and hundreds more will be called from the ministry of the churches to service as chaplains in the army and navy. As chaplains they will be ministers not of their own denomination, but of the nation, serving in Christ's name all the sons of the nation enlisted in the army and the navy. Wherever from any community a chaplain goes forth to this great service we suggest that all the churches of the community join in a general consecration service, sending him forth, bearing the ordination of his own body, but with the blessing of all and with the consecration of the community from which he goes to the ministry of the nation.

2. It would not be right in view of fuel conditions that all the churches of the community should be kept open throughout the month, but we suggest that such arrangements be made as will provide some one open church or parish house throughout the entire month to which Christian people may resort by day and by night for prayer.

3. As a means of fellowship and unity in common intercession, as well as of just observance of the government's call for the husbanding of every resource, we suggest an enlarged number of union services among such churches as may find it possible, and especially we suggest a united community service of all Christian people in support of our present national duty.

4. Whenever it is found to be possible we suggest intercommunion celebrations of the Lord's Supper.

5. In a few months the government will summon the second enrollment of men under the military registration. In advance of the call we suggest that the churches in every community come into touch with all the men in Class 1 of the government registration so that when these men are summoned to the camps they may go forth with such a work of love and faithfulness already done in their behalf as may steady and uphold them in the life to which they go.

We are sure that the nation by diplomacy and on the field of battle will do all in its power to bring this great struggle to a just close and to restore peace to the earth, and we call upon the Church to use every resource of power and faith and love to hasten the end of strife and to bring in the kingdom that is first righteousness, and then, peace and joy.

William Lawrence, Vice-Chairman.

William Adams Brown, Secretary.

A Lenten Message From Bishop Guerry.

Dear Brethren:

Never in my recollection has the Church had such an opportunity to make Lent a time for the deepening and strengthening of the spiritual life of her children as that which it now affords us.

May I, on the threshold of this penitential season, seek to impress upon you the greatness of the opportunity and the special privileges which are ours.

First. Let me sound a note of warning: In the multiplicity of the claims that the war has made upon our time and our ability to give, there is real danger lest the equally important and urgent needs of the Church be forgotten. Our aim should be to serve both the Church and the nation. Neither should be sacrificed to the other. I do not think that the part that the Church has already played in this war, and the still greater contribution which she is destined, under God, to make when the war is over, has been sufficiently appreciated. There is a tendency quite noticeable in certain quarters to give less to the Church than formerly. The plea is being made that people have no time now for the various activities, missionary or otherwise, of the Church.

I can imagine no greater mistake that we could make at this time than to neglect the ministrations of the Church in the belief that by so doing we can better serve the State. Every forward step in the campaign for preparedness so far undertaken by the government, has been undertaken with the help and co-operation of the Christian churches. The conservation of food, the Liberty Loan, the work of the Y. M. C. A. and of the Red Cross have all been organized and launched through the Christian churches of the country. They have responded nobly and generously to every demand made upon them. Our Clergy are giving of their time and personal service without measure and without price to the work of caring for the social and religious needs of the officers and men in the various camps and cantonments in the State. Our War Commission, through its Executive Committee, of which Bishop Perry, of Rhode Island, is Chairman, has made large appropriations of money to send volunteer chaplains into our camps, and to provide them with all the necessary equipment for their work. The Church has demonstrated her ability to do things in this crisis. She is making large sacrifices to win the war, and is prepared to make still greater. The support of the Church in this hour of national peril, is, therefore, both a religious and patriotic duty. The flag and cross stand side by side in most of our churches, and in this great war of ideals and principles, they stand, or should stand, for the same thing.

Our people should, therefore, be ready to make greater sacrifices for their religion than ever before; and all should be made to realize how vitally and fundamentally important is the part that the Church is destined to play in this great world struggle.

I bid you, therefore, to a Lent of real self-denial and prayer. Let us practice such a self-denial that we who are back of the firing line may be said in some very true sense to share in the privations and sacrifices of those who represent us at the front.

Lent affords us an opportunity to show our patriotism by a more rigid economy in all the expenditures of the home, and to make its practice an act and exercise of devotion for the good of our souls as well as for the good of the nation.

I respectfully urge upon our people at this time the value of intercessory prayer.

I bid you to pray for our country; for our President and all in authority; for our army and navy; for our Allies, and if it be the will of God for victory and success to our arms. Let us not forget, after the example of the Master Himself, to pray for our enemies, and especially that God would look down in compassion upon the sick and wounded.

Pray, also, for those who are near and dear to us that God would defend them from all dangers, both to soul and body. I desire to impress upon you the value of intercessory prayer, with specific requests for prayer, in connection with celebrations of the Holy Communion. If the Clergy will let it be known that they will present such special petitions as the people may desire to offer at certain celebrations of the Holy Communion, I am sure many would be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity.

As the war goes on these services of prayer and intercession will become more and more helpful and comforting. The sacrificial nature of the Eucharist with its emphasis upon the offering of life for service through sacrifice is that act of religious worship which comes nearest to expressing what is in the heart of the soldier who goes forth to fight his country's battles, and who also, should be in the heart and life of every individual worshipper who kneels to pray for those he or she loves and to offer himself or herself a willing sacrifice to God for service.

And, finally, this is a Lent when the Church throughout the world needs to pray most earnestly for the visible and organic unity of all Christians.

I verily believe that this frightful war could never have happened if we had had a united Christendom. And if wars are to cease in the future, it can only be when all men shall more fully realize their Onship in Christ, and there shall be on earth one worldwide visible Brotherhood and Communion, bearing its undivided witness to the unity of God's great family.

Let us, therefore, as individuals and as a Church repent us of our sins, and humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God and pray Him to make us more worthy and meet to do His will that He may use us to His glory and to the carrying out of His great purposes.

Faithfully yours,

WM. A. GUERRY.

Charleston, S. C., Jan. 3, 1918.

FROM BISHOP ISRAEL IN FRANCE.

In a letter from Bishop Israel to the Rotary Club of Erie, of which he is a member, he says:

My work, as you have no doubt seen from portions of personal letters which I understand have been published, has for the last three months, been along the line of the American front. This does not mean the trenches, as few of our soldiers have been there, and then only temporarily, as you know, for the experience, but in the preparation camps scattered among the French villages, many of which are within sound of the conflict.

I have had the privilege of meeting with many thousands of our soldiers, addressing crowds in the Y. M. C. A.

huts afternoons and nights and then meeting them personally afterwards. To talk from a soap box, table or chair in a dingily lighted, smoke pervaded, damp, cold hut to hundreds of men, who, with eager, upturned faces, are looking to you for encouragement and cheer, is most inspiring. And after the address to hear the cheers for both country and the cause for which we fight and to be overwhelmed with great strong handshakes of those crowding to meet you and to listen to the quiet word which indicates determination to be strong for the right, and hear many questions about home and relatives in other parts of the army, fills me with gratitude that it has been made possible for me to be here. On the other hand, my heart sinks with sadness as looking into those strong young faces I realize that thousands will never return to home and loved ones, and that many spared to return will, like the hundreds of English and French to be seen everywhere, be maimed and marred for life. Upon this thought it does not do to dwell. I fear you in America cannot realize how it broods and hovers over the countries at war. The freedom of nations and the liberty of the individual for which we fight, however, is God's cause, and we keep this to the front, whether in camp or city, and thus all sacrifice and suffering appear small.

I expect to spend my Christmas in the camps with our soldiers, feeling that participation in their deprivations and discomforts at such a time particularly will be appreciated by the thousands whom I expect to meet during the Holy Season. I am glad and grateful to be here, and beg of you all to pray daily that this terrible war may soon end by victory crowning our efforts, establishing a righteous and lasting peace.

Wishing you each and all a very blessed Christmastide and trusting that you will accept the blessing of your Bishop as coming from your associate and friend, I remain,

Sincerely yours,
ROGERS ISRAEL.

AT CAMP LEE.

Percy J. Knapp, in St. Andrew's Cross.

(Mr. Knapp, the writer of this article, is the Brotherhood's Camp Secretary at Camp Lee, near Petersburg, Va. He gave up a fine position in New York in order that he might take up this work, and bring cheer to the lonely soldier away from home.)

* * * The men in the barracks nearest to us were from West Virginia, those coming from the cities being as a rule well educated. In fact many were professional men. There were also many from the mountain country. These mountain lads were a tall, raw-boned gaunt lot, and yet possessed a gentle simplicity, which drew us to them. Only a few had had the opportunities of school. Therefore, many could neither read nor write, never having been away from home, or traveled on a railroad train, their state of mind was a mixture of fear, homesickness, uncertainty and curiosity, with homesickness and loneliness strongly predominating. Many were physically ill, owing to their intense homesickness.

As they came into the building their eyes opened with wonderment. The piano, phonograph, books, papers, games and the big cheerful fireplace, with its crackling logs were so inviting. And then the strangers who greeted them with a hand grip, and arm about their shoulders formed a circuit of comradeship and brotherhood.

It was all so new and strange, but somehow that greeting struck deep in their hearts, and kindled anew the fires of love and peace and contentment.

The breaking of home ties, the separation from loved ones, was a bewildering, inexplicable experience in the lives of these simple but royal good lads, and it had stunned them.

They were not bitter, they did not question or doubt the love of God, but in a dazed way they were groping for the reason. Not one was disloyal. They were ready and willing to fight fearlessly, they loved their God, country and flag, but for the moment they simply could not grasp the changed conditions.

I am ashamed to confess that when I first met these men, I wondered what was beneath those worn and unkempt coats, those collarless soiled shirts. But I recall that there was something in those clear eyes, a difference in the smile, and a warmth in the handshake and greeting, that I had never noticed so marked in men whom I had previously met. I did not have to wait long to find out that in these men, was to be found that priceless gift, Christian manhood. * * *

Several inquired if we were going to have Bible class, as they missed it so much. It was common to hear men say that they had not missed Bible class, and service at church in years. As one chap so aptly expressed it, "This yere place ain't no how like home, if we ain't goin' to hev no Bible class, and wurshup on Sabbath day." It was indeed a long, long way from being like home, but God showed He still loved His children when he sent the Y. M. C. A., the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and other men into the camps to help bridge the great gap between home and military life. Men are giving the best in their lives to fill this gap with love, service, devotion and brotherhood.

Could Neither Read Nor Write.

At 5:30 o'clock Sunday morning I was awakened by hearing some one walking about the building. Slipping into my clothes, I hurried out. It had been a cold night, and the supply of bedding being short, the boys had come over to get warm. There being no drills on Sunday, several hundred men were in the building. Writing paper and envelopes being furnished free, we urged them to write home, and in a short time long rows were bending over their letters.

I soon discovered a new opportunity for service, writing for the man who can neither write nor read. At first it was a little difficult, for on asking the fellow what he wanted to say, he would reply, "I dunno, jes' write anythin' you kin think." It was no easy task to think for the other fellow, and particularly so when it came to writing to their sweethearts! But where there is a will, there is a way, and so I succeeded in helping them.

One chap wanted "Mammy" not to worry, but to cook, and send him a chicken, and brother Bill to shoot and cook and send him some squirrels, and brother Cecil to send some chestnuts.

He had left behind his young wife and baby. She had to live on until he got his first pay, was a little patch of corn and an old mule. She had no living relatives, and he said his folks couldn't help "kase his pop and mammy could nohow agree, so jes unhitched." (Separated.)

You can imagine the anguish of this lad as he pictured her need and loneliness. As he told me the story of his life, his love for his Nellie and baby girl, his sobs shook the cot on which we sat. He finished by saying, "He nowhow had lived a wicked life, and he knew God would tek keer of his Nellie and baby, but he was skeered she might lose her faith somehow." I don't know whether I spent more time in wiping my glasses so that I could see, or in writing that letter.

I thought I was an adept at writing tender and cheery letters to my little wife up North, but I tried to excell myself in that letter to his Nellie. As the boys say, it was a "peach," and as I read it over and over to him, smiles smoothed out the lines of his heart-ache. With my arm about him, we went out into the big warm social room for the service. It is wonderful what just a ray of God's sunshine will do for a man.

Another fellow wanted to write to his sister, which was comparatively easy. Then he wanted to write to his "woman" (sweetheart), and this was a task distinctly different. As he described Martha, I pictured a rosy cheeked country lass. After I finished the letter and read it to him he was delighted and said, "He reckoned he could no how think jes like that." Imagine my surprise when he requested the third letter, and this one to his other girl, Mattie, who really was the favorite! I had made that letter to Martha a masterpiece in love literature, and I did not dare to repeat in Mattie's letter. I saw trouble ahead with two such letters going to the same town, but was careful not to put any identifying marks, as I pictured law suits and shooting matches. But Mattie got her letter, and it was a work of art of its kind. Again the fellow clapped his hands with joy as I read the letter.

About 7:30 P. M., with nearly one hundred and fifty men present, we opened our Sunday evening service. Again such singing, then prayers, responsive reading, a chapter from the Bible, and a brief address. Before closing we asked if any man present wished to offer prayer. A great big six-footer threw off his army overcoat, and getting on his knees he "opened up." No prayer ever issued from the lips of a man that could excel the simplicity, earnestness and beauty of that prayer. As he finished another took his place, and again we were thrilled by the simple, pure, childlike faith so characteristic of the man who loves God with all his body, soul and mind.

PENSIONS AND THE PENSION FUND.

Mr. Editor: I was very glad to see in your issue of the 26th instant some expression of opinion as to the case of the clergy retired before March, 1917. An impression seems to prevail that it would be a simple thing for the Church Pension Fund to pay such clergy as much as $600 a year; but a little examination will show that there are great obstacles in the way of such a disbursement. I do not know how many clergy were retired before the Church Pension Fund took charge of the pension business, but the report made to the General Convention of 1916 gave the number of beneficiaries as 700 in round numbers; which, I suppose, includes widows and orphans as well as clergymen. During the three preceding years these beneficiaries received $360,000, or on the average, $120,000 a year, which gave each one $171.43. Supposing that this average results from an allowance of $300 a year to each clergyman, it would, or rather, should, be increased in a like ratio if that stipend were doubled; in other words, the Church Pension Fund would have to pay out annually $240,000, which is much more than the $2,000,000 set apart by them for the ante-Martians will supply. Of course a good deal is assumed in these calculations, and they are probably too large; but they are correct enough to suggest what hindrances there are to keep the Church Pension Fund from paying stipends in the ratio of $600 to the stipendiaries of the late General Clergy Relief; and to show that consideration is due them in this matter. There is, however, another matter in the hands of the Church Pension Fund for which they may be criticized without so much consideration; and that is the automatic pension for all clergy older than sixty-four years. Each October for six years before 1917 this pension was regularly paid. It averaged $15 to each beneficiary. Last October it was not paid; nor has it been paid yet, though its payment is promised. It is not easy to think of any excuse for delay in the punctual distribution of this money. Perhaps it seems a trifle to men who are handling millions of dollars; but it is not a trifle to other men who are getting not more than $300 a year; and the lack of it may be also the lack of much needed necessities of life—fuel, food or clothing.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

Mr. Editor: What you say in regard to a missionary deficit in your issue of December 15 is true; but back of what is caused by the war is another cause.

Offerings for missions depend in part upon the efforts of our spiritual leaders, the clergy. When large numbers of parishes and mission stations are vacant, having little or no pastoral care, and when there are many capable clergy without suitable employment, these conditions greatly reduce the amount that would otherwise be given for missions.

We often hear the cry, "a dearth of clergy," and again, "a want of means." The trouble is neither in a dearth of clergy nor in a want of means in the Church to support the clergy.

The real trouble is stated in the Living Church Annual for 1916, pages 5 and 6 (editorial). "Our system of bringing clergy into touch with parish work is simply atrocious. We need a better system whereby a priest may be transferred easily from one cure to another, without loss of time on his part, or long continued vacancy in the parish."

Here is a great need, "a better system." Times have changed. The parish system of fifty years ago works mischievously now in the small and weak parishes and in mission stations. The long continued vacancy is very harmful. Our own church people become discouraged; some grow careless and indifferent; children are not instructed and many are lost to us. Then, from the financial standpoint, see the loss. As a rule, people who have no pastor do not contribute to a pastor's support.

In this Province of the Southwest there are fully 4,000 communicants of the Church in vacant parishes and missions, or scattered where they have no pastoral care.

Under a better system put these people under pastoral care; remove the long continued vacancy; see then the financial gain. An average of ten dollars for each communicant would make a gain of $40,000 a year.

Now our Church people have the means. See the eight millions and over raised for Church Pension Fund. See the money raised for Red Cross work and for the work of Y. M. C. A.—a good proportion coming from our own Church people. But how can any better system be brought about? It would of course take considerable time. There is great need, and when the need is more seen and felt, perhaps some action will be taken to put into effect a better system.

How can a beginning be made? I would suggest that a Board of Missions might appoint a missionary priest for a definite time (say five years) with a definite salary. If a Missionary Bishop is appointed for life, why not also make some suitable provision for a Missionary Priest? Both are giving a life service to the Church. Many other things could be suggested. The great need is a "better system."

FOR SOUTHERN FLORIDA.

Mr. Editor: Word has come out of the Missionary District of Southern Florida that an attempt will be made to raise sufficient funds for the endowment of the district in order that the next General Convention may be petitioned to admit that district to the status of a Diocese.

Those of my readers who have given much thought to the subject of domestic missions will doubtless rejoice that one of our home Bishops has secured this vision, and is partially confident of the result. Bishop Brewer led the way for all domestic missionary Bishops. He showed how a missionary district could become an independent Diocese. He "planned wisely and acted with courage," as we ask God to cause our military men to plan and act. The result was that Bishop Brewer had a Diocese entirely surrounded (as far as the United States was concerned) with missionary districts.

Efforts have been made in the past to concentrate the missionary Bishops' minds on the accomplishment of this great thing in their respective fields. The last $10,000 of the endowment was offered; offerings have been taken up for the endowment fund of a missionary district the Sunday after a Bishop had been consecrated for the district. But many of the missionary Bishops make no attempt to relieve the Board of Missions to the extent of making their district responsible, forever, for their salary.

Now, will the Church as a whole help Bishop Mann in his noble attempt? He needs $26,000 to make good his plans. Surely there are two hundred and sixty people in this Church who would gladly give one hundred dollars each to accomplish this excellent thing!

A begging circular came to my desk this morning, which reads as follows:

Charity Camouflage: "This is an open season for charitable misrepresentations."

tations. The incentive to misrepresent was never so great as this year. * * * Probably over $1,000,000,000 was given for charitable purposes in this country last year. Millions were given at Christmas time."

But the call of a home missionary district is free from camouflage, for any one of us can investigate the case. We have given right and left these last twelve months, without investigation, without questioning, trusting in the patriotism of people we never knew. We know Bishop Mann. We know the excellent record of Southern Florida under Bishop Gray and since his resignation. Knowing these things, can we refuse to do the thing that needs doing?

A Chinese Bishop Elected.

The Diocese of Chekiang is the first of the eleven Dioceses of the Church in China to elect a Chinese to the Episcopate.

Bishop Graves writes that on December 11 the Rev. T. S. Sing, Archdeacon to Chekiang, was elected Assistant Bishop. This, Bishop Graves points out, is another step in advance and means much for the future of the Chinese Church.

The confirmation of the election will be one of the most important duties in the next General Synod, when it meets in Shanghai in April of this year.

(Chekiang is a Diocese of the Church in China and a Missionary District or See of the Church of England. Its Bishop is the Right Rev. Herbert J. Moloney, D. D., located at Ningpo.)

Fifth Annual Meeting of the Board of Education.

The annual meeting of the General Board of Religious Education was held in New York, January 29, 30 and 31, with a large attendance of members and visitors.

Bishops Burleson and Beecher came to present the needs of the preparatory schools of the West. They reported that many schools felt the need of some Church-wide plan for secondary education. At present there was no plan, and Church schools were constantly succumbing to the pressure of the difficulty of financial maintenance. The names of fifteen schools were listed which had given up work during the past year. There were many loyal Churchmen and women who were willing to devote their lives to Church preparatory schools, but they wanted to be sure that there was some plan by which the schools would be developed and supported. The Bishops claimed that it was necessary that there should be a Secretary of the Board, who would devote his entire time to Church preparatory schools.

The Board voted to provide a Secretary as soon as its income would permit. Provision was made for the traveling expenses of voluntary agents who in the meantime would make preliminary inquiries and assist in forming some plan for strengthening the work of the preparatory schools of the Church.

A committee consisting of Rev. Dr. Gardner, Bishop Lines, Bishop Reese, Dean Bartlett and Mr. Theopold was appointed to report at the next meeting of the Board a plan by which the financial needs of the Church's educational work may be dealt with comprehensively as a responsibility of the whole Church.

Rev. Paul Micou, the Secretary of the Department of Collegiate Education, made his first report. The Board approved a plan by which the Department would make an effort to place the right man, properly equipped, in one college town each year; that a system of scholarships be established by the Collegiate Department by which students in a given university who are definitely training for service in the Church, might be awarded scholarships for their junior and senior years; that the Department raise a fund to make inquiries into the best methods of promoting religion in colleges and State universities; this inquiry should cover the kind of courses needed in religion, either within the curriculum or without, and the best methods for student worship and organization, and the peculiar kind of pastoral care which the unique college situation demands.

Dr. Gardner, the General Secretary, presented a report which covered five years, giving comparisons between conditions in the Church five years ago and the results achieved. Nearly every Diocese has passed a canon providing for a Board of Religious Education, and the eight Provincial Boards are recognizing opportunities for service, discovering leaders and organizing for the work in the future Provincial life that is bound to develop as the Church grows and meets enlarged needs. He stressed the progress made in providing text-books, in teacher training, co-operation with other educational forces, religious work in colleges, study of the problems of theological education, etc.

In response to many requests from rectors for topics and study outlines on the religious questions raised by the war, the Board voted to issue a pamphlet entitled, "Studies in Religion for War Times." This will be mailed to the Clergy immediately; it will contain topics and guiding questions for meditation and class study. It will also suggest Bible reading and books to aid discussion.

Dean Bartlett presented a report on the recruiting and support of candidates for Holy Orders. He showed that the supply of future clergymen was endangered. While the Church gained communicants at the rate of two per cent per annum, the Clergy increased by less than one per cent. During the quarter century, ending 1913, the communicants had increased 103 per cent, while the Clergy had increased but 23 per cent, in other words, communicants increased four times as rapidly as the Clergy who were to minister to them. The report showed also the disturbing fact that a large proportion of our Clergy came from Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians and Roman Catholics. One Diocese reported "that fully half of the men entering our ministry to-day are importations." The Church is not self-maintaining and self-reproducing in the ministry.

While the war has partly created and partly revealed our needs, it has also given us the greatest chance in a half century for securing candidates. The sober and quickening influence of war should be supplemented by a clear and ringing call for enlistment in the greatest of all armies. The necessary agents to spread the call are at hand: chaplains, lay workers of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, secretaries of the Y. M. C. A. and Red Cross—all might become recruiting sergeants for the Church.

The Board voted to request the aid of the chaplains and Church workers among the soldiers, in presenting the need of recruits for the ministry.

To the Men of the Province of Washington.

We are paying the bills for a small army of workers—2,800 and more.

What are they doing in the various so-called mission fields?

How do present world conditions affect them?

Has their work any influence on the great movements of to-day especially in the Far East?

You as an intelligent Christian and Churchman ought to be able to answer these questions. Can you?

The recent Synod of our Province felt that you should be able to do so, and instructed us to place the matter before you.

We, therefore, suggest that during Lent, 1918, one hour each week be spent by our men in groups, large or small, in every Parish and mission in the Province to acquaint themselves with the facts.

Some of our busiest laymen, finding how interesting the subject of modern missions is, are extending their luncheon hour once a week to discuss this subject; others meet down town after office hours; others at the home of one of the group on a week-day evening; others again at the rectory, church or Parish House, as is locally most convenient, on a week-day evening, or before or after service on Sunday.

The point is to gain the approval of the rector to form one or more groups, and to meet where and when is most convenient each week during the Lenten season. Your best method might be to turn your Men's Bible Class into a group during Lent.

The leader of such a group needs no special training. His duty is rather to start and direct the general discussion of the subject. Some simple book as a guide should be used, and each member should have a copy.

We recommend the "Why and How of Missions" or "Then and Now." A copy of these can be obtained free of cost from Wm C. Sturgis, Ph. D., Educational Secretary of the Board of Missions, Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, also other interesting material giving facts and figures will be sent on request.

The "Spirit of Missions," or any other missionary magazine will help as additional reading.

Y. M. C. A. War Council Drive.

A drive of the War Council of the Y. M. C. A., for the first grade men to go to France to superintend the distribution of $50,000,000 subscribed by the American people, was started on December 1, and sought to find nine hundred and fifty men. Up to February 1 the Council examined seven hundred and ten men, and accepted an even six hundred. All of them have now sailed and have entered upon their work, or will do so within a few days. It is said that not all have been sent to France, but some to England and a few to other war fronts, the names of which cannot be given.

With these six hundred men, expected to be able to handle big affairs, individual financial arrangements were made in every case. Where men were able and willing to do so, they are bearing all of their expenses, and receiving no salaries. A considerable proportion are said to be in this class. There are some ministers in the number whose salaries are paid in whole or in part by congregations, and in one instance by a missionary society. Where the Council felt it must have a particular man, to meet great needs of administration and management, a minimum salary was agreed upon, in many instances far below that the men had been receiving.

In the six hundred list are Bishop Charles H. Brent, famous as Christian leader in the Philippines and now Bishop-elect of Western New York; A. M. Harris, banker, treasurer of the World's Sunday-school Association; Professor Harry Emerson Fosdick, of Union Seminary; President William A. Shanklin, of Wesleyan University; President William H. Crawford, of Allegheny College; John G. Pollard, who resigned as Attorney-General of Virginia to go to France; James C. Cassell, general superintendent of the Norfolk and Western Railway; John B. Howarth, a Detroit manufacturer, and Everett J. Lake, former lieutenant-governor of Connecticut.

Adult Bible Class Movement.

The Adult Bible Class movement of the International Sunday-school Association, with headquarters in Chicago, brings out the fact, in connection with a drive it is inaugurating; that Pennsylvania has the largest number of Men's Bible Classes and the most men in them, Illinois second, New York third and Ohio fourth, and that in respect to Bible study by men these States are far and away ahead of all other States.

The movement for men in Bible classes, always in connection with Sunday-schools, started some twelve years ago, and there are now 68,000 classes registered with the Association, besides many other classes existing but not registered. The number of men in these classes exceeds 2,500,000. Religious bodies contributing the largest numbers of men are, in order, the Disciples of Christ, the Presbyterians, the Methodists and the Baptists.

The Association announces, in connection with its drive for more classes, that all must be connected with Sunday-schools of churches in order to influence boys in the same schools, and hold them. Denver is trying for 10,000 men before Easter, New York for a class in every church, and Boston, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Indianapolis, Kansas City and Minneapolis are pushing the plan with greatest enthusiasm.

Officers of the Association say the excuse that workers have gone to war is getting stale. They say men are making the war an excuse, and there are plenty of men remaining. The claim is put forth that classes bring men to the churches that churches themselves cannot draw into them. Hence the Bible movement is a missionary propaganda of the first importance.

Interdenominational Conference on After-the-War Problems.

A preliminary conference on "After-the-War Problems" was held at Atlantic City, January 29-31, under the auspices of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Among the subjects considered were reconstruction of the devastated districts of Europe and relief of the local population now and after the declaration of peace; problems of child welfare; defectives and dependants, etc.; labor problems, including provision of employment for demobilized soldiers under proper conditions; economic reconstruction, involving the question of international control of raw materials, colonial possessions, etc.; financial problems, dealing with war debts and the cost of reconstruction, as above indicated; the substitution of some scheme of economic peace for economic warfare; and, lastly, propaganda by the Church along the above lines in the form of lectures, study courses, literature and oral propaganda in general. The conference particularly considered in connection with the above topics these three questions: What are the essential principles that Christians ought to support? What are the definite practicable methods that should be advocated? Where shall the Church function?

The Episcopal Church was represented through the Joint Commission on Social Service by its Executive Secretary, Rev. F. M. Crouch.

Main Building of Blue Ridge Industrial School Destroyed by Fire. Must Be Replaced Promptly.

The main building—Recitation Hall—at the Blue Ridge Industrial School, Dyke, was destroyed by fire on Thursday night, January 31. The origin of the fire is unknown. It was discovered about midnight, and had made such headway that none of the contents of the building were saved. The building contained five large class rooms, assembly room and library. In the cellar was stored about two thousand cans of vegetables and about seventy-five bushels of potatoes.

The building and contents were worth about $6,000.00; insurance $4,000.00. The loss is very serious, coming as it does in the midst of the session. Most of the classes will have to be suspended temporarily at least. There are one hundred and seven students, of whom eighty were in the boarding department.

It will be necessary to rebuild as soon as possible. Plans are now being drawn up for a building of native stone or brick, and better adapted to the needs of the school than the one destroyed, which was one of the first buildings erected.

This school was founded by the Rev. George P. Mayo about seven years ago. The work began in a log cabin and has steadily grown until to-day it represents an investment of $45,000.00.

It is giving academic and industrial training to mountain boys and girls.

It has already accomplished a great and lasting good, and the future holds out unlimited possibilities for further usefulness to the poor boys and girls from the isolated country communities. It is imperative that the building destroyed be replaced by a better one. Funds for this purpose are urgently needed and should be sent to the Rev. George P. Mayo, Dyke, Va.

State Council of Defense Calls on All Virginia to Aid War Camp Community Service Campaign.

On January 31 State Council of Defense passed the following resolutions: "Whereas, the Commonwealth of Virginia has played a most important part in every war in which this nation has been engaged; and

"Whereas, in this great conflict more enlisted men will in all probability be trained in Virginia than in any other State in the Union; and

"Whereas, it is our patriotic duty to see that the camp communities be made safe for these enlisted men, and that Virginia extend to them the hospitality of which she is justly famed; and

"Whereas, this burden is too great to be borne solely by the immediate camp communities; therefore be it

"Resolved by the Virginia State Council of Defense, That we call upon the good people of Virginia to support most liberally with their dollars and their time the War Camp Community Service Campaign, which is being conducted in this State to raise Virginia's $200,000.00 quota of the national fund. The Council calls upon the individuals and also upon the Chamber of Commerce, Rotary Clubs, farmers' organizations, the public schools, the ministers, the Woman's Clubs, the fraternal societies and all other agencies that have the welfare of our young men at heart, and that desire that America send overseas a clean army with a high morale."

"The spirit with which our soldiers leave America, and their efficiency on the battle fronts of Europe, will be vitally affected by the character of the environment surrounding our military training camps."

WOODROW WILSON.

Colonel Eugene C. Massie, Richmond, is Chairman, and John M. Miller, Jr., President of First National Bank, Richmond, is Treasurer of the War Camp Community Service Campaign for Virginia.

Dr. Bell's Return: The many friends of Dr. W. C. Bell, of the Virginia Seminary, will be glad to learn that the illness which necessitated his return from France is not of a serious or permanent nature. An acute digestive trouble developed which would not yield to treatment in France, on account of conditions of life and work at the front. A short period of rest is all that is needed to restore him to his normal condition. Dr. Bell will resume his regular work at the Seminary at the beginning of the spring term.

All Saints' Church, Richmond: The annual demonstration of the activities of All Saints' Church will take place Friday, February 8, at eight o'clock in the Parish House. Every organization of the church will have its headquarters attractively arranged, and some one will be on hand at each place to give information about that organization. The program will consist of music under the direction of Ernest H. Cosby; a talk by the rector, Rev. J. Y. Downman, D. D.; a short missionary play; a Boy Scout demonstration, and the raising of three flags—the United States flag by one of the Scouts, while everybody sings "My Country 'Tis of Thee"; the Christian flag by the girl with the best record in the Junior Auxiliary, Katharine Scott, while the congregation sings, "Fling Out the Banner," and the service flag (bearing fifty stars), by the girl who has done most Red Cross work, Martha Seal, while "Onward Christian Soldier" is sung. The service flag will afterwards hang in front of the church.

A similar meeting was held at All Saints last year, and proved a great success in visualizing the work of the church, and in bringing the working bodies together as a unit and showing their relation to each other and to the Church at large.

In St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper.

the Rev. Kensey J. Hammond, rector, a "Service Flag" was recently given by Major Edwin L. Slaughter. When hung in the church the occasion was made an opportunity for a patriotic service of prayer. Major Edwin Gibson presented the flag, and the rector received it: the major speaking of the duty of patriotism, and the rector of our relation to God in patriotism. Appropriate hymns were sung, and an offering received for the War Commission Fund of this church.

A "Service Flag" has also been hung in Christ Church, Brandy Station.

Union Lenten Services: The schedule of the union, afternoon Lenten services agreed upon by the Richmond churches is the same as that of previous years: Monday at St. Mark's; Tuesday at Grace; Wednesday at Monumental and Holy Trinity; Thursday at St. Paul's and Holy Comforter; Friday at St. James and St. John's; and Saturday at All Saints, St. Andrew's and Christ Church.

The Rev. William H. Campston, formerly rector of Trinity Church, Fredericksburg, who has been religious secretary at the Y. M. C. A. at Camp Sevier, S. C., has been transferred to Camp Jackson, Columbia, S. C., and assumed his duties on February 1.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

St. John's Church, Bedford City: This Parish has one hundred and fifty-four communicants and has sent twenty-seven men for service in army and navy. There is hardly a Parish with a larger percentage of its young men in the service. The rector, the Rev. T. Carter Page, dedicated a handsome silk flag on Sunday, January 27, a gift of Mrs. John M. Smith.

Christ Church, Pulaski: The Rev. Thomas F. Opie has made most remarkable progress in the work in the growing town of Pulaski during the few months he has been in charge. The Bishop Co-Adjutor of the Diocese visited this Parish on Septuagesima Sunday and confirmed a class of ten. The Bishop preached a timely sermon for these days of anxiety and unrest from the text, "I will lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my help."

The Sunday-school has taken on new life; grown to such an extent that three new classes had to be formed. Also a Junior Brotherhood of sixteen members has been organized, which gives promise for good and valuable service. A new organ has been bought for this church to fill a long-felt need, and it is to be installed this month.

Civilian Chaplains: Bishop Tucker states that he has appointed the Rev. R. B. Nelson, of Blacksburg, as one of the civilian chaplains to serve from this Diocese. Mr. Nelson left for Hampton and Newport News on Monday, the 28th. While he is not certain where he will be definitely located, he will take a survey of that field and confer with the Bishop.

Mr. Nelson leaves one of the most important fields in the Diocese, since he ministers to a large number of students at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, and has five or six missions scattered around through the mountain, in which mission work he has drawn a large number of the young men from the institute. Also he ministers to the towns of Blacksburg and Christiansburg. Mr. Nelson is pre-eminently fitted to this service. During his absence the Rev. T. G. Faulkner, of Salem, will give one Sunday a month, and the Rev. C. F. Smith, of Lynchburg, and the Rev. G. O. Mead, of Roanoke, will give occasional services to help along in his home field.

The Rev. Arthur P. Gray, Jr., who for several years has been rector of the churches in Brunswick and Lunenburg Counties, is the civilian chaplain at Camp Lee. Mr. Gray is a man of great energy and devotion, and will do fine work in this camp. He leaves a very large field, which no doubt the neighboring churches will look after.

Vacant Fields: This great Southwest part of the State is manifesting the need of men in the ministry. There is no resident clergyman between Bristol and Wytheville. Rev. Mr. Davidson vacating Bristol, Rev. Mr. Hobson Abingdon and Rev. Mr. Opie Saltville and Marion. The Rev. E. A. Rich ministers alone to forty mission stations along the Clinch Valley and out in Tazewell and Giles Counties. Indeed, there are twenty counties with only four resident clergymen, and this field is white unto the harvest. May we hope that these great training camps will produce, after the close of this war, many recruits for Holy Orders.

Under the auspices of the Churchman's Club, mid-day Lenten services will be held at noon in St. Michael's Church, Charleston, the Rev. John Kershaw, D. D., rector. With the exception of Holy Week, when the services will be held Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, the services this year will be held Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Following is a list of the speakers: February 19, 20, 21 and 22—The Rev. James O. T. Huntington, D. D., Order of the Holy Cross, West Park, N. Y.

February 26, 27 and 28 and March 1—The Rev. A. E. Penick, Jr., chaplain United States Army, Camp Jackson, Columbia.

March 5, 6, 7 and 8—The Rev. James Milton, D. D., rector of St. James Episcopal Church, Wilmington, N. C.

March 12, 13, 14 and 15—The Rev. Rowland Cotton Smith, rector of St. John's Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C.

March 19, 20, 21 and 22—The Rev. C. B. Wilmer, D. D., rector of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Atlanta, Ga.

March 26, 26, 27 and 28—The Right Rev. William A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of South Carolina.

ASHEVILLE.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

The growth of the Church in the District of Asheville for the past year is indicated by the statistical reports of nearly all the Parishes and missions, lately sent in to the Secretary of the District.

Trinity Church, Asheville, shows a decided growth. During the year 1917 forty-nine persons have been baptized in Trinity Parish, and sixty-seven have been confirmed. Of the latter thirty were men and boys and thirty-seven women and girls. Thirty-five communicants have been added by transfer. The total additions to the communicant list having been one hundred and two souls. The communicants of the Parish number seven hundred and fifty-seven, making Trinity numerically the largest Parish in the State of North Carolina. During the entire year, the attendance of the congregations at the morning services rarely failed to fill the church, and at the evening services have averaged over one hundred and twenty.

The financial exhibit of the Parish shows that sixty per cent of the communicants are subscribers to the support of the Parish, and within the year the subscriptions to missions have increased fourfold.

Recently a large service flag was dedicated and unfurled from the tower of the church. The flag has fifty-five stars, every branch of the service being represented.

In all of the patriotic activities in the community Trinity's members take an active and leading part.

The standing of this Parish is indicative of the influence the Episcopal Church is exerting in the communities of the Western North Carolina mountain country.

Bishop Bratton, of Mississippi, is to meet the Clergy and Laity of the District in Asheville on Sunday, February 10, in the interest of St. Mary's School.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

The Ninetieth Annual Council

The ninetieth annual Council of the Diocese of Kentucky was held at Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, on Wednesday, January 23d.

The Council of the Diocese has heretofore been held in May, and it was quite an innovation to have it held during the month of January, particularly as this happened to be the most severe weather Louisville has experienced in the memory of its oldest inhabitants. In consequence the attendance was not up to the average, but in many respects the Council was quite as interesting as many that have gone before, and quite a number of important things were accomplished.

The principal subject touched upon by the Bishop in his address to the Council was, of course, the war and the relation of the Church to the young men now in preparation for the army and who will soon be sent to France.

The Bishop also recommended that a committee be appointed to look after the securing of an Archdeacon for work in the Missionary Districts in the Diocese.

The Council immediately appointed a committee to look into the raising of funds sufficient to support a deacon and gave this committee authority to appoint the Archdeacon upon recommendation of the Bishop. The men composing the committee made it certain that the funds to support an Archdeacon will be raised immediately and consequently this important branch of the work of the Church in the Diocese will be looked after during the coming year. Considerable routine business was transacted, such as a revision of the Canons to conform to the laws of the general Church with regard to changing the fiscal year to end on December 31, also the election of vestries and such other changes as are necessarily dependent upon the change of the fiscal year.

The sessions of the Province of Sevanee are to be held in Louisville in the fall of 1919. By resolution of the Council a committee was appointed to look after the entertainment of this important Convention.

The Archbishop of York was, by resolution of the Council, invited to visit Louisville during his tour of the United States. Dean Emeritus Craik was appointed Chairman of the committee to extend this invitation.

The Council will meet again January, 1919, at Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville. On account of the officers at present representing the Diocese having served only eight months practically all of them were re-elected for the current year.

Treasurer—Mr. Isham Bridges.
Chancellor—Hon. A. E. Richards; term expires 1921.

Trustees of the Diocese, terms expiring 1920, Messrs. D. A. Keller and H. B. Lee.

Standing Committee—The Rev. L. E. Johnston, the Rev. R. L. McCready, the Rev. John S. Douglas and Messrs. R. A. Robinson, Alvah L. Terry and George P. Walton.

Ecclesiastical Court—The Rev. Messrs. H. S. Musson, F. W. Hardy, G. C. Abbott, D. C. Wright and J. M. Maxon.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod—Rev. Messrs. John S. Douglas, H. T. Musson, G. C. Abbott, J. M. Maxon, F. W. Hardy and D. C. Wright, and Messrs. John J. Saunders, R. W. Covington, R. A. Robinson and John V. Pilcher, A. E. Richards and William Key.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Change in Diocesan Secretary: The Rev. J. H. Gibbons, The Burton, Covington, Ky., rector Trinity Church and formerly Assistant Secretary of the Diocese, succeeds the Rev. George H. Harris as Secretary. Rev. Mr. Harris, owing to pressure of duties as Dean of Margaret College, and rector of St. John's, Versailles, resigned the secretaryship recently, which position he held for some years while rector of St. Peter's, Paris.

Noble Work Done for Needy of Lexington: Through the untiring labors of the Rev. Dr. Richard Wilkinson, rector of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, and the wise counsel of Dean R. K. Massie, of Christ Church Cathedral, the needy and suffering of Lexington were given seasonable relief during the recent cold spell, when coal was scarce and work stopped. Groceries and provisions were supplied, and two hundred tons of coal were distributed in suitable portions to fireless people without cost to them. In this work Dr. Wilkinson and Dean Massie were ably assisted by members of their respective congregations, leading citizens of Lexington, and members of other communities.

The work sprung out of the opening of the courthouse, which Judge Bullock had ordered on leaving his office Saturday afternoon, to afford a lodging place for any one who desired to avail themselves of such shelter through the promised cold of that night—for hundreds had no coal in their homes. Dr. Wilkinson, realizing that this was not going far enough to meet the situation, since no coal for heat meant no fire for cooking, and learning that no provision had been made for food, set to work to provide food for the needy and those gathered in the courthouse. Simultaneously, Dean Massie was organizing members of the Cathedral congregation for similar relief work at the Parish House. When this became known Dr. Wilkinson and Dean Massie united forces with the courthouse as the center. Food was provided for over Sunday, and by Monday the body of workers had greatly increased, and the work grown to proportions beyond expectation. Groceries were bought and distributed by the wholesale, but as expeditiously and as carefully as possible. The city aided by giving to the workers right of way to fill orders for coal. Schools, closed for school purposes, were opened as a sort of permanent restaurants where the hungry were fed, as was being done at the courthouse, the schools being supplied with hot soup, coffee and sandwiches from headquarters. It is conservatively estimated that three thousand people were helped between Saturday night and the following Thursday. One feature of the work was the direction given workers, that no application must be turned down, and that until the worker could more closely investigate they must trust the people to make honorable appeals.

Evidence of the great need and the willingness to help meet the need is seen in the case of Major E. B. Ellis, who entered the courthouse merely to see what was "doing." Upon seeing what was doing he gave order to "go ahead and I'll stand by you," at the same time handing Dr. Wilkinson checks with which to draw on him for whatever he needed and instructing the bank to honor the doctor's signature.

So greatly did this movement meet the emergency that permanency has been given it through the formation of the "Emergency Committee of the Associated Charities of Lexington." The committee will co-operatively relate itself to the work of the Associated Charities of the city.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

The fifth annual Convention of the Archdeaconry of Jacksonville was held in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Tallahassee, the Rev. J. H. Brown, rector, on January 17 to 20. The officers of the Convention are: The Rev. W. H. Marshall, President; the Rev. R. Z. Johnstone, Secretary; and Dr. R. E. Smith, Treasurer.

Thursday evening, January 17, Evening Prayer was said, followed by an able address by the President, the Rev. W. H. Marshall.

An enjoyable reception, with addresses by the citizens of Tallahassee, concluded Thursday's session.

There was celebration of the Holy Communion and sermon by Bishop Weed, on Friday, January 18.

At noon intercession for missions was said by the Rev. William T. Wood, after which the Woman's Auxiliary held a very interesting meeting.

On Saturday, after a celebration of the Holy Communion, a business session was held, when reports were received and routine business attended to.

On Saturday afternoon a very helpful Sunday-school session was held.

On Sunday morning the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Marshall.

In the afternoon there was a Sunday-school session, after which a service was held, the Rev. William T. Wood and the Rev. R. Z. Johnstone being the principal speakers.

Splendid addresses were also made by Miss Ada Speight, of Gainesville, and Mrs. Kate Hubbard, of Pensacola.

On Sunday night an inspiring missionary meeting was held, when there were several addresses on the work of the Church among the colored people, and on missions in general.

On Monday and Tuesday the Clergy and Lay Deputies to the Convention went over to the Council of the white Clergy and Lay Deputies and took a part in the sessions.

The Bishop expressed himself as being highly pleased with the proceedings of the Convention, and everyone present felt that much good would result from the very helpful meetings.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

The temperance people of New York, both city and State, are losing not a moment, and profess to entertain hopes of securing a legislature that will ratify the constitutional amendment. A big meeting was held in a church here on one of the Garfield holiday Mondays, chiefly to ministers, and the Church was represented by twenty or more. The Church Temperance Society was never so active as now, both State and national in its efforts. Conventions have been called for all principal cities of New York. In the coal shutdown saloons and breweries were included, due in part to the strenuous protest made by the temperance advocates, for in the initial orders schools were included but saloons were not. There is being entered upon throughout the Empire State such scrutiny of men who may be candidates for the legislature this fall, and such definite efforts to elect temperance candidates, as was never entered on before. Placards are to be conspicuously displayed giving names of States to ratify the amendment as fast as such ratification takes place.

The Rev. Dr. W. T. Manning, of Trinity Church, serving in war work at Camp Upton, on Long Island, is reported to have criticized the New York Sabbath Committee in an address delivered at the camp for its action in securing a transfer of the date of a parade of enlisted men in New York from Sunday to Monday. Dr. Manning argued in his address that American people are not seeing their enlisted men nearly as much as they ought to do, both for the good of the men and the people who are to wake up to the fact that they are in a war against Huns.

He is reported to have argued also that there could be no possible breaking of the Sabbath in such parade, properly conducted, and that people on such day have time to see the men, as they wish to do. He thought patriotic airs, played on Sunday by bands, a fitting expression of Christianity in its fight for democracy. The argument of the Sabbath Committee was that church services would be interfered with, and that Monday, a Garfield holiday, would answer as well. The committee carried its point.

At the annual service of the Church Mission of Help, held on Sexagesima Sunday in Trinity Church the Rev. Dr. Theodore Sedgewick, of Calvary Church, read the report saying that two hundred delinquent women are under the Mission's care, and that one of its workers is engaged at Camp Merritt in New Jersey, by arrangement with the Church's War Commission. Substantial progress was reported to be making, in spite of war conditions, a part of which is due to an enlarged educational plan which trains women under the committee's care to be stenographers, sales clerks, nurses and book-keepers.

Bishop Burch, who has recovered from gripe, and the Rev. Dr. John Mockridge, of Philadelphia, were the speakers. Appeal was made for volunteer workers, the present number of eleven being wholly inadequate.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Henry B. Lee, Jr., rector of St. Paul's Church, Weston, W. Va., has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Towson, Md., and will take charge on April 1.

The Rev. D. W. Reid, of Middleburg, Vt., will succeed the Rev. William H. Cumpston as religious director at the Army Y. M. C. A., Camp Sevier, S. C. Mr. Cumpston has been transferred to Camp Jackson.

The Rev. Edward S. White assumed charge of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Chicago, on February 1.

The Rev. T. M. Bacon has assumed charge of work at Clovis, New Mexico, and should be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. Henry Davies, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Easton, Md., has been elected Chairman of the War Commission Committee of the Diocese of Easton.

The Rev. Reginald T. T. Hicks has resigned as rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Wichita Falls, Texas, effective February 1.

The Rev. E. L. Malone has accepted a second call to St. Paul's Church, Columbus, Miss., and took charge on February 1.

The Rev. J. P. McComas, of Trinity Church, New York City, has been appointed chaplain of the new Seventh Infantry, New York Guard.

The Rev. Nicholas Rightor, formerly of St. Michael's Church, Savannah, has become rector of Grace Church Parish, Lake Providence, La., with charge of the missions at Tallulah and Rayville.

The Rev. James A. Weagle, of the Church of the Mediator, Philadelphia, has been elected rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, same place.

The Rev. Carl H. Williams assumed charge of Indianola and associated mission fields in Mississippi, on February 7.

The Rev. R. W. Rhames will have charge of St. Andrew's Church, Fort Scott, Kansas, in place of Ascension Church, Burlington. He still resides at Girard, as rector of St. John's Church.

Deaths.

The Rev. Franklin Babbitt, for fifty-six years rector of Grace Church, Nyack, N. Y., died on January 24. Mr. Babbitt had held only this one pastorate since his ordination to the ministry, and built the present Grace Church edifice.

Go east or go west, nature is upon the track of the wrong-doer. The time shall come when in the hour of reflection reason shall read the law, conscience shall ascend to her judgment seat, memory will furnish the testimony, remorse will be the penalty, and the sowing of sin shall receive its harvest.—Dr. Hillis.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The supreme forces are often the silent ones. A multitude of men might hack with axes at the frozen snow and ice which has been blocking traffic all over the country, and yet make pitifully slow progress. But let the weather change and the thaw comes, and the barriers simply melt and vanish of themselves.

The same is true with the stubborn obstacles in the way of the world's moral and spiritual progress. The implements of our direct and violent efforts are often useless against them. What is needed is a change in the whole temperature of human thought and will.

After this war, if the highways which would lead to a true constructive peace are to be cleared for passage, there must be added to the expedients of statesmen the immeasurable, silent influence which can come only from the warmth of great ideals which, through this time of clouds and storm, are kept aflame.

Very loftily true are these words which begin a leading article on "Making the World Safe for Democracy" in the February number of "Association Men."

When this war is over we don't want to find that we have been deceived by a camouflage of victory. Some people are saying "we must win the war" who have never stopped to consider what winning really means. They speak as if the guns alone could decide all the issues which are at stake. It is well for us to eliminate this thought once and for all even from our sub-conscious thinking. If mere military force can win this war, then Prussianism has won; it has won whether the victorious forces plant their colors in Paris or in Berlin. We fight to destroy militarism, not to enthrone it. We fight because we believe the sword cannot prove the justice of a cause, not to commit our most sacred interests to its final arbitrament. This is not simply a war of destruction—we pay too great a price to leave the world a charnel house or a heap of ruins. We tear down that we may build. The tearing down is a necessity which we deplore; the building is the task which inspires us.

Our aim in the war is the establishment of a world brotherhood. Nothing is more dangerous in this hour so fraught with fateful influence upon all succeeding generations than that we should act upon a partial view of the war's issues. He is right who to-day makes the motto of his life: "We must win this war. We must strain every nerve and mortgage every resource until it is won. But it must be won for the future as for the present. The goal is not Berlin, but a world safe for democracy."

Attractively printed on a purple-ink folder, with the Lenten Collect forming a cross on the front cover, there has been issued by the Joint Committee on Social Service this "Lenten Suggestion." Copies of it for distribution in the churches may be secured by a request to the Joint Commission, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

This is the text of it:

The Joint Commission on Social Service, true to the duty of social watchfulness committed to it, ventures to add its voice to the many enjoining strict self-discipline in the consumption of luxuries this year.

The Christian Church should be of special helpfulness to the government in this matter; for fruitful experience through the ages has accustomed it to fast and vigil. Modern thought has, to be sure, discarded the more ascetic extremes to which these customs were carried during the middle ages, and emphasizes rather the joyous truth implicit in the Incarnation: "Nor soul helps flesh more now than flesh helps soul." None the less, we are loyal at heart to the great Christian tradition, which has always stressed the need of mortifying our members that are upon the earth, for the sake of the soul's welfare. In the present crisis the old motive of personal sanctification is reinforced by the pure impulse of compassionate love. In face of the misery of a starving world, only a coarse and pagan obtuseness can claim more physical comfort than is needed to keep one fit for service. Each portion of rich food eaten at midnight restaurant or at home might have fed a hungry baby for a day. As Ruskin said, "The cruelest man living could not sit at his feast unless he sat blindfolded;" to-day, the bandage has been torn from our eyes.

To maintain personal expenditure at the same level as before the war, or carelessly to indulge in ephemeral and expensive pleasures, is not only to scout our patriotism; it is to deny our discipleship to Him who prepared for His ministry by fasting forty days. Dare we claim that our spiritual welfare can dispense with what He found helpful?

Discrimination is, of course, in order. Temporary distress will be caused by too rapid a suspension of trades which cater to the pleasures of wealth; yet with a little thought it is possible to find ways of employing people to the benefit of others rather than of oneself. Two principles of priority might well be observed: that we be slowest to withdraw patronage from trades which conserve not only the physical life but the mental and spiritual health and growth of producers as well as consumers; and that in what expenditure we allow ourselves, we select commodities of permanent value to the higher interests of the community.

Profound industrial readjustments lie inevitably ahead. The Christian conscience has a unique opportunity to regulate the consumption of life's necessities by Christian people on lines not automatic but reasonable and humane. Carefully planned personal self-control is the first step. Shall not such planning be an integral part, this year, of Lenten discipline?

A Committee of the Federal Council of Churches has organized a great movement for nation-wide advertising in favor of national prohibition. Over every advertisement is to appear an eagle as the emblem, and the words, "Strengthen America!"

To any individuals or local committees who will co-operate with the movement and secure the insertion of the material in local papers, the committee of the Federal Council will furnish free one hundred and four pieces of copy—enough, that is, for two insertions each week for a year. If important situations develop which ought to be emphasized by special advertisements, these will be prepared and sent to all users of the material.

Here, for example, is one of the advertisements:

"Food Will Win the War."

It hits you in the face wherever you go—this slogan of the Hoover campaign for food conservation—"food will win the war!"

When the Senate's Committee on Agriculture was investigating the subject of foodstuffs, the liquor men denied that they consumed as much as the prohibitionists said they did—they declared that they used only one per cent. of the grain.

All right—let's take them at their word.

One per cent. of the grain will feed one per cent. of the people. This means one million people—because there are one hundred million of us in this country.

We shall probably send one million soldiers to France.

This means that the liquor men have been wasting enough foodstuffs to feed every last man who will go to the trenches!

If food will win the war—as Hoover says—then the liquor men have a fearful responsibility resting upon them when they deliberately waste the food which would give life and strength to our soldiers.

But what about the man whose vote gives the liquor men the right to do this?

Every vote for the "drys" will help save the soldiers at the front.

Have you a boy "over there"? Is he worth saving? Then vote "dry."

If you believe that the traffic in alcohol does more harm than good—help stop it!

Strengthen America Campaign.

Manhood.

The principal effect of Christian faith upon man's moral life is to be found neither in the scruples which it induces regarding certain sins, nor in the positive duties which it enjoins, but in the transcendent value it places on personality. The New Testament is a treatise upon self-respect. The central theme around which all its harmonies are composed is the spiritual nature, the permanent continuance, the infinite value, the boundless possibility of man. The great affirmations of the Christian Gospel that God created men and loves them, that they are immortal and that God needs them to perfect His work, merge their influence in raising man's valuation of himself.—H. E. Fosdick.

Quinquagesima Sunday: The great reformation under Hezekiah, brought about through the influence of the prophets Micah and Isaiah (see Septuagesima Sunday) led up to the great deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib (Sexagesima), but this was followed, as reformations are wont to be followed, by a reaction—under Manasseh, who “did that which displeased Jehovah, according to the abominable practices of the nations whom Jehovah cast out before the Israelites and shed ‘innocent blood until he had filled Jerusalem.’ He even put to death many of the prophets (Jer. 2:30). After a short reign of two years of Amon, son of Manasseh, Josiah came to the throne, under whom took place another reformation, begun by repairing the temple, an account of which forms the Old Testament historico-topical lesson for Sunday morning. Josiah’s reign marks an important epoch in Judah’s history, and it is interesting to note the several elements that were jointly effective therein: the priests, represented by Hilkiah; the prophets, including Zephaniah, apparently great-grandson of the other reforming King (Hezekiah) Jeremiah, and Huldah; the latter a woman. We may note in passing that this “Book of the Law” is one of the storm centres of modern critical study of the Bible. It evidently coincides with the middle portion of our Book of Deuteronomy, which book represents, according to a conservative critical judgment, “the germinal truths enunciated by Moses as they unfolded in the light of the later experiences of his race and under the inspired teaching of his successors in the prophetic office.”

In the New Testament correlative lesson (John 5) our Lord traces belief or unbelief in Himself back to one’s mental attitude toward the older revelation from Moses to John the Herald, and carries into the eternal world the great principle acted on by Josiah of judgment according to the Word of God.

In this there lies an important connection with the Epistle for the day, with its teaching that love is no mere emotion but sympathy, together with the Truth of God; while Josiah’s great reformation brought about by the union of Priest and Prophet is a grim comment upon the Great Tragedy at Jerusalem towards which our Lord marches (in the Gospel), the cause of which was the antagonism of priest to prophet (cf. Malachi 4:4, 5; Matt. 11:7-19). Altogether, Josiah’s reformation seems to furnish a more inspiring Quinquagesima lesson than the present Prayer Book, one of Lamentation over the Destruction of Jerusalem, which finds place in the New Lectionary just after the event (third week Lent).

The Sunday evening lessons—Isaiah’s prophecy of our Lord’s sacrifice and St. Peter’s comments thereon—are obviously connected with the story told in the Gospel of our Lord’s journey to the fated city to act out the drama of sacrificial love. The morning Ash-Wednesday lesson, taken from the prophet whose writings come next, is Jeremiah’s appeal for true repentance against false use of Church and ritual, with which is given the story of the true penitent, the Prodigal Son. In the evening Isaiah’s description of the true fast, never more apposite than in these days of food conservation, is accompanied by our Lord’s exposition of what true fasting is in its inner essence, an expression of genuine sorrow.

C. B. WILMER.

Christ’s Inheritance.

The children of God are the inheritance of the Saviour. A child is worth more than all the cold gold and sparkling gems of the entire universe. What does Jesus care for the gold of this world? In heaven the streets are paved with it. What does He care for the diamonds of this world? In heaven the walls are studded with them. But His children, ah! they are the treasure of His heart; they are the gems of His crown. They are precious to Him, for they have been created in His own image. They bear the stamp of His eternal Spirit. They are His because He has bought them with His blood and recreated them by His Divine power. They are His. They are His inheritance.

The man with a family of good, clean, loving, happy, Christian children has a greater inheritance than has the man whose wealth is counted in billions. The parents of good children are drawing interest with every kind word and loving deed, with every mark of deference and appreciation expressed by their children. The childless miser is an object of pit.

Every sinner is a liability in the moral and spiritual economics of the universe. He is a traitor in the realm of Divine jurisdiction. He is a law-breaker in the government of the Creator.

But every faithful Christian is an asset to his Divine Lord. He is a part of his Saviour’s treasure. He is a soldier in his Master’s army; an under-shepherd of His flock. The true Christian bears the image of Christ. He talks like Him, walks like Him, acts like Him, shines like Him. True Christians are the Saviour’s medium for service. He reaches people through His people.

Christian friend, what kind of an inheritance has Jesus in you? Are you a gem with a blemish, a jewel that is tarnished; or are you a diamond sparkling with splendid consistency and an undimable lustre? How much interest does the Saviour draw from your life? Is His investment in your soul a profitable one?

Collect for Quinquagesima Sunday.

O Lord, Who hast taught us that all our doings without charity are nothing worth; send Thy Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of charity, the very bond of peace and of all virtues, without which whosoever liveth is counted dead before Thee. Grant this for Thine only Son Jesus Christ’s sake. Amen.

Collect For Ash Wednesday.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who hastest nothing that Thou hast made, and dost forgive the sins of all those who are penitent; create and make in us new and contrite hearts, that, we worthily lamenting our sins and acknowledging our wretchedness, may obtain of Thee the God of all mercy, remission and forgiveness: through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The inheritance of our Saviour is in saints.—The Evangelical Messenger.

Our Missionary God.

1. Where must we go to find the beginning of Foreign Missions? To the heart of God the Father.
2. How did God begin Foreign Missions? By sending out the first missionary.
3. From where was that missionary sent? From heaven.
4. To what foreign country did he go? To this world of ours.
5. Who was that missionary? Jesus Christ our Saviour?
6. Why did God the Father send him? “God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son.”
7. If God had lacked the spirit of Foreign Missions, what about us? We should not have had a Saviour.
8. Did this great missionary stay in the foreign country? No; he returned to His Father’s house.
9. Who gathered around Him before he returned? His disciples.
10. What did He tell these disciples to do? Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.
11. If these disciples had not obeyed, what about our America? We would not today have a knowledge of His Gospel.
12. From what church did two missionaries go a few days later? From the church at Antioch.
13. What two men did they send? Paul and Barnabas.
14. Did Paul and Barnabas not have enough impenitent heathen to preach to at home? They had tens of thousands.
15. Should not their own city be evangelized first? God commanded them to go into all the world, to the uttermost parts of the earth.
16. Did God the Holy Spirit suggest that His disciples would go? No; He commanded.
17. If we are indifferent to Foreign Missions, what do we show? Unlikeliness and disobedience to God the Father.—Mrs. W. H. Dodge, in Presbyterian of the South.

The Things I Miss.

An easy thing, O Power Divine,
To thank Thee for these gifts of Thine,
For summer's sunshine, winter's snow,
For hearts that kindle, thoughts that glow;

But when shall I attain to this?
To thank Thee for the things I miss?

For all young fancy's early gleams,
The dreamed-of-joys, that still are dreams;

Hopes unfulfilled and pleasures known
Through others' fortunes, not my own,
And blessings seen that are not given,
And ne'er will be, this side of heaven.

Had I, too, shared the joys I see,
Would there have been a heaven for me?
Could I have felt Thy presence near,
Had I possessed what I held dear?
My deepest fortune, highest bliss,
Have grown, perchance, from things I miss.

Sometimes there comes an hour of calm;
Grief turns to blessing, pain to balm;
A power that works above my will Still leads me onward, upward still;
And then my heart attains to this—
To thank Thee for the things I miss.

—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

The Second Number

(Founded on fact).

The Christmas parcel lay on the table ready for its long journey overseas to the Canadian Continent in France, and the soldier's mother stood gazing at the result of her labors.

It had not been easy to decide just what to send—there were so many circumstances to be considered in making a choice. First of all, Dick's little preferences must be consulted. The tobacco must be of his favorite brand, and the chocolates must have nuts in the center and not sticky cream. Dick never did like "soft" candies. He used to say that his taste in candies was like his taste in drinks—he had "no use for anything that wasn't hard." Taffy he liked; but then taffy was a poor traveller, apt to spread itself over the contents of the parcel and cement them into anything but a friendly alliance, so taffy was excluded. Socks, of course, had gone in, with his school colors knitted into the "cuff;" and a pipe and a book and an indelible pencil and some stationery, for Dick's last letter had been written right in the trenches on a leaf torn out of his diary. It was quite a costly parcel and it contained within it all the Christmas gifts of the family, for there was very little money to spare in the parson's household, and Margaret, too, had begged that her share might go to Dick along with the mother's and father's.

The little mother had consented, with a mental reservation as to a certain little parcel containing gloves and handkerchiefs bought months ago on the occasion of a visit to the nearest town. Margaret was always unselfish; and now she was working hard, trying to qualify for a business position while she was still only a child.

As her mother stood by the table in the sitting-room in the growing darkness, Margaret dashed in. Margaret always seemed to have a little more energy of mind and body than was absolutely necessary. Her tall strong body, her thick unruly crop of black hair, her rosy cheeks and shining eyes matched well with her quick, almost abrupt movements and ringing voice.

"Why, motherkin, what are you doing, all alone in the dark? Is that Dick's parcel? I'd better carry it to the post-office before I take off my coat. It's beginning to snow, and the wind is cutting, but I love a wind. It makes me want to shout and throw my arms about and behave generally unlike a parson's daughter." The end of the sentence was marked by a hug which enveloped the slender mother and threatened to sweep her off her feet.

When she was released and Margaret had patted down her collar and smoothed her hair, she took up the parcel and looked at it doubtfully.

"I think I'll take it myself, Margaret," she said. "I'm not quite sure that it is under the maximum weight, and I want to get a label for the address at the store."

"Oh, no! motherkin," began Margaret impetuously, "I can't let you go out in the cold; and, besides, it's getting dark. I might just as well go now, I'm already dressed."

"No, darling, I have made up my mind to take it myself. But you might ring up the post-office and find out whether it should be mailed to-night, or if to-morrow morning would be time enough." A brisk conversation over the telephone ensued. The postmaster was old and deaf and liked to keep himself informed as far as possible with regard to all the village affairs. His slowness of apprehension always exasperated Margaret; and soon her explanations were audible all over the little house.

"A parcel—not a parson—a parcel—p-a-r-c-e-l. Yes, a parcel. No! I don't think packet is a better word. You don't talk of 'packet'-post, do you? A parcel for Dick—no, 'Dick,' not 'sick'—Dick. Yes, that's right—his Christmas parcel—I want to know about the mail when does the mail close? No—nothing to do with female clothes—to-night? In half an hour? Well—you positively must hold it for Dick's parcel. You can't promise—well, don't promise, just hold that mail till mother gets to the office."

Within five minutes the mother was hurrying down the village street, hugging the heavy parcel closely to her breast as if it were a substitute for Dick himself. Breathless, at last, she stood at the post-office desk, to write the label and fill out the customs declaration.

It seemed to take a long time, for her fingers were chilled and her hand trembled; but at last it was all done, and she handed the precious parcel to the postmaster.

He took the parcel, weighed it, and handed it back with the necessary stamps; then scanned the address critically as he received it again.

"Isn't it all right?" asked the mother. The postmaster hesitated a moment; then said gruffly, "You've forgotten the second number."

"The second number?" repeated the mother. "What do you mean? I didn't know the boys had more than one number, and I've put Dick's on the label."

"But the post-office asks for two numbers on each parcel now," explained the old man. "You see they can't be sure of finding the man it's addressed to."

"Not find the man it's addressed to! Not find Dick. Why, of course, they'll find Dick if the parcel is addressed correctly. Why shouldn't they?"

The mother paused for a reply, but the old postmaster only looked at her in silence; then the color ebbed slowly from her face.

"I understand," she said, "but I shan't put any other man's number on Dick's parcel—I don't know what number to put, anyhow."

The postmaster took off his spectacles and pointed over her shoulder to some one standing behind her.

"There's her son," he said. "He's not getting much of a Christmas box." In his deafness he spoke more loudly than he intended.

The parson's wife turned quickly. Behind her stood Will Jackson's mother, holding an untidy little package in her hand, evidently awaiting her turn to receive the postmaster's attention.

Will Jackson! The boy whom she had always distrusted and whose influence upon Dick she had always feared. How sorry she had been that he had enlisted at the same time as Dick, and she had hoped that the chances of war would separate them. And now it was suggested that she should write Will's number on Dick's Christmas parcel in case they could not find Dick. Impossible! Better let those little tenderly chosen gifts go to a perfect stranger than to Will. Mrs. Jackson stepped forward. She had heard the suggestion and seen the involuntary gesture of refusal with which it was received.

"Don't you trouble about my boy," she said, bitterly. "We'll look after our own, even if we can't do so much as other people. And what's more," she added, taking a pen from the desk, "I'll be a better Christian than you, although you're a minister's wife, for I'm going to write your Dick's name on my Will's parcel."

It was lucky that Dick's mother had a sense of humor, though it sometimes betrayed her at awkward moments. With a laugh of genuine amusement she in turn took up the pen and wrote Will's name and number clearly on Dick's parcel.

"Now let us shake hands over it, Mrs. Jackson," she said. "Our boys are probably facing the same dangers to-night, and you and I ought to help one another to be as brave as they are."

"Christmas won't mean much to us this year," said Mrs. Jackson. "Will away and little Mary in her grave, and the old man so hard put to it to get the work on the farm done, even though I help all I can." She held out her hand as she spoke and the parson's wife shook it warmly. The Jacksons did not belong to her husband's church; indeed, they had been actively opposed to their work, but the sense of fellowship in distress and a breath of the Christmas spirit of goodwill overpowered all other feelings.

"Suppose you and Mr. Jackson come over and eat your Christmas dinner with us," said the parson's wife. "It will be easier for all of us if we don't have empty chairs round the table."

"After all we've said against the parson and you," began Mrs. Jackson, nervously.

"You'll be all the more welcome," said the parson's wife.

The men of the 500th Battalion of the C. E. F. had just been relieved after a grilling time in the trenches.

They had taken the hill which was their objective, and had held it against counter-attack; and now, covered with blood and mud and glory, they were taking their well-earned ease in rest billets. They had suffered severely; and the ambulances had gone down heavily laden, but the battalion was thinking more of its gains than its losses. It was something to know that there was a chance of a wash and sleep in comparatively safe and comfortable quarters with some sort of a Christmas dinner to follow. But to more than one the sweetest thought of all was the probability of a mail from home.

And a big mail there was, in truth. Sacks of it, and the sergeant in charge was throwing parcels and letters to the men gathering round him.

"Here's one for you, Bill," he called, throwing to him Mrs. Jackson's parcel, now more untidy than ever, and bearing evidences of having been patched up with fresh cord on its way from Canada.

"Haven't you got one, Sergeant?" asked Bill, as he caught the flying parcel. "Too bad. I guess yours has got left behind somehow. I don't suppose there's much in mine; mother hasn't much to send, but it's good to get something from home at Christmas."

"Sure!" replied the Sergeant briefly. As he snook he stooped to pick up the paper Bill had dropped. "Why, Bill, look here. There's my name on the parcel as well as yours. What under the sun made your mother think of me?"

"Don't ask me," replied Bill. "Anyhow, she's done it, so I guess we'll have to share up. She didn't know you'd got your sergeant's stripes. I see."

"Well, my own mother doesn't know that yet," replied Dick. "It's not a week since they dropped on me from the skies. Now then, let's share up." And sure they did, and equally in spite of the Sergeant's remonstrances, breaking in half bars of chocolate, and even drawing lots between a handkerchief and a pair of bootlaces. (And when Dick's parcel arrived in time for the New Year they shared alike again.) "It was lucky for me your mother wrote my name on your parcel, Bill," said Dick, as they sat together smoking some Canadian tobacco after an excellent Christmas dinner. "I shouldn't have had a bit of 'Christmas' from home if it hadn't been for her, but I'm blowed if I can think what made her do it; I can't make it out."

"No more can I," confessed Bill candidly, "but it's surprising how friendly people seem to be getting at home. I suppose it's the war."

"And Christmas," added Sergeant Dick.—Adelaide M. Plumtree in Canadian Churchman.

Tired.

In perfect peace wilt Thou keep him
Whose mind on Thee is stayed.
Because he trusteth in Thee, Lord,
Naught can make him afraid.

We bring our weary minds to Thee
And rest them in Thy care.
Lord wilt Thou not accept this as
Our silent evening prayer?

For "prayer's the soul's sincere desire
Unuttered or expressed,
The motion of a hidden fire
That trembles in the breast."

Too tired to think, too tired to pray,
Beset by doubt and fear;
Lord, give us Thy peace this night,
And let us feel Thee near.

Food Conservationisms.

The girl students of a fashionable school in Connecticut are reported to have taken a pledge to eliminate all candy during the scholastic year. That is heroic—for schoolgirls. It is also practical conservation and co-operative patriotism.

Food conservation should be regarded as a moral and religious as well as a patriotic measure. It involves the spiritual quite as much as the physical well-being of the people. If the church people could be brought to a simpler and saner style of living it would mean immeasurable good to the nation and all the higher interests of the world.

The pinto and other colored beans are becoming popular in the West and Middle West as a substitute for the white bean, the crop of which last year was far below normal. Colored beans are at least equal to white beans in food value and many think they surpass in flavor. Since colored beans are 35 to 40 per cent. cheaper than white, and there is a surplus of them, the eastern housewife may save money by using them.

The Food Administration is not dealing primarily with prices, but with necessities—the food necessities of the men who are fighting our battles and of the peoples behind them. We all want lower prices—but we must send the needed food or lose the war. Let us drum that fact in.

The Food Administration plans regulative measures in connection with large increases in the catches of salt-water fish and hopes to get the prices down nearly to prewar level not later than May. The meatless days and generally reduced consumption of red meats needed for export greatly increased the demand for fish, and with a reduced production due to transfer of fishermen and fishing boats to naval service, up went the prices.

If you do not like the slight measures of food substitution called for here, where will you go to find more favorable conditions? Hunting for an answer to that question ought to convert one to food conservation all right.

Not only Federal food administrators in each State, but county food administrators in addition, in order to bring the Food Administration into immediate touch with all the people, is a plan proposed for general adoption, some States having already adopted it with great success.

The Federal food administrators of the entire country came together in conference in Washington January 8 and 9 to discuss problems and plans with the members of the Food Administration at the Capital. Every State in the Union was represented, and many important matters were considered by this large and influential body of representative men.

The Question of Pictures.

The indiscriminate hanging of pictures which has been so long the vogue is much to be deplored. A picture that is intrinsically good, and bears relationship to other things of interest, can always be used, but there are many pictures used to fill up space, or because they have beautiful frames, and not because the subject is appropriate or the picture itself is good. If one has no pictures to start with, good photographs of old masters or old colored prints are interesting.

The decorative quality of a picture is enhanced by the right background, the height at which it is hung, and its juxtaposition to other pictures. A modern picture is usually out of place on an antique background, and an antique picture has not a good setting in a strictly modern room. It is, indeed, a special talent to know just how much a decorative object really decorates. To crowd the walls, even with very beautiful things, is to fall far short in artistic taste. Unless it is an exhibit where all things of a certain type or class are to be kept together, proper space should be allowed for each object, so that it may have its full decorative value.

The heightening or lowering of ceilings can be accomplished effectively by the use of picture molding. In a low-ceilinged room the picture molding should be placed within two inches of the top; in a high-ceilinged room eighteen inches to three feet is a good height.—Mrs. Van Rensselaer Schuyler in the November Good Housekeeping.

Shut In.

In the darkness and seclusion of a shadowed home or an invalid life, the finest Christian character may be developed. The lacemakers whose product is the costliest and best do not work in a glaring light. They are put, usually alone, in a darkened room, where the light of a very small window falls upon the pattern and work. They cannot see themselves or their surroundings. They see only the pattern and their effort to reproduce it. So it is with the believer. The providence that shuts one in is God's hand placing His servant where he may do the most perfect work. The pattern is illumined and the worker is obscured. The Lord increases; the worker decreases. The less of self one sees, and the more of Christ, the better it is to him. Transformation into Christ's likeness follows such a state. The conditions which shut in the believer, then, are oftentimes gracious conditions and are not to be deplored.

Who Invented Ice Cream?

Dolly Madison was famous for her beauty, grace and social charm, but, according to the Baltimore Sun, she has never been given due credit for her greatest achievement—the invention of ice cream. "Chroniclers tell us," says the Sun, "that she was the first to serve this national delicacy. She must have been a wonderful woman, gifted in everything from diplomacy to cooking. If every girl who eats a saucer of ice cream or a 'sundae,' or an ice cream soda, would put a penny in the plate to erect a monument to the inventress of ice cream, they would build a tower so tall that it would make the Washington monument look like a fence-post. While it was Dolly Madison who first made ice cream, they tell us it was the wife of a young naval officer, Nancy Johnson, who invented the ice cream freezer."

Few inventions have ever given more pleasure. The next time you go to a soda fountain drink an ice cream soda to Dolly, and the next time you eat a saucer of cream give thanks to Nancy.—Baptist Standard.

The new minister was invited out to supper. He was a bachelor, and when he helped himself to the biscuits for the third time he looked across the table to the hostess' little girl.

"I don't often have such a good supper as this, my dear," he said, in his most propitiatory tone.

"We don't either," said the little girl, smiling. "I'm awful glad you came."

For the Young Folks

When He Grows.

I wonder when it is I grow!
It's in the night, I guess,
My clothes grow on so very hard
Each morning when I dress.

Nurse says they're plenty big enough;
It's cause I am so slow.
But then she never stops to think
That children grow and grow.

I wonder when! I can't find out.
Why, I watch Tommy Pitt
In school for hours and I can't see Him grow the smallest bit.

I guess that day we stay the same.
There's so much else to do
In school and play, so I must grow
At night, I think. Don't you?

The Lesson of the Daisies.

Mary Ball.

Once upon a time there was a little girl named Catharine, and I am sorry to say that she was a very discontented little girl. Although she had everything to make her happy, she was very unhappy. She was a very pretty little girl, with beautiful brown eyes and lovely brown curls, which were thick around her head, and fell down her back in rich profusion. She was an only child, and very rich, so had everything her heart could wish for. I am afraid she was very much spoiled by her parents, who idolized her, and it grieved them very much to see her so unhappy. If she could not have what she wanted on the minute she would stamp her little feet and scream out and say, "I don't like this," or "I don't want that." Sometimes she would take her little fists and beat her nurse in the face. Was not that very naughty, as her nurse was so good and kind to her.

If any other little girl could see Catharine's play-room they would look with envious, longing eyes at the beautiful dolls and other toys. It was like a palace of playthings. When other children came to play with her she would often be very cross and rude, and would not lend them her things to play with.

One day Catharine was dressing to go driving with her nurse in her little pony carriage, when it began to rain in torrents, so that she could not go. She could go any day that she wanted, but just because it rained that day she just stamped her feet and threw herself on the floor in a rage, screaming and kicking, until her mother came in and told the nurse to put her to bed, which she did, and Catharine cried herself to sleep.

A wonderful thing happened in Catharine's life, which I am about to tell you. Catharine had always lived in a large city, and had never been to the country. She had been to the seashore in the summer, but those places were very gay, with crowds of people. Now her father and mother had gotten a lovely home in the mountains, where they were going to spend the summer. Yes, the beautiful blue mountains that seemed to be resting against the sky.

Sometimes beautiful snowy white clouds would come and rest upon them. Then again a mist or rain would hide them from sight, but it would pass off and you would see them looking as peaceful and blue as ever.

Little Catharine's summer home was on a high hill, with the blue mountains all around. There were also many other hills around, and also fields. Those hills and fields were covered with daisies, snowy white daisies, looking up to the sky with happy faces, with the beautiful sun shining down on them. Who does not love them? The children's flower!

When little Catharine saw the blue mountains she clasped her hands together, saying, "O, Mother! how lovely!" And when she saw the hills covered with daisies she said, "What are those white things?" The nurse told the little girl that those were daisies. Then Catharine ran among them clapping her little hands and saying, "How beautiful you are!" She would sit for hours and look in wonder at them. She seemed to forget to be cross when she was near them. One day as she sat there she began thinking, and she found herself saying to them, "Beautiful daisies, why is it you are always so happy, and I am never happy at home, but am always cross?" They, shaking their bright heads in the breeze, answered her, "We are happy because we are contented and love everything around us, and do not wish for what we cannot have. We love the dear old sun, who always smiles down on us, and we love the beautiful blue mountains, but we cannot go up there, as it is too high. We are content to stay in the fields and on the hills and look up at them. We love the little brook that is always laughing and singing as he passes us, but we cannot follow him to the river or the sea. We cannot be sweet like the little pink wild rose, or handsome like the rhododendron, or graceful like the lily, but we are just happy little daisies. And what makes us most happy is the pleasure we give to every one, especially children, as we are the child's own flower; they love us, and never pass us by, but always gather us and make us into chains and wreaths. They sometimes play with us all day, and sometimes we are taken to some sick person, or to some little child who cannot get out and play with us; and the joy of them is a pleasure to us. The secret of being happy is to make some one happy, and then be content with what you have, and do not wish for more. We are so happy that we always look up to the sky and thank God that He made us just happy daisies!"

Catharine grew very thoughtful, and said, "Thank you for what you have taught me. I have so much I could give away, and could do lots of things for others, but I don't!"

From that day Catharine began to improve, and she spent a lovely summer with the daisies. And when winter came and she returned home to the city she was like a different child, always ready to share with her friends her dolls and toys. At Christmas she had a lovely tree for the poor children and the joy it gave them made her the happiest child!

When she grew up she married, and she always brought her children to the daisy hills in the summer. She also built a home for poor children and their tired mothers from the city, and brought them there for a rest in the summer, among the happy daisies, whose lesson she never forgot.

A Boy Hero.

The boys and girls of the Davy Nursery and Baby Shelter of Newark, N. J., marched quickly into the dining room, where the long white tables were spread for their supper. Of course not all the fifty children who lived in the house were there. The fourteen babies, too little to come to the table, had already had their bottles of warm milk and been tucked in their cribs. But thirty-six children fill a room pretty full.

They were all seated at the table, and supper had begun when the matron saw that one of the boys was missing. "John," she said, "Richard is not here. Will you go and hunt him up?"

John—John Savage is his full name—at once left his supper. He went into room after room, and at last went into the kindergarten room on the first floor. As he opened the door a stifling smell met him; then he began to choke, and, looking round, he saw smoke coming out of the large closet in which the kindergarten material was kept.

John was frightened when he saw this, for he knew at once that the house was on fire; and his first impulse was to cry "Fire!" as loud as he could. But though John was only eight years old, he thought of the other children in the home; and he remembered—what older boys and girls do not always do—what the teachers had told him at the fire drill. So, instead of screaming and throwing all the house into a panic, John went quickly and quietly back to the dining room, tip-toed his way up to the head of the supper table, where the matron was sitting, and whispered to her about the fire.

As soon as the matron heard this she called a man from across the street, who turned in an alarm. Then the signal for the fire drill was given, and all the older children, though they hated to leave their supper, marched safely out of the building, while the nurses carried out the babies. All this was so quickly done that by the time the firemen had come all the children were gathered in a pavilion in the rear; and through it all there had not been the least bit of panic, and no one was hurt, as so often happens when people become frightened.

Now there are two especial things that John did. Though he was only eight years old, he didn't lose his head when he came face to face with danger; and he remembered what had been told him when the time came to act on it. And it was because of this, because no older person could have acted with more coolness or more wisely, that John is counted a hero.—Adele E. Thompson, in Boys and Girls.

For the Southern Churchman Your Light.

Anne R. Wayland (aged 10 years).

God made in each tiny heart
A little burning light,
To shine out in the darkness
And through the blackest night.

Try hard to keep the light burning,
Aburning bright and true,
And if you do you soon will find
How easy 'tis for you.

Gussie's Hyacinth.

Gussie Magee heard the news in school and he immediately raised his hand, saying, "I'll be one of 'em."

Hastening home to his mother, he said, "Muvver, there's a rich gentleman has sent a lot of hyacinth bulbs down to our school and the boy or gyurl as grows 'em the best is goin' to get a prize. I'm goin' ter be the boy."

"Very likely, ain't it?" said his mother.

"Very," he answered. "Where can I find a pot?"

His mother stared.

"The flower pot, I mean, muvver, to put the bulb in."

"I ain't got none," she answered, and returned to her work.

"Muvver," coaxingly, "lend me a cent until Saturday. I'll hold some one's bag and give it yer back. I must have a pot or I can't put this 'ere bulb in."

"Can't," she said, "I've no money to waste."

"You'd giv' it ter dad if 'e wanted it fer a drink."

"I'd have ter," she replied, briefly. "That's why I can't give it you. A flower pot's a luxshery."

"Luxshery or not, I'm goin' ter git it," he said, and went out, looking round with sharp eyes for a pot, but it wasn't there to see.

"I've got ter make one, I suppose," he muttered, and into the first florist's he saw he went, and tapped with his finger on the counter.

The man came out and Gussie stood there and smiled.

"Well," said the man at last, "what do you want?"

"I want a flower pot, but I can't pay fer it, so I'll run an errand fer yer," said Gussie. "Don't mind how fer it is. I want to earn that flower pot. Chink's scarce at home. I'll post yer a letter, take out a parcel—anythin' yer like—fer a cent. I'll do it twice fer a cent, and four times if ye'll giv' me the mould in."

The man smiled. "What's it for?" he asked.

"Hyacinth! Prize! Two dollars!" said Gussie.

"Right you are," said the man. "You can have a pot and welcome, just to encourage you."

"I ain't beggin'," said Gussie. "I'm strong. I'll work it out." And the man let him.

So he got his pot, put in his bulb, and began the care of that flower every day, and every night dreamt what he'd do with the prize money. It needed a lot of care, but Gussie's father came home one evening in a state that he could not see straight, and he knocked the beautiful thing over. In the morning when Gussie got up it lay there in pieces.

Gussie set his lips and forgot to whistle for some days. One day as he was passing the florist's the man stood in the doorway.

"How's the hyacinth?" he cried.

"Dead," said Gussie. "Got knocked down."

"Oh, accident?" said the man.

"Yes," Gussie answered. "Public-house accident."

The florist stood there watching Gussie's sorrowful face, then, as the boy moved to go the florist stopped him, saying, "Come in a minute. How old are you?"

"Why, d'yer want a boy?" cried Gussie. "I'm ready fer yer."

"Stop a minute," said the florist. "I'll tell you what I'll do. You deserved that prize. I'll take you on Saturdays, and give you fifty cents every Saturday for four weeks. Afterwards we'll see."

Gussie has been there now many more than four weeks, so you see, dear children, the Lord saw to it that even that which nearly broke his heart opened a door to something better.—Lutheran.

Something to Do.

Thomas Waring (aged 13 years).

"It is our life outside of our work which counts mostly for our happiness."

Have you ever heard any one use such an expression as this? "I have nothing to do." And we wonder how many of us voice such an expression.

In the days gone by, after the day's work had been completed, the family would gather around the fire and spend a quiet evening in thoughts; now the world offers too many amusements for such quiet evenings in the home. The younger set, both boys and girls, have been forced into business for one reason or another.

The working woman, as a rule, is glad for a quiet evening at home, but on the other hand some women require more exciting relaxations than the home offers. But amusement does not always afford diversion.

When we have finished the day's work if we could find some kind of labor which is entirely different from labor which we have been doing all day long, we would not hear the cry of "I want something to do." This kind of labor would furnish the needed relaxation and the realization that the time is being utilized.

Do you ever close your eyes some evenings, when seated before a cheerful blaze, and let your thoughts fly over the ocean to the battle fields of France? The mother, sister, or wife who has some one in the service knows such scenes, but the other woman who is so fortunate—no, not fortunate, so unfortunate—as to have no one in the service, does she realize the dangers, the sacrifices and the perils of these men?

Life offers too many opportunities now for doing something for others. Can we afford, can we afford to shut our eyes to such opportunities? Let us ask ourselves this question, and read the answer in our hearts.

The Ten Commandments.

After the children of Israel came out of Egypt they traveled in the wilderness for about a year and then they came to a big mountain called Sinai. One day the top of the mountain was all covered over with clouds and the lightning flashed in the clouds and the thunder roared until all the people were badly scared.

God called Moses and told him to come up to the top of the mountain. He was not afraid to go, because he knew that it was God who was speaking to him, and that He would not hurt him. For forty days and nights Moses stayed up there talking with God, and God told him a great many things. He told him a great many things that He wanted all the people to do, and He told him that He wanted him to build a tabernacle where the people could go to worship Him, like we do when we go to church.

Before God told Moses to go back down the mountain to the people, He gave him something to carry with him to help him to remember what he had been told and that he might show it to the people. What God gave him was two pieces of stone like two big slates such as you use in school. On these God had written something with His own hand. Suppose you had a letter written to you by the President of our country, you would prize it very highly and take the best care of it, so as not to lose it. What God gave Moses was the only letter He ever wrote with His own hand to anybody in this world.

This letter was not intended for Moses only, but for all the people who were at the foot of the mountain and for everybody in the world from that time to this, and for everybody that will ever live in the world.

You can find all that letter copied in the twentieth chapter of Exodus. Many of you have learned it by heart and probably all of you will learn it. We call it the Ten Commandments.

When Moses came down from the mountain he found that the people were acting very badly. They had made a calf out of gold and were calling that their god and were worshipping it. Moses was so troubled when he saw them doing this, instead of worshipping God, that he scarcely knew what he was doing, and he threw the two pieces of stone, that were called tables of stone, down on the ground, and they were both broken.

But God wanted Moses and the people and us to have this letter He had written, so He told Moses to come up to the top of the mountain again. Then he made two more tables of stone and wrote His letter on them again. Moses took them and carried them down the mountain and read the letter to the people. And he wrote them in the Bible so that we can read it.

We ought to try just as hard as we can not to break a single one of those commandments, because God gave them to us. He wants us to keep them, and He is always sorry when we break them. God loves us, and if we love Him we will try not to do anything to make Him sorry.

We ought to ask God every day to help us to keep all of His commandments, so that we will not break one of them.

If you do not know what any of these commandments mean, ask father and mother to tell you.—Presbyterian of the South.

Calvert: Died on December 23, 1917, MRS. MARY LANDON ROSSER CALVERT, widow of C. C. Calvert and daughter of J. Travis Rosser and Mary Armistead Rosser. Upperville, Va.

Wingfield: In Petersburg, Va., on February 2, 1918, in her seventy-eighth year, ANNE M. D. WINGFIELD, widow of the Rt. Rev. J. H. D. Wingfield, Missionary Bishop of Northern California.

IN MEMORIAM.

Entered into eternal life January 10, 1918, MARY ARMISTEAD MOORE MATTHEW, beloved wife of Patrick Matthew, formerly of Scotland, daughter of the late Mrs. Susan Augustus Moore Righton, and niece of Miss M. E. Moore, of Edenton. Descended from a long line of distinguished ancestors, their noblest qualities culminated and found expression in her rare and charming personality.

She was a faithful member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, and filled with honor the offices of President Bell Battery Chapter, U. D. C., Regent of the Penelope Barker Chapter, D. R., and was a member of the N. C. Colonial Dames. The many historical tablets erected in Edenton are a memorial to her, and mark her interest and love for her native town. Her memory will be cherished in the hearts of all who knew her, and she made life sweeter and fairer for all with whom she came in contact.

MRS. LANDON R. MASON.

In Memoriam.

The strife is o'er, the battle done;
The victory of life is won;
The song of triumph has begun.
Alleluia!

As they who loved her followed the bier up the aisle of Grace Church and heard the choir singing this hymn, it seemed the echo of her song of triumph as she entered the portals of heaven. It is impossible to compass in a few lines the breadth and length, the depth and height of Mrs. Mason's usefulness and character. It was the prayer of her life that God would develop and use her highest possibilities; which was abundantly answered in the varied undertakings that crowded her life. The Leper

Mission, of which she was the head, heart and brains; discharged penitentiary convicts followed up, and helped as needed; Spring Street Home for unfortunate young women, and a wide and varied field of charity.

Besides, she was a woman of unusual mental equipment and force. Though handicapped by ill health, she has been for many years a searching student of the Bible to the exclusion of other books, except the varied literature bearing on, and giving light to, the sacred pages. Unremittingly she dug deep into its treasures, revealing its jewels as found in symbols and prophecy. These notes, or writings, are carefully guarded by her family, and will some day be a revelation to Bible students.

The heart of Grace Church is throbbing with tenderest sympathy for her beloved husband, who has been the loving shepherd of this flock for a quarter of a century, and for each one of her dear children.

One Who Knew Her Well and Loved Her.

MRS. LANDON R. MASON.

In Memoriam.

Since the last meeting of Grace Church Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary there has been a sad, sad gap in its membership, January 17, 1918, MRS. LANDON R. MASON was called from her sphere of almost unparalleled usefulness in the earthly life to the blessedness of the life beyond. Whilst we deeply deplore our loss and miss her inexpressibly, we fully realize that to her the change is indeed a blessed one. Few persons walked as faithfully in the Master's footsteps as did Mrs. Mason. The sorrows and suffering of others ever touched a responsive chord in her sympathetic heart. A sympathy not expressed in mere words, but in deeds of relief and comfort, regardless of creed or race. Christ's own words, "Well done, good and faithful servant," "Inasmuch as you have done it unto Me," was doubtless her greeting in the better world.

Resolved, That we, the members of Grace Church Woman's Auxiliary, wish to express a sense of our loss and the hope that the memory of this noble Christian woman may stimulate us to live nearer to God and to all mankind.

Resolved, That this memorial be entered upon the minutes of our Auxiliary; that a copy be sent to the Southern Churchman and a copy to the bereaved family with the expression of our heartfelt sympathy.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE RICHMOND CLERICUS ON THE DEATH OF MRS. LANDON R. MASON.

Whereas, our heavenly Father in His wise providence has taken unto Himself the soul of our deceased sister, Mrs. Lucy Ambler Mason, wife of our beloved brother, Landon R. Mason, for many years a member of the Clericus:

Resolved, That the city of Richmond has lost a vital and inspiring force in all that made for the betterment of life. That the poor, the helpless and the lepers are deprived of a warm friend and advocate.

That Grace Church has lost a loyal and devoted member, one who has been a tower of strength.

That her large circle of friends will greatly miss her genial, spiritual and elevating presence.

That to our dear brother and his family we extend our tenderest sympathy, assuring him of our sincere devotion and praying that an all-loving God will abundantly bless and comfort him.

That these resolutions be spread on our minutes, and that a copy of them be sent to the Rev. Dr. Mason and also be published in the Southern Churchman.

"Every bag of V-C Fertilizer made 100 pounds of pork!"

"YOU remember in the spring, Bill, I applied V-C Fertilizer to that corn land. You were a 'Doubting Thomas.' You didn't think 'twould pay. Where no fertilizer was used, my yield was about the same as yours, but where the crop was fertilized, the yield per acre was 13 bushels more. It cost me about $3 to get those extra 13 bushels.

"Now I've turned in my hogs. Those 13 bushels of corn will make more than 100 pounds of hog meat. It's just plain business sense to convert $3 worth of fertilizer into $20 worth of pork. 50 acres of my corn land will make $1,000 more profit on hogs than was possible without V-C."

There are lots of men like Bill whose farms are under-productive because they do not replace the plant foods each crop extracts.

Others like Mr. McIver Williamson, of South Carolina, use from 1400 to 2000 pounds to the acre and not only make more corn — but make it at a much lower cost per bushel—and enrich the land as well. They convert chemicals into cash.

V-C Fertilizers contain every element needed to make both stalk and grain.

YOU WILL WRITE A LETTER LIKE THIS

I wish that I knew which one of the thousands of letters I receive would have the most weight with you, my friend. I can't quote all of them here, but I am going to ask you to read these carefully and then give me a chance to renew your health and make you write me one very much like them:

701 Barnard Street,
 Savannah, Ga., Dec. 28, 1910.
 Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C. Dear Sir: As you are aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

A. L. R. AVANT, M. D.
 Leeds, S. C., March 2, 1911.

I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder troubles, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve acidity, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.

These are not selected cases nor are the results unusual. I receive thousands like them from physicians ministers lawyers, merchants, farmers, manufacturers and every conceivable profession. I want the satisfaction of receiving such a letter from you. No matter what your complaint may be. dyspepsia, indigestion, nervous headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, or any chronic ailment that has not responded to drugs. I invite you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocket-book. If the water fails to benefit you simply say so, return the empty demijohns and I will promptly and willing refund your money—every cent. Sign below:

Shivar Spring,
 Box 64 B, Shelton, S. C.
 Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McA. Pittman.

WANTED 15,000 YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN

The Government has enlisted the aid of Draughon's College in securing 10,000 stenographers and thousands of other office assistants, making, so to speak, DRAUGHON'S a recruiting and training station for Government office assistants.

Miss Gilley, on recently completing, BY MAIL, Draughon's Bookkeeping—an eight-weeks' course—received the following from the Government:

(Copy of Telegram)

Washington, D. C.—Miss Vera Gilley, Murfreesboro, Tenn.: You are appointed bookkeeper Revenue Bureau, $1,000.00 a year. Report 234 Treasury Bldg. ROPEL, Commissioner.

Another Telegram

Washington, D. C.—Miss E. J. Laws (Draughon's), Nashville, Tenn.: You are appointed stenographer, $1,100.00 a year, Surgeon-General, War Department. Report room 506 Mills Building. NINAS, Chief Clerk.

The foregoing telegrams are worded along the line of other telegrams the Government is sending almost DAILY to Draughon students, offering them $1,000.00 to $1,200.00 a year to begin on. If you prefer a position with a business concern, Draughon will guarantee it.

$300.00 a Month

B. H. WILKINSON, Bookkeeper, Bloom Clothing Co., Lead, S. D., writes: "Draughon's Bookkeeping, which I took by mail, changed my position from clerk, at $25 a month, to bookkeeper, at $100.00 a month. Just accepted position with New York concern at $300.00 a month."

$5,000.00 a Year

W. O. PARSONS, Mgr., Equitable Life Assurance Society, Rome, Ga., writes: "On completing Draughon's Shorthand by mail, I accepted a position as stenographer, at $75.00 a month; now making $5,000.00 a year."

By the Draughon method of instruction—the method indorsed by business men—the necessary training can be taken BY MAIL just as well as at college, and at about one-sixth the cost. For rates on course BY MAIL or AT COLLEGE, write Waiting.

When will the battles end,
 Mother, O mother?
 Why must friend fight with friend?
 Brother with brother?

There is no answering,
 Daughter, my daughter;
 Now, when all tidings bring
 Tales of new slaughter!

Yes; but the God that we
 Bow to in praying;
 Is He not grieved to see
 Bloodshed and slaying?

Surely He hears the groans
 Rise from the city;
 Do not the very stones
 Cry out for pity?

Child, we must bend the knee;
 We—to our sorrow—
 Know but today, while He Knoweth tomorrow.

We in the darkness grope;
 He, that doth love us,
 Bids us still trust and hope:
 God is above us!

—Austin Dobson.

Christians might avoid much trouble and inconvenience if they would only believe what they profess—that God is able to make them happy without anything else. They imagine if such a dear friend were to die, or such and such blessings to be removed, they would be miserable; whereas, God can make them a thousand times happier without them. To mention my own case. God has been depriving me of one blessing after another, but as every one was removed, He has come in, and now, when I am a cripple and not able to move, I am happier than ever I was in my life before or ever expected to be.—Ex.

Pain and sorrow are not only salutary warnings against impurity and excess, but, when rightly borne, they uplift us in every other respect. They help us to endure "as seeing Him who is invisible," they make us yearn for unrealized ideals beyond our small moods and our vulgar comforts; they turn us from the near and the present to the distant and the future; they enable us to pass the death-doom on our mean and shivering egotisms. Take even the most innocent of all our sorrows—the aching anguish of bereavement. When they have lost those whom they have loved, has it not been to thousands simply as a golden chain between their hearts and God.—Dean

Farrar.

FOOT TROUBLES.

No Need of Them, Says Brooklyn Man, Who Has Evidently Solved a Big Problem.

According to the testimony of hundreds of people living in the southland and elsewhere, E. P. Simon, of 1589 Broadway, Brooklyn, N. Y., has successfully developed a system of shoe building having for its prime object the conquering of foot and shoe troubles. It appears that Mr. Simon's establishment has become national headquarters for people whose feet require his remarkable comfort shoe, known as the EzWear, but obtainable only of the inventor. Mr. Simon's new catalogue shows several hundred shoes that combine comfort with style at amazingly low prices and is now ready for free distribution.—Adv.

Vapo-Cresoline

For Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Asthma, Sore Throat, Coughs, Bronchitis, Colds, Catarrh.

Don't fail to use "Cresoline" for the distressing and often fatal affections for which it is recommended. It is a simple, safe, effective and drugless treatment. Vaporized Cresoline stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves Spasmodic Croup at once. In asthma it shortens the attack and insures comfortable repose. The air carrying the antiseptic vapor inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresoline relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria. Cresoline's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use. Painted and Leaded Glass

How painful it must be to a family who have perpetuated the memory of their loved ones in seeing their same style of window, same pose, same coloring, same everything, in another person's memorial window—all that they had cherished as theirs was anybody's. Why? Because intending purchasers will ask for a catalogue and, in consequence, choose a window that has probably been placed all over the country, when by writing to me they can get not only their own ideas carried out, but a new and original one and my guarantee that their window will never be duplicated.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Joy is a necessity for the best work.

"The church that welcomes not the poor shuts its king outside the door."

Humility is to each of the Christian virtues what the accompaniment is to the song.

Even blessings that have been promised, and that are sure to come, have to be waited for.—H. C. Trumbull.

Honesty is a beautiful thing to preach about, but nothing preaches it like an honest man, or a true woman.

It is a poor heart and a poorer age that cannot accept the conditions of life with some heroic readiness.—R. L. Stevenson.

"He that worketh high and wise
Nor pauseeth in His plan.
Will take the sun out of the skies
Ere freedom out of man."

The richest gifts of God cannot be imparted at once, and man must wait in patience until the inward preparation to receive them is completed.—Selected.

"The duty of physical health and the duty of spiritual purity are not two duties; they are two parts of one duty, which is living the completest life it is possible for man to live."

Many are willing to have the Almighty God over them, provided He holds Himself ready to work miracles which will save them trouble; but not

If His miracles exact trouble.—Dr. J. H. Eccleston

Thy calmness bends serene above,
My restlessness to still;
Around me flows Thy quickening life
To nerve my faltering will.
Thy presence fills my solitude;
Thy providence turns all to good.
—Samuel Longfellow.

Let us never disparage the value of sure and certain belief about truth. Whatever compensations may come in its absence and delay, it is the ultimate purpose and ambition of the human soul, until it reaches which, it can never be satisfied.—Selected.

No man knows less of inward peace than the unoccupied. A leading secret of peace is work. Our Lord restored that sort of peace which comes with occupation pursued under a sense of duty.—Canon Liddon.

It does not matter how grammatical my prayer, nor how scriptural my phrases; if I allow anything whatever to occupy a place on the throne of my heart that the Lord Jesus ought to have, my prayer shall be hindered.—Charles Inglis.

The French speak of "assisting" at church services. In order to assist, we must be prepared for public worship: not by reading the Sunday Sewer, but by prayer, Bible reading and stillness of spirit. We get from public services in the House of Prayer according to what we take to the Holy Place.

The attainment of an honorable and useful life costs sacrifice. Present pleasures must be foregone or subordinated for the sake of a central moral purpose, and this fact, which looks so simple and unimpassioned in print, in life involves a sacrificial struggle whose depth and intensity the novelists and dramatists of the race have tried in vain—adequately to describe.—H. E. Fosdick.

Mental satisfaction alone does not bring peace, if the heart remains unsatisfied. And that which satisfies the heart is beauty; that uncreated and eternal beauty of which all earthly beauty is but the shadow. Sooner or later trouble and death make havoc of temporal peace. Only one Being satisfies the affections in such sort, that the soul's peace is insured beyond risk of forfeiture.—Canon Liddon.

To those who hear Him and receive Him, there comes a peace and strength, a patience to bear, an energy to work, which is to the soul itself a perpetual surprise and joy, a hope unquenchable, a love for and a belief in fellowman that nothing can disturb, and around all, as the great element of all, a certainty of God's encircling love to us which conquers sin and welcomes sorrow, and laughs at Death and already lives in Immortality.—Phillips Brooks.

Some people dream of happiness as something that will come to them by and by, at the end of a course of toil and struggle. But the true way to find happiness is as we go on in our work. Every day has its own cup of sweetness. In every duty is a pot of hidden manna. In every sorrow is a blessing of comfort. In every burden is rolled up a gift of God. In all life Christ is with us if we are true to Him.—J. R. Miller.

We may strive by that devotion to the spiritual element in national life which even pure secularity of public methods still leaves possible, to hasten the day, which must come if Christ be what we know He is, when the idea of Jesus shall be the shaping and moving power of the Christian state; and among the happy sons of God the Son of God shall evidently reign, as the old phrase describes, "King of nations as king of saints."—Phillips Brooks.

Lent.

Welcome deare feast of Lent: who loves not thee,
He loves not Temperance, or Authoritie,
But is compos'd of passion.
The Scriptures bid us fast; the Church says now;
Give to thy Mother, what thou wouldst allow
To ev'ry corporation.

It's true, we cannot reach Christ's fortieth day;
Yet to go part of that religious way,
Is better than to rest:
We cannot reach our Saviour's puritie;
Yet we are bid, Be holy ev'n as He,
In both let's do our best.

Who goeth in the way which Christ hath gone,
Is much more sure to meet with Him, than one
That travelleth by-ways:
Perhaps my God, though He be farre before,
May turn, and take me by the hand, and more
May strengthen my decays.

Yet, Lord, instruct us to improve our fast
By starving sinne and taking such repast,
As may our faults control;
That every man may reveill at his doore,
Not in his parlour, banquetting the poore,
And among those his soul.
—George Herbert, 1593-1633.

Keep Your Head.

Emerson, you may remember, coming one night from Faneuil Hall, where a great political meeting had been held, found himself, like all the others in that audience wrought to a high pitch of emotion. His brain was on fire. For a time everything in the universe was concentrated into one burning point. As he came down the steps after the meeting and walked up the street under the stars—"the patient stars that climb each night the ancient sky," nature, he tells us, bent over him and laid her cool hand upon his brow and whispered, "Why so hot, my little man?"

The nation needs warm hearts and willing hands, but clear, cool heads. Do you remember the old colored preacher who was "raslin'" with the Lord in prayer? "Oh, Lord," he

A Lent Letter.

The motto "Look Up" will be a suitable word for our daily Lenten reminder. The trouble with many of us is that we look down. We are earthly, and not spiritual; we are material and not Christly; we keep our affections on things of the world and not on things that are heavenly. What troubles you and me, dear people, if we are conscientious, is, "the sins that do most easily beset us."

"My sins, my sins, my Saviour,
They take such hold on me;
I am not able to look up,
I cannot follow Thee."

And so in mercy Lent comes each year, when the way is dark, when our eyes are dim, when the fogs intercept our vision, when we are confused and bewildered and have lost the way, when we stumble, and grope, and are unhappy, and its note and call is, "Look up," look to the Divine Leader, look to God.

We repeat the Advent prayer so often that we forget its summons, "Let us cast away the words of darkness and let us put on the armor of light." And the Lent supplication we forget, "Create and make in us new and contrite hearts." And it all means, "Look up to Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our Faith." My loving message is, therefore, very simple. Strain the eyes of the soul, by many prayers, by many Litanies, by many tender services in the Church, by many sacraments of Communion, till you see clearly the way, and till the Holy Master is revealed as your Unfailing Friend. Keep a good Lent, for the days are gloomy and forbidding, with cruel wars and alarming rumors of war. Keep a better Lent than ever before, by making resolutions that you will not break, and by stricter obligations of denial and sacrifice; by more generous almsgiving, by more scrupulous fasting, and self-abnegation, by a more rigid rule to live through these forty days of loving privilege. Ask your rector to suggest a course of religious and helpful reading. Write out your own Lenten prayer, and carry it on your person, and use it frequently, and by these means, the obstructions and interferences with and darkenings of your spiritual vision, will gradually be removed, and you will see the path of right and holy living, and you will see Jesus Christ, your Helper, your Pattern, and your Saviour. May your Lent bring chastened joy and Easter victories.—Bishop William A. Leonard.

Hospitality.

Five or six years ago the Oregon Churchman printed this: "The story is told of a clergyman that, after preaching an interesting sermon on 'The Recognition of Friends in Heaven,' he was accosted by a hearer, who said: 'I liked that sermon and next Sunday I wish you would preach another on the recognition of people in this world. I have been attending your church three years and not five persons in the congregation have so much as bowed to me in all that time.'" The moral of this veracious tale does not require pointing. Somehow the Anglican Church has acquired a reputation of aloofness which extends to relations between individual Churchfolk. There's a reason—to be sure. Several, in fact. Some of them are very good reasons, indeed. Some people who go to church on principle do not wish to be recognized. They go there to meet God, not men, and they are well content to be let alone with their thoughts and devotions. It scatters spiritual power to be intruded upon. This point of view is splendid, but it is unusual. The tactful person will be able to recognize it, and restrain his propensity to be hospitable. Again, considerations of reverence keep some of us from greeting strangers or friends with the heartiness shown in places of worship where reverence is a subordinate idea. So also, there is among us a traditional reluctance to lay bare our spiritual experiences, and persons who specially exemplify that trait seem to feel that greeting a fellow-worshipper belongs in the forbidden class. These are a few of the excellent reasons. Then there are not a few that have nothing good to be said about them. Summed up, they all spell selfishness in some form or other. But taking only the good reasons, isn't it working them rather hard when there can be such a case as that of the hero of our story? Three years is a long time. To take our reasons again: A man who is so spiritual-minded as to wish to conserve the grace of the service can really afford to share his gift with others. He is well worth getting acquainted with. Reverence can be preserved by using proper care in demeanor; irreverence is in the manner rather than the act of greeting. And as to our spiritual diffidence, the sooner we get over much of that the better. Remember St. Paul's words, "Use hospitality."

An Embertide Prayer.

O Almighty God, Who by Thy people hast caused Thy holy religion to be acknowledged and spread, fill us all, whatever our calling, with such glowing love for Thee that boldly and untiringly we may advance Thy truth among men. Increase the laborers in Thy vineyard; give to all Thy ministers, bishops, other clergy and their flocks courage, patience and charity. Support and comfort us under all sufferings and opposition, and at last, having turned many to righteousness, receive us safe from all defilements unto Thyself; through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

"Not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Words which have perplexed many a troubled soul! Yet as we speak of them to those whose life is an unbroken walk with God, we find that, unlike ourselves, they are not troubled by them. And if we go on to ask the reason for this unclouded faith, the saints will tell us just this: that once, long ago, they, too, were perplexed; but that there came a day when they ceased to wonder at the words, and began to pray them, and that from that day the light broke upon their souls.—F. A. Ironmonger.

LENT.

It is with feelings of unwonted solemnity, almost of awe, that the Church enters upon the Lenten season in this year of grace. It is welcomed, we doubt not, by many hearts as never before, answering a longing desire or a need but half realized as the case may be. Its fitness, its timeliness, its importunateness has never been more evident. A time for heart-searching, for trying and examining ourselves to see if we are worthy to be living in these days when God is doing His strange work; for bringing every thought into judgment, every plan and scheme of living, every ambition and secret aspiration. A time for penitence, and new ideals for ourselves and new resolves. A time for bringing our weakness of soul to the Divine strength, our cares and burdens and those of a world in agony to cast them upon the Lord.

With one penitent heart, confessing our sins and the sins of our people; with one strong, importunate faith in the Living God Who is doing His own work in the world and in each life to which He can find entrance, let us pour out our hearts before Him and tell Him of our troubles, and hearken to what He shall say to our souls.

TRUTHS NEEDFUL FOR THESE TIMES.

Here is an extract from a letter of a thoughtful woman living in one of the great centers of population and influence in our country. It gives us food for thought:

"It is fearful—the failure on the part of many of our clergy to give the people what they are yearning for in these awful times. I live among people of intelligence and education who know little about religion and up to this time have cared less. But they are now trying to find their way to the Christ they have scorned all their lives. They go to these churches here and in most cases come away bewildered. Why do not the ministers at least try to help people to face the future? . . . The ministers are failing to grasp their opportunity. Can you not rouse them to the fact that people are longing for the fundamentals of the gospel?"

Our friend is in a good position to judge, and we believe her observation that there is a yearning on the part of many in these times of anxious stress for something which they have scorned before, is very true. They may or may not know that it is the Christ they are needing and groping for, but they are more or less conscious that their old anchors are not holding fast. Their easy-going confidence that "tomorrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant" is being rudely disturbed, and the foundations upon which they have built their scheme of life are proving unstable. They are perplexed, they are amazed, they are growing afraid. Life is opening up before them on a wider scale, with a larger content, with greater possibilities and responsibilities and a fuller meaning than they had recognized before. They had meant to be right and do right according to their very narrow ideas of what a man or a woman is for, and in the days of peace wherein they trusted their philosophy of materialism and individualism and self-sufficiency, with a gloss of altruism, seemed equal to all demands. But things are different now. There are tales of cruelty and of steadfastness, of mingled suffering and heroism which jar their old notions of living. There are calls for self-sacrifice and costly renunciations, insistent, persuasive, alluring, for which their habitual rules of conduct make no provision, supply no inspiration, and, indeed, afford no justification. High ideals are held before them which overtop their former aspirations, for which manhood must die and the heart of womanhood must bleed. Life has a new value now, one's own or one's loved ones, because it can be sacrificed. And just before, but hidden in the shadows, is the future pregnant with dire possibilities, of which only "the great adventure" is certain.

Or one takes a wider view and sees a world-wide cataclysm whose breaking came suddenly at an instant; a destruction of material values, a clash of material forces, involving nations in agony and ruin and threatening the very processes of civilization. Human philosophies, human ambitions and aspirations, the attainments of man's proudest culture and most confident reasoning, are locked in a death-grapple amid the throes of a bleeding world. The greatest results of human endeavor, the richest products of human genius and skill, the consummate fruits of the human brain and hand with all of nature's resources at command are consecrated to the red ravages of war, to the multiplication of human misery and the destruction of human life. Even morality assumes a strange guise, and hatred becomes almost righteous, and pity is rebuked and peace may not even be sought until the bitter price is paid which is beyond all computation.

Is there a God Whose Kingdom ruleth over all? Is there a Christ to Whom bleeding hearts and bewildered souls may flee for refuge, Whose cross and resurrection are the one source of light upon this dark chaos of human loss and failure? Is there an immortality beyond to which men may rise over their dead selves and find the lives which here they lose? Is there somewhere a wisdom, a righteousness, a redemption, which shall explain and justify and bring to an end ordained this sore travail of a sorrowful, sacrificial world? What wonder that men are asking, are longing to know the certainty of these things and are feeling their need to have a gospel preached to them which will stand the strain.

Is it true that in these times they fail to hear from the Church's pulpit anywhere the answer to their questioning, the strengthening message for their souls, in the simple, searching evangel of Jesus Christ? Was ever the gospel in its unadorned perfectness and self-evidencing power more needed than now, or more sufficient to comfort, to inspire, to illumine and to liberate the soul that receives it? Can it be that there are men bearing the commission of the Master who are so blind to the signs of the times, so slothful in bearing the King's word, that they are found preaching the old abstractions and refinements which bewilder the simple and needy and send them empty away? Are people indeed anywhere turning at last to the Church to hear of the Christ, the present, living, sympathizing, suffering Christ, and coming away unsatisfied and bewildered? Let every preacher take the question to heart, and at the foot of the Cross find both the need to which he is sent to minister and the message which he is commanded to speak.

CHANGING CONDITIONS IN SOUTH AMERICA.

From a missionary standpoint South America has been known as "The Neglected Continent." Until a comparatively recent period it was largely overlooked as a field of missionary operations. And it was because of this that it remained for so long the Unknown Continent to so many of our American people. For it is a fact that Christian missions, far more than diplomacy, or commerce, or the travels and adventures of the globe-trotter, have served to bring the distant peoples of the earth within the range of popular knowledge and have created that practical sympathy for their conditions which is fast making the whole world kin. It was Moffet and Livingstone and Mackay and Hannington who practically put South Africa on the map. There are thousands whose sole knowledge of the South Sea Islands is associated with the names of Bishop Patterson and John G. Paton. We Episcopalians know very little about Korea, but the Presbyterians know it much better than they know Canada. So the Congregationalists and Baptists and Methodists know India and the Turkish Empire far better than we; but we know quite a lot about the Philippines, and Bishop Rowe and Archdeacon Stuck had made us very familiar with Alaska long before it was discovered by Jack London and the movies. When President McKinley handed his commission to his Minister to China he wisely reminded him that every woman in the United States who gave a nickel a year to missions in China was personally interested in that country and its relations with America.

Until recently there were few to tell us about South America and her people, at least outside of her great cities. Now this is changed, for North American missionaries of many churches are at work there and are sending home real information in regard to conditions as they find them, and more interest is being taken in these southern neighbors of ours than ever before. To this result the Panama Congress of two years ago contributed very largely, while other events have notoriously tended to draw our own and these Latin-American nations more closely together and to dispel the indifference on our part and the doubt and jealousy on theirs that has too long existed.

The Rev. Samuel G. Inman, Executive Secretary of the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America, has recently spent six months in a tour through practically all these countries from Mexico to the Argentine and back. He traveled in the interest of the thirty-one missionary societies represented in this great field, that they might work with more unity of effort and correspondingly greater effect; but also with a distinct purpose of studying at first hand the present conditions, trend of thought and social developments of our great Southern Continent. He was afforded every advantage in forming his conclusions, meeting and conversing freely with leading men of various vocations and himself observing closely with a trained and sympathetic mind. In a pamphlet of nearly two hundred pages, printed for private circulation, Dr. Inman gives the results of his investigations and the impressions which he gained on this second and more extensive tour after a lapse of several years.

He finds religious conditions among the educated classes just as they have been represented heretofore. But now all classes, "having abandoned the only form of Christianity they have ever known, are fast becoming a people without religion." The laboring people, and less educated, have caught the infection of agnosticism, atheism and antagonism to all forms of religion. Socialism and anarchism are being adopted as substitutes. Believing that the Roman Church is in league with the land barons and oppressors of the poor, they are developing an intense hatred for Christianity, which they only know as presented by that Church in its most mechanical form. Since the Panama Congress the Roman Catholic Church has greatly enlarged its activities, but its forces are totally inadequate to minister to the religious needs of the population. Outside of the wealthy cities, even in the more advanced countries like Chile and Argentine, there is but one priest to from ten to twenty or more thousand people. Protestant missions are as yet only touching the great mass of ignorance and superstition here and there. In the heart of South America lies the largest boundary of unevangelized territory on the face of the globe.

This is the dark side of the picture. But Dr. Inman finds hope for better things in an increasing open-mindedness and spirit of inquiry among all classes. The world war has given a shock, not only to their economic prosperity, but to their philosophic theories and habits of thought. They are beginning to doubt their former ideals. They are studying the history and characteristics of nations which they have heretofore despised and are learning to understand the Anglo-Saxon point of view. Their antagonism to the United States and prejudice against her is breaking down. American diplomacy with its frank attitude of friendliness and our growing commercial relations are having their effect in the face of racial dislike and jealousy. They are feeling and yielding to the necessity of following the lead of their powerful sister nation and linking their destiny with hers. Political events of the past few months show this plainly. The way is opening for the extension of our influence and our ideals of civilization to this great Continent as never before, and with it comes a tremendous responsibility which should be felt by both the State and the Church.

The great needs of Latin America are evangelization and education; both, but especially the latter, being directed to the training of a native Christian leadership in civil and religious life. The success of our own mission in Brazil on this line is evidence of its possibilities. They are intelligent and sensitive peoples for the most part, who are becoming conscious of their spiritual needs as they are growing dissatisfied with their proud isolation. They possess "the largest stretch of undeveloped fertile land and mineral wealth on the globe." One can hardly doubt the truth of Dr. Inman's forecast, that "just as the most remarkable developments of the nineteenth century took place in North America, so the most wonderful developments of the twentieth century will take place in Latin America," nor question his statement that "this is the crucial hour in which to direct this development into the formation of truly Christian Nations."

THE PRESENT PRESSURE TOWARD CHRISTIAN UNITY.

By the Rev. Carroll Lund Bates.

We are all realizing more keenly every day that the present condition of affairs is a Divine reprimand for the shortcomings of which we have been guilty. A great many are taking current events into the prayer closet, and all who do, bring us the same report, namely, that the present situation is clearly God's rebuke for certain well defined social sins.

That the war is a reprimand for worldliness and for the undue emphasis that we have put on money values is too obvious to require mention. Our situation is also a rebuke for the gross selfishness of that competition that has been so large a constituent in every sphere of human life. While the world has been hungry for something that would bind it into closer unity, an evil spirit, present throughout the social body, has been making not for unity but for separation. Class versus class would be the honest analysis of the state of society that we have falsely called Christian. Capital versus labor, and labor versus capital, has too often been the real significance of what we have called Christian business. Nation versus nation has not only been the Teutonic doctrine, but, if the rest of us have not professed this doctrine with our lips, we must yet confess that it has been the doctrine upon which the most of our international relationships have been planned.

The pacifists are wrong, this war is imperatively necessary to set these wrong things right; but the pacifists are right, for these wrong conditions that the war will have to correct should never have been allowed to be. Did we not have our Christ? Did He not tell us not to do the very things that we have done? The war, then, is right in that it has become a necessity, but the war is wrong in that it should not have become a necessity.

But the most painful rebuke that our present situation visits on us is that which the war administers to Chris-tion itself. When this frightful rebuke fell upon us, it would have been a comfort to us if we could have escaped like homing pigeons, out of the general calamity, flown into the ark of the Church, and found that at least there we had shelter from the holocaust. But, alas, the wind of the same rebuke is sweeping the Church almost from its moorings. The same disease that has caused the war has infected the Church. The disease is division, and the one and sole cause of the disease is strife for prerogative. The cure for the disease is well expressed by St. Paul: "Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory. . . . Let each esteem other better than themselves. . . . Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."

This war, caused by a selfish and grossly competitive internationalism, becomes a crushing rebuke to our sadly divided and selfishly competitive denominationalism.

It is worse than useless to gloss over the facts. I heard an able Presbyterian divine argue the other day that our diverse Christian denominations were merely so many regimental flags in God's united Christian army. That statement is eloquent perhaps, but the trouble with it is, it is not genuinely true. No, the war reveals the pathetic and deplorable reality of Christian divisions, and warns us of the great danger of them. Instead of being regimental flags in one army they are altogether too much like the flags of opposing armies on a battlefield. At no time in history has it seemed a more grotesque and intolerable anomaly that the tiny village should have three or four struggling little churches. When coal bins are empty, and when a hundred hands are stretched out, each deserving to have us fill them with alms for some worthy purpose, our excuses and apologies for an unchristian division of Christianity are brushed aside by facts.

Can anything, then, be done? Well, the point is that the present situation gives us notice that something must be done. Let us grant that to do anything at all with our unhappy divisions has become so very difficult, that we probably would never have done anything but to smile at them and condone them, had not the present pressure been applied. The pressure of this war is going to compel us to do a lot of things that we would never have done unless compelled. And this is one of them. We must heal Christianity's divisions before Christianity can heal the world.

Before any task is completed it must first be begun. The writer would merely suggest how we must begin this work of healing the divisions of Christianity.

Our divisions are caused by a state of mind and, if that be true, the way to begin their elimination is to begin to substitute a better state of mind for the bad one that has obsessed all of us. "Let each esteem other better than themselves. Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." But who will claim that the divided camps of Christianity have done that? The essential spirit of division is that each denomination has been not merely persuaded of the truth of whatever item of Christian doctrine it is its peculiar province to emphasize, but that each has taken a very real "vainglory" in that; and, instead of "looking on the things of others," that is of finding and admiring what other portions of Christ's Body might have that was worth while, each denomination rather has tendered toward the cultivation of a selfish and competitive sect patriotism. This is the spirit that must be corrected before there can be any hope of doing anything further.

I would merely suggest certain paths of more charitable and appreciative thought of one another that we must pursue before anything else can be hoped for.

Take our own case first. Our assets may be said to be: the historic ministry, deep faith in the Incarnation, the historic Creeds, a real sense of sacramental values. We cannot too highly value or love all these. But we must stop having "vainglory" in these. It is this that tends to cause us through them to add to division rather than to heal it. Our vainglory in them makes them appear to our Christian neighbors to be flags of pride or of self-assertive defiance. Valuing them and loving them, let us nevertheless "look on the things of others." Let us look for some of the perhaps admirable things that they have and that we have not. One item here that these war days discover to us—our liturgical service is wonderfully sufficient for all the ordinary days. But is it quite sufficient for times whose complexion may alter overnight? Why not some really free place in our service for extemporaneous prayer? Or is not the more serious question this—why not cultivate more earnestly, both ministers and laymen, the power to express ourselves fitly and freely in extemporaneous prayer?

Every Christian Communion might thus cultivate the ability, while appreciating what it individually has, not to be unduly puffed up about what it has. Let the Baptists practice immersion, but not glory over those who do not; but rather recommend it to the rest of us by a love of it that "vaunteth not itself." Let the various communions that have not liturgical worship also "look on the things of others" by studying with prayer and reverent spirit the historic English Prayer Book, not as "the Episcopal Prayer Book," but as what it is—nineteen centuries of gleanings from the prayers and praises of history's Christian saints. Let them consider whether there may not arise some day a great hungry call for a bond to unite Christendom organically, and then let them consider whether, when that day shall come, the bond of a historic ministry, not considered as a badge of pride, but as a good thing at hand and usable, may not be the cord that shall be adequate to bind up the lamentably broken Body of Christ. Let us all take note of how the exigency of these times rebukes materialism, and cries to heaven for a renaissance of Incarnation Faith; yet creates impatience with the trivial differentia of doctrine; and let us ask whether the Apostles' Creed is not competent both to furnish the nourishing wheat of doctrine and to eliminate the chaff. Let us note that a valuation of the Sacraments means that Christianity boils down into what God means that it should be, because that is what we principally need from it, help from above, real divinely given nourishment; "I am the Bread of Life."

The road to corporate Christian unity will doubtless be long, because it is beset by so many real and practical difficulties, but if we will try, we can at least clear the ground for it by striving in some of the ways I have suggested for a better and more charitable frame of mind.

The more a Parish does for the work of Christ at large, the abler it will feel to respond to the demands for its own needs. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet and it tendeth to poverty."

THE OAK HILL SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

A Noble Charity.

William Kavenaugh Doty.

During the winter of 1915-'16, I had the good fortune to spend several months as a guest at a pleasant old farm house in the Piedmont section of Virginia. It was called Oak Hill, and lying remote there amongst the red hills of Albemarle, it had weathered the winters of more than a century and sheltered the form of many a wayfarer along life's road. This ancient dwelling, the property of Miss Nelson, whose hospitality I was to enjoy, was rambling by choice, comfortable by nature, and cumbered with the additions of several generations. It was, indeed, a sign and symbol of antebellum life, one that had arisen in the days when the Revolution was modern history, and which now wore with a seemingly grace the grey mist of tradition, the grey mantle of the years.

Here I felt the thrill of a pilgrim, returning with staff and scrip to the land of his fathers. I experienced the enthusiasm of Washington Irving when first he set foot on the shores of England; I filled my lungs deep with Virginia air; I drank in the beauty of the far-spreading hills; I loved, each savoury dish; I delighted in the Virginian form of speech and accent—in fine, I found myself at last "where I had longed to be," in the romantic land that my youth had filled with so many colors and castles.

But my interest, centered really in the life at the old house and led me to investigate everything connected with its family—consisting of Miss Selma Nelson, her two cousins, and a young lady who taught in the village school.

One Sunday afternoon I saw a number of darkies, old and young together, approach the house from every point of the compass. Some were riding, some walking, and all were chattering in a happy way. I could not imagine the cause, unless the servants here were running counter to the orthodox rules of the establishment by giving a Sunday kitchen party. Enquiry, however, disclosed the fact that it was but the gathering of "Miss Selma's Sunday-school"—already a venerable institution of forty years' standing. This was her own private charity, here set apart from the busy world outside.

Such a thing as this "Oak Hill Sunday-school for negroes," conducted by a Southern lady, at her home, and for so many years, struck me as being at once a subject of as much interest to the sociologist as to, the Churchman. This interest led me to find out whatever I could about it, and what my investigation discovered was in substance as follows:

At Christmastide, in the year 1875, Miss Selma Nelson, her sister, Miss Charlotte, and her brother, Mr. Philip W. Nelson, late of the Confederate army, and his wife, removed to Oak Hill, near Stony Point, Virginia; and so soon as the family became fairly established in the new abode, the sisters turned their attention, as a missionary labor, to the instruction of the neighborhood negroes on Sunday afternoons; thus continuing a work that Miss Charlotte M. Nelson, the founder of the school, had carried on at Cloverfields, near Cismont in the same county, during a few years preceding.

The Sunday-school was opened, as I found, in the spring of 1876; and was at first conducted in the kitchen at Oak Hill. Interest increased with the growth of the work and encouragement and assistance began to come in from people, North and South. By their own labors, and by the assistance of friends in Virginia and elsewhere, Miss Charlotte M. Nelson and Mrs. Philip W. Nelson had a room designed, built and equipped especially for the use of the school.

"Oak Hill," Albemarle County, Va.

From an early date, the chief source of aid other than money, has been the Massachusetts Auxiliary of our Church. Through Miss Harriett Caryl, then of Boston, now of Brookline, the Auxiliary became interested in the school at Oak Hill, and almost without an omission since the beginning of their contributions, boxes of useful, attractive and beautiful things have been forwarded at Christmas for the pupils. Miss Jennie McIntosh, of Boston, has been indefatigable in prompting these shipments. At one time the Sunday-school of Christ Church, Ray Ridge, Brooklyn, sent a beautiful box.

During the first years of the school at Oak Hill, Miss Charlotte Nelson and Mrs. Philip Nelson had the larger part of the work to care for. Miss Selma was away during a great portion of the year. They did practically everything then, Miss Charlotte making the warm hoods, ties and other gifts for the Christmas festival, while Mrs. Nelson's especial duty was to dress the dolls. Soon the boxes, already mentioned, were solicited at the North and have brought their annual joy ever since. After Mrs. Nelson's withdrawal on account of enfeebled health, and after the death of Miss Charlotte in 1899, Miss Selma continued the school, and has kept it up alone during the past nineteen years.

The greatest event of the year, as I was soon to discover, is the festival at Christmas. The first of these celebrations befell at the Christmas of 1876, and was held in the parlor at Oak Hill. A large decorated tree stood in the center of the room, decked with Christmas trappings. The gifts that Miss Charlotte and Mrs. Nelson had patiently made were distributed to the happy group of darkies. Thus the fashion was set, and so it has continued. I should say, however, that the merry-making and distribution of presents and prizes come not before, but immediately after, the services for the day—never to be dispensed with for any cause. The Christmas service consists of an especially prepared program of carols, recitations and any seasonable numbers that happen to suggest themselves. Afterwards, the children receive their gifts. I saw some of them on that day step forth with the grave and solemn dignity of an Indian at a peace conference; I saw others with irrepressible joy hasten after their portions of happiness with outstretched arms. For each there was a square of cake, an orange, a bag of candy, and one, or maybe two, articles from the Auxiliary box. I found a queer pleasure, but a very human one, in watching the unusual performance.

The prizes were awarded at the same time—prizes of merit. There are no competitive prizes. The upper and lower classes receive what are known as the "Catechism Prizes." To any member of the former class who can repeat that portion of the Catechism from the beginning of the Creed to the Duties is given the prize, if he do so remarkably well. The upper class members to win the prize must recite from the beginning of the Creed through to what is known as the Desire, and sometimes they even master the latter. This also must be repeated remarkably well, and it is remarkable that so many of them go through with it without an error—saying, perhaps, in pronunciation and accent. There is one other set of prizes—called "Punctuality Prizes"—awarded at this time for such promptness and regularity as may be required.

As a source of instruction, Miss Nelson assured me that the Prayer Book was the "great standby." But other means were not ignored. There were in use Scripture question books, varying from time to time, and the Church Hymnal. Music has ever been a popular and attractive feature. The pupils have the privilege of selecting the hymns themselves, in which they join with the inimitable melody of the Southern negro, and they know nearly every hymn they sing by heart.

The "baby organ" upon which the accompaniments are played came through the generosity of no less a personage than the distinguished Phillips Brooks himself. For many years he was a contributor. Among the many others who have been contributors may be mentioned Mr. Edward Hancel, formerly of Charlottesville; Mr. C. M. Armstrong, of Wayne, Pennsylvania; Mrs. Greenleaf, of Cambridge, a sister to Longfellow; the Rev. F. L. Robinson, of Clismont; and Mr. Martin, of New York, who gave liberally toward the erection of the schoolroom. It is interesting to know that he was not a member of our Church, but a Presbyterian.

The value of such an institution as the Oak Hill Sunday-school cannot well be estimated. Though many of the negroes have now drifted off to the cities, leaving the attendance not so large as formerly, still the school continues its good work with a yearly enrollment varying from fifteen to forty. The roll has included in different years from fourteen to one hundred members; these have ranged in ages from five to seventy-five; and it is not unusual to see a grandmother come in leading a small grandson. The second and third generations from the original pupils are now attending. Those who have gone forth have, in most instances, proven useful people, some as teachers, others as shopkeepers, seamstresses, artisans and mechanics.

Aside from its religious significance, the Sunday-school at Oak Hill has been of the greatest service in the elevation of the negroes of the county, morally, socially, and in an educational way. They have been taught to memorize (and have memorized many things of value); to recognize discipline; to respect the laws of God and man; and to know the proper attitude toward the white race. When I saw the workings and teachings of this institution, I was confirmed in my belief that the salvation of the negro must be worked out in the South, and by the aid and direction of Southerners. The Southerner understands the darky, he knows his peculiarities and shortcomings, and may best instruct him in becoming a better and less dependent citizen.

After forty-two years of useful work, the Oak Hill Sunday-school still continues its good offices. It is probably the oldest Sunday-school for negroes in the United States, and is one of the very few private organizations of its kind left in the country. In fact, I know of no other. Its influence for good will be a lasting memoria! to the unselfish labors of its founders.

UNION OF METHODIST CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS.

Methodist committeemen trying to bring Methodists of the United States into organic union are sitting at Savannah behind closed doors, but are expected later, to issue a statement showing results, or at least progress made, if any. There has been insistent demand on both sides that at least something definite be framed up to present to the General Conferences of the respective bodies, one in regular and one in adjourned session.

In advance of the formal statement it is understood by Methodists in general that at last an agreement has been reached concerning a disposition of the Methodist negro. This man has been in the way of union for some time. Methodist bishops, especially of the South, were regarded as conservative, and not long since were treated to a vigorous onslaught from Methodist laymen of the South, who argued for breadth and vision, good business and unity.

On what seems to be good authority it is stated that there are to be five regional conferences, four of them for whites and one for negroes. These are to be for the Northeast, the Northwest, the Southeast and the Southwest, the fifth to be general and to include negro members of Methodists, North and South. It is understood that the new name is to be the American Methodist Church.

In the hands of these regional conferences are to be placed all local legislation, and in the case of the negro one the election of Bishops, and supervision of their work. There is to be a General Conference, in which all Methodists are represented, and it is stated that administration of missions, care of aged ministers and educational work will be carried on by central bodies that act for all. The principal difficulty if adjusted, that of the negro and what to do with him, may make possible a union that is altogether the most ambitious yet brought about.

CONGREGATIONALIST CHURCH PENSIONS.

The Pilgrim Memorial Fund of $5,000,000 to be raised by Congregationalists as part of their plans for the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, will be based in its administration upon the Presbyterian Sustentation Fund, and is a rounding out of the Congregational annuity plans for ministers that was inaugurated in 1913. In this annuity plan there has been secured in five years about $250,000. Congregationalists claim that some improvements have been made by them over both the Presbyterian Fund and the Episcopal Pension plan.

It is to be wholly optional whether Congregational ministers come into the plan or not. Only ministers of this religious body may come in at all. Every minister is now being urged to join and so reap the advantage. Under this plan ministers coming in pay the premium on $100, and the Church at large that on $400, making an annuity of $500 to be gained at sixty-five years of age. A charge is to be made upon the income of the fund to help ministers whose salaries are under $1,000 a year. The amounts of the premiums are determined upon the age of the minister at entering. The whole is not a pension but an annuity plan, and is regarded as more than equal advantage to the minister receiving a small salary.

This care of their ministers is the big financial aim of the landing of the Pilgrim anniversary, brought forward by descendants of these pilgrims. The other main financial feature is the raising, if possible of the Congregational benevolences to an even $2,000,000 a year. The annuity plan for ministers allows admission up to December 31, 1921, and the new Memorial Fund is to become effective on January 1, 1922. The Rev. Dr. Herman F. Schwartz, of the Congregational Home Society, has already entered upon work in connection with this Memorial Pilgrim Fund.

Assurance: A theological student once called on Dr. Archibald Alexander, in great distress of mind, doubting whether he had been converted. The doctor said, "My young brother, you know what repentance is, what faith in Christ is. You think you once repented, and once believed. Now, don't fight your doubts; go all over it again; repent now, believe in Christ now; that's the way to have a consciousness of acceptance with God. I have to do both very often. Go to your room, and give yourself to Christ this very moment, and let doubts go. If you have not been His disciple, be one now. Don't fight the devil on his own ground. Choose the ground of Christ's righteousness and atonement and then fight him."

Church Intelligence

Meeting of the Board of Missions.

Twenty-five members were present at the regular meeting of the Board of Missions held in New York on Wednesday, February 6, 1918. The President is still absent in Liberia, and the Bishop of Washington presided in his place.

The Bishop of Kansas appeared before the Board with a carefully prepared plan for the better development of the work in his Diocese. It involved an additional appropriation of $1,540 per annum, which was granted.

A communication was received from the Synod of the Province of Sewanee in reference to the better development of the mountain work within the Province. The Board adopted a resolution assuring the Province that it will do everything possible to strengthen the Church's work among the mountain people of the South. It arranged for a deputation of not more than three persons to visit the Dioceses and districts in the Province of Sewanee, having such work.

In the absence of a Provincial Secretary in the Province of the Pacific, the Bishop of Idaho very generously offered his services in any way in which he could be used. The Board accepted his offer with great appreciation, hoping that he would be able to accept any invitations to speak within the Province in this connection.

The District of Eastern Oklahoma asked for an increase in their apportionment from $1,543 to $1,750. The Board expressed great appreciation of this generous act.

Mr. Henry Lewis Morris, for seventeen years a most valuable member of the Board, died on January 9, 1918.

Mr. George Wharton Pepper, because of the great pressure of other matters, felt obliged to present his resignation both from the Board and Executive Committee. The Board recognized the many calls upon his valuable time, and felt it necessary to relieve him from his duties on the Executive Committee, but unanimously requested him, if possible, to reconsider his resignation from the Board.

Mr. William Fellows Morgan was elected a member of the Board to succeed Mr. Morris, and was also elected to the Executive Committee to succeed Mr. Pepper.

In the absence of the President the Board felt that there should be someone to act in an executive capacity representing the Board. Mr. John W. Wood, Foreign Secretary, was unanimously requested by the Board to act in this capacity.

Word was received through the Presiding Bishop of the illness of the Bishop of Honolulu and the need for an extended leave of absence.

There is great need for Christian literature in the vernacular in the mission fields in the Orient. At the last meeting of the Board, the Rev. C. H. Patton, D. D., of the Congregational Board, and on the American Section of the Committee on Christian Literature of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference, presented this matter most fully to the members. We have, in the District of Kyoto, a missionary of exceptional ability in this line, and at the request of Bishop Tucker the Rev. Dr. Irving H. Correll was assigned to the work of translation.

The meeting adjourned to meet again in May, when two days have been assigned for the transaction of the large amount of business which demands the attention of the Board.

Meeting of the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee met at the Church Missions House on the day preceding the Board meeting.

A request was presented from the Bishop of Atlanta and the head of the La Grange Settlement, La Grange, Ga., for an appropriation of $21,500 to further develop the work of the Settlement. The mill owners are deeply interested in this work and have volunteered the land and three-fourths of the cost of the construction of the desired improvements. The Executive Committee, while appreciating the value of the work done by the Settlement, regretted exceedingly that owing to the lack of funds it could not make the desired appropriation.

Mrs. Sarah M. Peppers was appointed missionary in the District of the Philippines, under the United Offering of the Woman's Auxiliary.

Pershing Asks For Chaplains.

This cable from General Pershing, emphasizing the great value of thoroughly equipped chaplains and urging an increase in their number, is perhaps the most striking evidence that has yet been given of the significance of the chaplains.

It would seem as though this message from General Pershing ought to strike a responsive chord, which would bring applications from men of the highest type.

General Pershing's recommendation as to the number of chaplains coincides with the bill now in Congress, introduced by the Federal Council, calling for one chaplain for every twelve hundred men.

Cablegram.

To the Adjutant-General, Washington.

For the Secretary of War:

1. In the fulfillment of its duty to the nation much is expected of our army and nothing should be left undone that will help in keeping it in the highest state of efficiency. I believe the personnel of the army has never been equalled, and the conduct has been excellent, but to overcome entirely the conditions found here requires fortitude borne of great courage and lofty spiritual ideas. Counting myself responsible for the welfare of our men in every respect it is my desire to surround them with the best influence possible. In the fulfillment of this solemn trust it seems wise to request the aid of the churches at home.

2. To this end it is recommended that the number of chaplains in the army be increased for the war to an average of three per regiment, with assimilated rank of major and captain in due proportion, and that a number be assigned in order to be available for such detached duty as may be required. Men selected should be of the highest character, with reputations well established as sensible, practical, active ministers or workers accustomed to dealing with young men. They should be in vigorous health, as their services will be needed under most trying circumstances. Appointees should, of course, be subject to discharges for inefficiency like other officers of the national army.

It is my purpose to give the chaplain corps through these forces a definite and responsible status and to outline, direct and enlarge their work into co-operative and useful aid to the troops.

(Signed) PERSHING.

Annual Meeting of the American Church Building Fund Commission.

The Commission held its annual meeting on January 17 at the Church Missions House, New York City. The following officers were elected: President, the Rt. Rev. Charles Sumner Burch, D. D.; Vice-President, the Rev. Henry Anstice, D. D.; Secretary, the Rev. William W. Bellinger, D. D.; Treasurer, George Gordon King; Assistant Treasurer, E. Walter Roberts; Corresponding Secretary, the Rev. Charles L. Pardee, D. D.

The reports for the year showed seventeen loans granted, amounting to $56,000; sixty-four gifts, amounting to $27,320; and twelve grants, amounting to $8,150. In addition to these payments, that ten loans, amounting to $33,050; twelve gifts, amounting to $4,550; and thirteen grants, amounting to $10,150, had been approved for payment when the necessary papers were ready. Fifty-seven Dioceses and Districts have been aided during the year, and the list of jurisdictions to which the Commission has been of help at some time in its history now numbers ninety-six.

The report of the Treasurer showed that the Permanent Fund had been increased during the year by offerings in the sum of $2,210.93 and by legacies in the sum of $110,587.15, and that the Permanent Fund had reached the sum of $658,908.46.

During the year legislation looking toward the enlargement of the scope of the Commission's work and a wider liberalization in methods, has been enacted and further enlargement is pending final action by the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

As a matter of regular business, loans amounting to $9,050 were voted to the following Parishes and Missions: Epiphany Church, Atlanta, Ga.; St. Luke's Church, San Antonio, Tex.; St. Andrew's Church, Omaha, Nebr.; Church of the Heavenly Rest, Abilene, Tex.; and St. Matthew's Church, Chester, W. Va. Gifts amounting to $8,450 were voted to the following Parishes and Missions: St. John's Church, Crawfordsville, Ind.; St. Stephen's Church, Petersburg, Va.; St. Paul's Church, Kenbridge, Va.; Church of the Holy Communion, Liberty, N. Y.; St. John's Church, Warrington, Fla.; Chapel of the Holy Cross, Porto Alegre, Brazil; Mission Church, Park Rapids, Minn.; Mission Church, Northome, Minn.; Grace Church, Falfurrias, Tex.; St. Andrew's Church, Aberdeen, Wash.; St. Luke's Church, La Union, New Mex.; St. James Church, Sanshan, China, and Old Donation Church, Bayside, Va.

Provincial Synod, Province of the Southwest.

The fifth annual Synod met in St. Paul's Cathedral, Oklahoma City, January 22, 23 and 24. The opening sermon was by Bishop Wise, of Kansas, on Religious Education, and the rest of that day was largely spent in interesting conference on that subject, the Rev. B. T. Kemmerer and the Rev. John S. Bunting, of St. Louis, being the leaders in the discussions. On that evening the Thanksgiving service, marking the twenty-five years of Bishop Brooke's work, was held, and addresses given by the Presiding Bishop, Bishop Thurston, of Eastern Oklahoma, and the Rev. Mr. Eckel, late Provincial Secretary, who spoke instead of Dr. John W. Wood, who was detained by sickness. The next day at a luncheon, kindly addresses of good will and appreciation were made by the mayor of the city, an honored lawyer for the Chamber of Commerce and a member of the Cathedral Chapter, and some valued gifts were presented to Bishop and Mrs. Brooke. For the past year the Bishop had been trying to raise funds, in and out of the Diocese, to wipe out all debts, and though the war checked the success of this, still enough has been raised to clear several of the most valued church properties, and to endow a memorial room in All Saints' Hospital, McAlister, now in Eastern Oklahoma. This hospital was begun by Bishop Brooke in 1895.

It is expected that somewhat more will be raised before Easter and that King Hall, the house for women at the State University, will be largely freed from debt by then.

The other days of the Synod were devoted to useful planning for social service and war work at the army camps (nearly half the new army is in camps in this Province), and in planning for increased interest in missions. Useful institutes were conducted for the Woman's Auxiliary by Miss Lindley, Miss Withers and Mrs. Biller, Secretaries of the Auxiliary.

While inclement weather, fuel shortage and impeded railroad travel reduced the numbers, the Synod was fairly representative, ten Bishops, some forty Clergy and fifteen laymen attending.

The Rt. Rev. Theodore Payne Thurston, D. D., Bishop of Eastern Oklahoma, at the request of the Church War Commission and with the consent of Bishop Brooke, will be at Lawton, Oklahoma, in touch with Fort Sill and Camp Doniphan, for the next three months; and will be very glad to be of any service possible to parents of men there, and to the men themselves.

Bishop Thurston will help the chaplains in the camp, of whom there are now three, and also endeavor to strengthen the Church in the city of Lawton. His address will be care the Midland Hotel, Lawton, Okla.

Jerusalem For the Jews.

The Hebrew Christian Publication Society, which has been doing active work in enlightening the Jews of America in the truth of the Gospel, is now laboring with greater zeal than ever in view of the important changes that are expected to follow the capitulation of Jerusalem. The Allies are intent, not on the destruction of the Holy City, but in preserving it for God's chosen people. It is of greater importance now than ever before that the Jews of America should have the Gospel. This is the immediate task to which the Hebrew Christian Publication Society is addressing itself. It will welcome any co-operation on the part of Christian Americans who take an interest in the spiritual enlightenment of the Jewish race. Bishop Burch and the Rev. Dr. Van de Water are members of the Advisory Board of this Society.

Province of Washington—Work Among the Deaf.

The annual report of the Church Mission to the Deaf in the Province of Washington shows four clergymen actively at work among these lonely and oftentimes neglected folk within the Province and the adjacent Dioceses of New Jersey and West Virginia. The number of deaf reported in this territory is 13, 579, of whom 3,600 are reached and ministered to by these missionaries at forty-eight stations. Services held, 705. By the periodical visits of these clergymen not only opportunity for public worship and instruction is afforded these silent people but pastoral visiting and individual instruction is given and other ministrations as there is need and the means of supplying it. Lay readers, parish visitors and Bible Class teachers also are locally employed in the work. The mission is fostered by a Committee of the Synod of the Province, and is, of course, under the direction of the Bishops, but is largely dependent upon voluntary contributions for its support. The Secretary and Treasurer of the Society for the Promotion of Church Work Among the Deaf is the Rev. Oliver J. Whildin, 220 East Lafayette Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

A Religious Survey of the Province of the Southwest has been compiled by the Rev. Edward H. Eckel, Field Secretary of the Province and published by order of the Synod. It is replete with statistical tables and other information giving a comprehensive view of the field of the Province in its physical and social aspects, the religious forces at work therein, and the part sustained by the Episcopal Church. It shows the great need of evangelization in this as in other newer sections of our country which is not appreciated in the large centers of the East, and presents to the mind of a thoughtful Churchman many problems which it were well if we pondered over more deeply.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Change in Place of Meeting of the Annual Council.

To the Clergy and Vestries of the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

It having been found impracticable, owing to the congestion caused by war conditions, to hold the meeting of the Diocesan Council in St. Paul's Church, Newport News, I hereby change the place of meeting to St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, Va.

Acting under provision of Article II of the Constitution, I call the Council to meet in St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, Va., on Tuesday, May 28th, at 10 A. M.

(Signed) Alfred M. Randolph,
Bishop of Southern Virginia.

The Diocesan Board of Religious Education met in Lynchburg, February 5, the Rev. E. R. Carter, President, in the chair. At this quarterly meeting of the Board matters of great importance were considered, chief among them was the increase of candidates for the ministry, and the Committee on Schools and Colleges was requested to present the claims of the ministry to the institutions of learning in the Diocese.

The Committee on Summer Schools reported that the Southwest Convocational School to be held at Lynchburg in June had every indication of being a successful school.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Stuart Hall, Staunton, Va.—A Fund to Be Raised for Its Debt and for Endowment.

Friends of Stuart Hall will learn with great gratification that a number of representative gentlemen of the Dioceses of Southern Virginia and Virginia met in Staunton, on Friday and Saturday, February 8 and 9, to formulate plans for relieving the school of debt, which has been a serious drawback to its growth and usefulness, and to take further measures for enabling this old and valued institution to enlarge its sphere of influence. After full consideration of the conditions it was determined to raise as soon as possible a fund of $100,000.00, to be used for liquidating the debt on the school, for the endowment of scholarships and other necessary purposes. A committee was appointed, with Bishop William Cabell Brown as Chairman; Bishop Arthur C. Thomson, Vice-Chairman; Mr. William Meade Addison, Treasurer, and the Rev. R. C. Jett, D. D., Secretary, who are authorized to take all necessary measures for securing the desired amount.

The high standing of this old institution is well known. The Church could not afford to lose it or to have its usefulness impaired. It is felt that it must rather be set free to do in the future larger and more important work for the daughters of the Church in the South.

The Leper Mission.

In Memoriam: Our Heavenly Father having called unto Himself our beloved President, Mrs. Landon R. Mason, we, her co-workers in the Leper Mission, wish to express our admiration of her beautiful Christian character and appreciation of her unfailing charities. Dear friend all her life long to the afflicted lepers, giving of her time and her means to ameliorate the sufferings of these children of God.

"She had a tear for pity and a hand Open as day to melting charity."

She organized the Leper Mission in Virginia, and was President and Treasurer for nearly twenty years.

We extend to the bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy.

E. P. MERIWETHER,
MRS. ROBERT HARRISON,
MRS. SMOOT,
MRS. M'FADEN,
MISS ALICE LEIGH,
MISS LOU LEIGH,
MISS MAY POINDEXTER,

Announcement.

I beg to announce to all members of the Leper Mission and those interested in this good work that the Mission will be continued with Miss Evelyn Page Meriwether as President, assisted by Mrs. Robert Harrison. Some time ago Mrs. Mason chose Miss Meriwether and Mrs. Harrison to succeed her, and the Leper Mission is fortunate in having two such interested, earnest and capable women to carry on its splendid work. No more fitting memorial could be found for one who often said: "I want to be remembered in human lives and not in stone."

Lucy Randolph Mason.

Miss Meriwether's address is No. 2517 Grove Avenue, Richmond.

Soldiers', Sailors' and Marines' Club of Richmond, Virginia.

This club, maintained by the Episcopalians of Richmond, working through the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, at 505 East Grace Street, continues its useful work. Beds are provided to accommodate seventy-four persons, and provision is made for their entertainment. During Christmas an open house was provided, and nearly two thousand meals were served gratis. Many soldiers, sailors and marines from distant sections of our country were given a taste of old time Virginia hospitality, and their appreciation was heart-touching. Many of these guests, on returning to their camps or battle-ships, wrote grateful letters to the officers of the club.

The morale of these men is a beautiful tribute to the high standard of our army and navy, for they have conducted themselves with the utmost propriety.

It is with sorrow and regret that Colonel Joseph V. Bidgood, the efficient former Secretary was compelled to leave his desk from sickness, and is still confined to his room.

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew here have reason to feel proud of the work they have undertaken in contributing to the pleasure and comfort of our soldiers, sailors and marines. Though conducted by an Episcopal organization, no distinction is made between any denomination, all who wear the service uniform receive a hearty welcome.

The Bishop of the Diocese requests that all of the Clergy send in their contributions for the War Commission of the Church to Mr. Arthur Newbold, care Drexel & Company, Philadelphia. The Bishop has requested Mr. Newbold to send him a statement of the whole amount received from the Diocese of Virginia.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

The Northwestern Convocation.

The January meeting of the Northwestern Convocation was held in St. Matthias Church, Grafton, the Rev. G. Philip Jung, D. D., rector, January 22-24. The opening service was held on Tuesday evening, at which time the Convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. Jacob Brittingham, D. D., rector St. Luke's Church, Wheeling. On Wednesday morning Holy Communion was celebrated by Archdeacon Chrisman, assisted by the Dean, the Rev. H. B. Lee, Jr., rector St. Paul's Church, Weston. Business session followed immediately after. The Dean, having accepted a call to Trinity Church, Towson, Maryland, tendered his resignation, which was regretfully accepted. The Rev. Dudley Boogher, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Parkersburg, was elected Dean to fill the unexpired term, and the Rev. J. H. Garner, rector Trinity Church, Moundsville, Secretary, to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Boogher. The Rev. R. E. L. Strider, rector St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, read the Convocation Essay, taking for his subject "The Church, the Ministry and the New Age."

At the missionary service of the Convocation, Archdeacon Chrisman showed by charts and statistics the Church's progress in West Virginia, and made an earnest plea that laymen be used to a greater extent in the Church's work.

The Rev. Mr. Lee then made a brief address, presenting the need for men to meet the wonderful opportunities before the Church in this present world crisis.

The Rev. J. T. Carter, of Christ Church, Clarksburg, was chosen Convocation preacher for the September meeting, Archdeacon W. P. Chrisman being alternate. Archdeacon B. M. Spurr was chosen essayist, and the Rev. S. S. Moore, D. D., alternate.

The September meeting of Convocation will be held in St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling.

The hearty thanks of the members of Convocation were given the rector and friends of St. Matthias' Church for their kind entertainment, and the very satisfactory arrangements for services and business sessions.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop

St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, the Rev. A. B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector Mid-day Lenten services will be held every day from 12:20 to 12:50. Following is a list of the speakers:

February 14 and 15—Rev. Robert Johnston, D. D., Philadelphia.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop

St. Stephen's Church, Goldsboro, was the scene of an impressive ceremony on the morning of Sexagesima Sunday, when the Bishop of the Diocese instituted the Rev. J. H. Gibbons, Jr., as the rector of the Parish. A national flag was recently dedicated and placed in the choir of this church, and a service flag with twenty-two names has been presented by the Guild.

St. Paul's Church, Wilmington, celebrated its fifty-ninth Parish Day on St. Paul's Day. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion in the morning, and Evening Prayer was said with intercessory prayers for those engaged in war work in the afternoon. The missionary play, "The Light-Bearers," which was to have been given in the evening by the Junior Auxillary, had to be postponed to the following Wednesday.

Good reports have been coming in from the various Parishes concerning the offering made on Septuagesima for the Church War Commission. At St. James, Wilmington, whose rector, the Rev. W. H. Milton, is a member of the Commission, the offering amounted to $1,200.00.

The Rev. J. N. Bynum, who for the past several months has been in charge of St. Philip's Church, Southport, and has been doing religious work at Fort Caswell, is in charge of St. John's Church, Wilmington, for the month of February, after which he expects to take up work as a Y. M. C. A. Secretary in one of the camps.

Mr. Frank D. Dean, M. D., a postulant for Holy Orders in this Diocese, who has been studying at the Virginia Theological Seminary, is temporarily in charge of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Wilmington.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop

The Rev. C. P. Willcox has accepted a call to St. James Church, Cedartown, Ga., and will move there about the first of March. He will be succeeded at St. Saviour's Chapel, Raleigh, by the Rev. C. C. Kelsey, of Belhaven, N. C. A Raleigh paper says this with reference to the departure of Mr. Willcox:

"The Rev. C. P. Willcox's regret at leaving Raleigh is reciprocated by all his Raleigh acquaintances. He is the type of man that any community should prize as a citizen. He has practiced Christianity as faithfully as he has preached it. The result is that he is loved by his parishioners as men are seldom loved by those among whom they move and live."

The Rev. Bertram E. Brown, of Tarboro, has been granted a three months' leave by his congregation, and has taken up work in the army with the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Brown will be greatly missed at Tarboro. In addition to a large congregation, he kept up eleven flourishing missions in the country near Tarboro, surrounding himself with a most faithful band of laymen, who assisted him in his work.

The Rev. Henry O. Nash, now at Southern Pines, N. C., has taken work under the War Commission, and will be stationed at Camp Green, near Charlotte.

An Every Member Canvass was held recently in St. Mary's Church, High Point, the Rev. Thomas L. Trott, rector. The Rev. W. W. Way, of Salisbury, preached at both services on Sunday, and on Monday evening a congregational meeting was held, when addresses were made by the Rev. John L. Jackson, of Charlotte; the Rev. Theo. Andrews, of Lexington; Professor W. R. Brown, of Greensboro, and several of the vestrymen.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of St. Paul's Parish, Bloomsburg, was celebrated during the week beginning January 20 and ending with St. Paul's Day, January 25. All the living former rectors, with the exception of the Rev. John Hewitt, were present. They were the Rev. Messrs. David N. Kirkby, Rowland S. Nichols and James W. Diggles. Services were held daily. Bishop Darlington not being well and unable to be present on the evening of the 23, Bishop Talbot administered confirmation. The Rev. Rowland S. Nichols, now a chaplain in Camp Upton on Long Island, preached on the evening of the 24, in place of Bishop Darlington, on the work of a chaplain in the army. The celebration closed with a historical sermon by the Rev. Mr. Kirkby on St. Paul's Day. This was followed by a luncheon in the parish house, when addresses of congratulations were made by several ministers of the town, one layman, Dr. Waller, at the head of the State Normal School in Bloomsburg, and by several of the visiting Clergy of the Diocese.

In the one hundred and twenty-five years of its history this parish has had twenty rectors in succession. It has been a record of constant progress. Its present "plant," consisting of church building, parish house and rectory, is among the finest in the Diocese.

The present rector, the Rev. Frederick O. Musser, became rector in 1912. He is also Archdeacon of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The annual men's dinner of Trinity Church, Pottsville, the Rev. Howard W. Diller, rector, was held on Thursday evening, February 7. There were nearly three hundred men present, including men from a dozen Schuylkill County towns. The Rev. Dr. James F. Powers, rector emeritus, made the invocation, and the rector made a short address. Interesting addresses were made by the Rev. S. Ezra Neikirk, rector of St. James Church, Pittston; Mr. William R. Butler, of Mauch Chunk, and Bishop Talbot. Short speeches from the floor were made by Captain Reese and Major Moore, of the national army, who were home from Camp Hancock, Augusta, Ga.

The Schuylkill County Clericus met at Ashland on Monday, February 4th, as the guests of the Rev. Robert M. Kline, of St. John's Church.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop

Services at Cathedral: Two special services of interest have been held recently at the Cathedral in Lexington. The Feast of Lights, for the members of the Junior Auxiliary, held in the Parish House by the Cathedral Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, with appropriate exercises followed by games. The service was made deeply impressive by the interpretation of the feast by Mrs. John Scott, with the aid of candles.

The second service, held in the church, commemorated the capture of Jerusalem, the Rev. Dr. Richard Wilkinson preaching the sermon. At his request Bishop Burton set forth a special service for the occasion "appropriate to the thankfulness that should fill our hearts because the city of the Great King is at last in Christian hands."

Church Services Affected: Cold weather, scarce coal and low pressure of gas have greatly affected church services in this Diocese. Several of the Bishop's appointments have been postponed by request of the congregations, on account of travelling conditions and the difficulty of making church buildings comfortable. In several places, for like reasons, services have been cancelled or held in private houses, Sunday-school being held in church rectories, where this was possible. With the moderation of the weather these conditions have been relieved somewhat.

The Daughters of the King celebrated their thirty-first anniversary at the home of Mrs. C. Ramager, Lexington. Reports from the President and the Treasurer showed their work to be in a flourishing condition, both as to growth and finance. The organization presented the church with a set of handsome chancel rail cushions. Mrs. Ramager and her assistant, Mrs. Holmes, served refreshments.

At St. Andrew's Colored Church, Lexington, Bishop Burton dedicated an American flag, the gift of Captain Fred Herschler. Judge Lyman Chalkley, of the Law Department, University of Kentucky, Acting Lay Reader at St. Andrew's, presented the flag. Miss Curry Breckinridge spoke on the Work of the Red Cross, telling of her thrilling experience at the French front.

Interest in St. Andrew's Church is spreading, through Judge Chalkley, to the members of his "University Bible Class" (mostly students in his University Law Department), which meets Sundays at the Cathedral Parish House.

The class is raising funds for purchasing necessary articles for the church.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop

The United Lenten Services for the Church in the City of Grand Rapids are to be held in Grace Church this year. They are held on Wednesday evenings, and the several Episcopal churches unite with the congregation in joining in the services.

The speakers for these Wednesday night meetings will be as follows:

Ash Wednesday—The Rev. Howard R. White, of South Bend, Indiana.

February 20—The Rev. Francis R. Godolphin, Oak Park, Ill.

February 27—The Very Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, Fond du Lac, Wis.

March 6—The Rev. R. H. Chalmers, Tiffin, Ohio.

March 13—The Rev. Dr. George Gunnell, D. D., Toledo, Ohio.

March 20—The Rev. W. H. Poole, Jackson, Michigan.

March 27—The Rev. Walter F. Tunks, Muskegon, Michigan.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

A Day of Devotion and Conference: The Clergy of the Diocese came together at Trinity Cathedral and Trinity House, Newark, on February 4, on invitation of the Bishops for a Day of Devotion and Conference. About seventy-five were present, a very good number in view of the absences on duty, the detentions on the railways and the number of Clergy in the government service. Bishop Stearly had charge of the devotional service and the morning addresses, speaking of the importance of the personal character of the minister, his proper message and his work of ministration. In the afternoon the address was made by Bishop Lines, concerning the special duty of the Clergy and the Parishes toward the soldiers and the military camps; the influence of the war upon religion; the recruiting of the ministry from among the soldiers whose minds may turn to a desire to take up religious work.

Farewell Dinner For the Rev. S. E. Sweet: On January 30, three hundred people came together at Jersey City for a farewell dinner for the Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, who has resigned St. Stephen's to accept the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Columbus, Ohio. It was a very remarkable gathering; a great testimony to the regard in which Mr. Sweet is held. Brief addresses were made by the two Bishops, Judge Tennant, the Rev. Dr. Stoddard and others.

Clergy in War Service: The Rev. B. P. Tyler, Church of the Redeemer, Morristown, has been granted three months' absence to take services at Camp Merritt. The Rev. Carl Stridsberg has sailed for France for the Y. M. C. A. service. The Rev. C. W. Popham and the Rev. E. L. Cook are in service at Camp Dix. The Rev. Mr. Mabry, as chaplain in the regular army, is in France. Several other clergymen are expecting soon to be away in similar service.

The Rev. William O. Leslie, Jr., has entered upon the rectorship of Holy Cross Church, Jersey City.

The Diocesan Church Club met on the evening of February 4. Addresses were made on "Our Duty Towards the Colored People" by the Rev. Dr. Patton and Mr. William J. Scheffelin.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

New York's Lenten noon-day services will be cut in half this season by the fuel shortage. St. Bartholomew's and some other churches give up their meetings altogether, and there is disposition to unite on Trinity down town and Grace Church at Tenth Street. The coal situation on week days and Sundays improves hardly at all, and many churches of all religious bodies are using chapels, cutting out week night meetings, and uniting with their neighbors for Sunday evenings. The Wednesday night Lenten meetings are also given up in numbers of instances.

The Archbishop of York begins at Trinity Church on March 3 and remains one week. Bishop Greer has named a committee to welcome him, with Dean Robbins as its chairman. The Bishop has also issued an appeal to Parishes to save fuel as far as possible by union services. Washington's birthday meetings are planned at Trinity Church by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, one a celebration at eight o'clock and the other a war meeting at eleven, with Bishop Perry and the Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, of Philadelphia, as speakers.

Special Service for Enlisted Men: To five hundred sailors and soldiers in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on the Sunday next before Lent, attending a service specially arranged for them, the Rev. Dr. Karl Reiland, of St. George's Church, rapped the Christian churches of New York, and charged that they do not stand for the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

"We have a great deal of Churchianity," he told them, "but very little Christianity. And until churches get Christianity they will not play a great part in winning this war, and in rebuilding the world after you men have made rebuilding possible."

There were present at the service General R. A. Mann, of the Seventy-seventh Division of the national army, with his staff, and a Camp Upton platoon of two hundred and fifty men. There were also present about the same number of sailors on leave from ships in the harbor, and from the naval reserve. The service was in great part musical, the address of the Rev. Dr. Reiland being more in the nature of a welcome to enlisted men, to accompany the music, than a sermon of formal length.

There were shown in the Cathedral yesterday for the first time some flags loaned by Dr. Cronin, and one of them with some historic interest. They made an excellent display on the west or temporary wall of the crossing, and were mainly the flags of the Allies, but the American flag, holding the place of honor, was one that floated from the Eiffel tower in Paris, when that tower was dedicated nearly twenty years ago.

Lenten Preachers at Trinity Church: A distinguished list of preachers at the mid-day services in Trinity Church during Lent, which opens next Wednesday, is announced.

February 25 to March 1 are the only dates not already filled. This is due to the fact that the Rev. Fr. Figgis, C. R., of Mirfield, England, gave up the trip to this country after being shipwrecked shortly after sailing from the other side last week.

A cable message has been received by the Rev. Dr. Manning of the torpedoing of the British vessel on which the Rev. Fr. Figgis was a passenger. Fr. Figgis is a member of the Community of the Resurrection, an English clerical order.

February 13-15—Dean Robbins, Cathedral St. John the Divine.

February 18-21—Archbishop Worrell, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

February 22—(Brotherhood of St. Andrew Service.)

February 25 to March 1—Rev. Theodore Sedgwick, of Calvary Church, New York City.

March 4-8—The Rt. Hon. and Most Reverend, the Archbishop of York.

March 11-15—The Rev. Fr. Officer, O. H. C.

March 18-22—The Rev. H. P. Silver, chaplain United States Military Academy.

March 25—The Rev. Dr. Barry, St. Mary the Virgin.

March 26—The Bishop of New York.

March 27—The Suffragan-Bishop of New York.

March 28—(Maundy Thursday) the rector of Trinity Church.

March 29—(Good Friday) the Archbishop of York.

On Sunday, February 17, the preacher at the eleven o'clock service will be the Most Rev. Clarendon Lamb Worrell, D. D., D. C. L., Archbishop and Metropolitan, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

For the War Commission: As the fruit of a house to house canvas, conducted by thirty young men of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York, the collection for the Church's War Commission was brought up to $1,018.80.

What is wrong with so many of our lives is the sense of futility and unproductiveness, the failure to see that it matters or counts for anything. There is nothing like a deepening of real religion for correcting the feeling and conviction of futility and inconsequence. Consecration to the highest things brings the joy of fruitfulness into a life which may have seemed insignificant and barren before. We may be obscure and small, but we stand for what is dear to God, and this is to have life made a worthy thing. It is the great redemption from insignificance.—Thos. Yates.

Personal Notes

The Rev. John Letcher Showell, of St. Anne's parish, Essex county, Va., has recently declined a call to Spring Hill and Stepney parishes, Quantico, Md., Diocese of Easton, his native Diocese.

The Philadelphia Divinity School recently notified the Board of Missions that it had taken pleasure in conferring the degree of S. T. D. on the Rev. A. A. Gilman, President of Boone University, Wuchang, China, and the Rev. L. B. Ridgely, Dean of All Saints' Divinity School, Hankow, China.

The Rev. Dr. George Gordon Smeade, Archdeacon of Mississippi, will spend one week of each month at Camp Shelby. He has just been invited by the authorities of the Southeastern Department of the Y. M. C. A. to speak at Camp McClellan for a week, beginning Monday, February 11th.

The Rev. R. D. Roller, D. D., rector of St. John's Church, Charleston, W. Va., for thirty years, has resigned. Dr. Roller has been elected rector emeritus and will continue to reside in Charleston.

The Rev. P. N. McDonald, rector of Trinity Church, Moundsville, W. Va., has accepted work with the Army Y. M. C. A.

The Rev. P. S. Atkins, of Morrisville, Pa., has been called to St. Matthew's Church, Sunbury, Pa.

The Rev. James H. Clarke, D. D., of Sistersville, W. V., has received a unanimous call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Ravenna, Ohio.

The Rev. B. J. Osborne, of Calvary Church, New York City, who was ordained deacon about six months ago, has been accepted for service in the aviation corps for flying duty.

The Rev. Robert Nelson Spencer entered upon his duties as rector of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Kansas City, Mo., on January 27.

The Rev. Raymond S. Brown, first assistant at Calvary Church, New York City, has been serving as chaplain in France for several months.

Recompense.

If all my years were summer
Could I know
What my Lord means by His
"White as snow"?
If all my days were sunny
Could I say,
"In His fair land He'll wipe
All tears away"?
If I were never weary
Could I keep
Close to my heart,
"He giveth His beloved sleep"?

Were no graves mine
Might I not come to deem
The life eternal but a baseless dream?
My winter, yea, my tears, my weariness,
Even my graves may be
His way to bless:
I call them ill, but surely that can be Nothing but good
That shows my Lord to me!

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The General War-Time Commission of the Churches, of which Dr. Robert E. Speer is Chairman, and Bishop Lawrence is Vice-Chairman, has issued a bulletin on "How the Churches at Home Can Help to Prepare the Young Men of the Next Draft for the Life and Work in the Training Camps," which contains so many valuable suggestions that we reproduce it here in full:

I. Enthusiasm. Enthusiasm is a large part of the morale so vital to the work of successful soldiers. Young men should be led to adopt high ideals of service for the country and the world. The spirit of self-sacrifice should be made attractive. Idealism should be developed. Every young man should be brought to see the high and unselfish purposes which have led America into the war and be prepared to keep these ideals ever in the midst of his instruction as a soldier.

II. Instruction. Definite help ought to be given.

1. As to the care of the body, hygiene, etc.

2. In the care of the mind and its development in preparation for military life. In American history. They should read sane articles on the war, military life, etc.

3. Spiritual life. They should be made to realize the importance of the right kind of daily habits, the reasonableness even in military camps of daily Bible reading and prayer, including a man's fearless kneeling down and saying his prayers in barracks each night. The carrying and using of the Bible ought to be made as normal as the wearing of a uniform and carrying of a rifle.

III. Warning. The camp dangers should be presented to the young men in a clear, strong fashion. The life in camp is abnormal and the atmosphere is something different from anything they have breathed before. There is military authority to be reckoned with and adjustment to be secured. Young men ought to understand this before they go.

IV. Inspiration. Every young man has in him some measure of leadership, but in each community there are natural leaders who have not been adequately drawn out. They will be given rare opportunities in camp. Why not inspire young men with unselfish ambition to lead before they go to camp? Any young man who has led a Bible class or been successful in social or athletic activity and has elements of leadership ought to be quickened to use those natural gifts for a high, moral, patriotic and religious service to his fellows.

V. These four things might be provided in the following ways:

1. Regular instruction in young men's Bible classes might touch upon these points.

2. Special addresses might be given by the pastors, army officers, doctors, business men or specialists, at church services, especially evening services, and at men's dinners, men's clubs, etc.

3. A course of six or ten lessons held on week nights might be given embodying some of the points.

4. Special reading courses might be prepared and books circulated.

5. Right literature on the war should be gathered and distributed.

6. There might be organized in the church, or at least in the community some form of club of drafted men for social fellowship, mutual help, etc.

3. The churches could do such things as the following:

(1) Conduct conferences in various sections of the community for six or eight weeks, to which all of the drafted men in the vicinity could be personally invited. At these conferences a regular course of subjects might be presented, such as, for example:

"Why America is at War." "What is the Significance of the Selective Draft?" "The Marks of a Good Soldier." "How to Get Ready for the Training Camp." "What is a Camp Like?" "What to Avoid When One Gets to Camp." "The Compensations of Military Training." "Religion and the War." "The Soldier's Place in the New World Order After the War."

These conference sessions ought to have careful leadership. While each should be opened by competent speakers, military, educational or professional, there should be a leadership which will conduct a discussion and draw from the young men their problems and needs in the way of information. They should be more than a series of lectures or talks.

(2) Special addresses might be given at regular church services, mid-week meetings, men's clubs, men's Bible classes, etc.

(3) A carefully prepared and tactfully promoted effort might be made to interest the young men in the regular daily use of the New Testament, or the Prayer Book or Religious Manual of their own denomination. Thousands of young men might enter camps with a previous acquaintance with and love for the Scriptures, and with Testaments in their pockets, thus anticipating the efforts of the chaplains and Association Secretaries in the camps.

(4) Weekly lessons in a carefully arranged plan of study, with selected readings from standard handbooks, special pamphlets such as that in preparation by Rev. Frank Wade Smith, of the Methodist Sunday-school Board, might be conducted in the different sections of the community, in which the effort should be made to definitely enroll every drafted man.

(5) An organized effort might be made, along the lines of the "Cleveland Plan" now in preparation, to interview every one of the drafted men, using for this purpose, wise, reliable, representative laymen. These young men could be met in small groups, at convenient times and places. An evening given to a group of six to ten, would have tremendous meaning to the young men, and prepare for the more intensive work of the conference and classes.

(6) Special pamphlets on Personal Hygiene, Athletics, Bible Study, Military History, Military Organization, etc., should be circulated freely.

III. In the Community.

1. The daily papers might have a series of articles day by day, or weekly, on the Personal Preparedness of the Coming Soldier.

2. Mass meetings in public halls, with addresses of an inspiring character, mass singing of patriotic songs, military bands, all designed to arouse the latent enthusiasm and zeal of the coming soldier, and make him eager to get at his big task, and get thoroughly ready to do it well.

3. The public libraries might set apart a section, with attractive bulletins, war posters, etc., to be devoted to patriotic and military books. A short reading course might be arranged, printed in pamphlet form and distributed widely.

4. The motion picture theatres might be interested to put on each week during the preparation period, the very best patriotic and war films, with screen bulletins calling attention to preparedness by the coming army.

5. The school boards might arrange examinations in certain subjects and offer prizes or certificates of merit on these examinations. They might also have special night classes in our military history, war aims, conversational French, first aid, personal hygiene, etc.

IV. Available Literature.

1. The war has produced a mass of books, stories, special articles, manuals and pamphlets. For the purposes we are considering a careful selection should be made by experts at Washington, who have access to documents published at government expense, but not yet in general circulation.

2. The Fosdick Commission, the War Council of the Young Men's Christian Association, the American Library Association and the American Red Cross have produced pamphlets on some of the subjects which should be considered and made a part of the course of training.

3. Among the widely used pamphlets and typical of others are the following: Friend or Enemy, Dr. Exner, Association Press.

Fight for Character, President King. Ten cents. Association Press.

Rational Sex Life, Dr. Exner. Ten cents. Association Press.

Life's Clinic, Dr. Exner. Ten cents. Association Press.

"The Red, White and Blue" series published by Committee on Public Information, Washington. Free.

"The War Information" series, Washington. Free.

"Reading Course for Citizen Soldiers, Government Bulletin No. 9."

First Sunday in Lent: When the American Revisers of the English Lectionary in 1790 (I believe) discarded the ancient plan of leading up to the redemption from Egyptian bondage on Easter by the preceding history and substituted prophetic passages for use on the Sundays and week days of Lent, they were guided by a true instinct in giving large place to the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. What the New Lectionary aims to accomplish is to combine the two methods of treating Lent, the historical and the prophetic. Thus, in Lent of year I, we have given the experience of Israel in Egypt, leading up naturally to their deliverance on Easter, accompanied by prophetic passages in the evening; and this second year we give the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel in their true historical connection, viz., the experience of Judah in getting first into and then out of Exile. The Sunday morning lesson is the prophet's prediction of the Seventy Years' captivity of God's people for their sins, together with the prediction also that Babylon itself, their conqueror, should be punished for its sins (cf. Isaiah 10). Thus the captivity had a limit and meant discipline; and God's righteous wrath is but the punitive aspect of His love. For the second lesson we have ventured to seize on the spiritual meaning of Babylon as worked out in a chapter of Revelation, viz., a worldly and corrupt Church, in combination with worldly power itself, to be followed by the victory of the Lamb.

(Note: This chapter may be objected to on grounds of delicacy, but it is extremely important in its teachings and to the spiritual meaning of Babylon ought to be brought out.)

Amongst the writings that belong in the historical course for Lent is the book of Daniel; but for lack of space we have allowed it to overflow into the evening topical course, where the first chapter, the story of the three young men who stuck to the "simple life" in diet admirably illustrates the thought of the collect and the experience of the Master fasting in the wilderness (Gospel). The second lesson is keyed to the Gospel story rather than to the first lesson. Having Himself suffered being tempted, our Lord is able to succour them that are tempted. It is, however, not a bad correlative for the Daniel story; and as giving in condensed form the whole story of the Christ from His Birth up to and inclusive of His final triumph, "crowned with glory and honour," it gives the key note of Lent. It is only as we have fellowship with the suffering Christ (cf. Phil. 3:10, 11) and look forward to sharing in His triumph that we can "keep Lent" to the fullest advantage.

For the week days we have given in the evening the Epistle of St. James for its practical teachings, especially on temptation; and in the morning we begin St. Luke's life of our Lord, starting just after the Temptation and going straight on through Lent to the Resurrection on Easter.

Home Lessons on the Life of Our Lord.

Many parents live too far from a Sunday school to send their children regularly. Some parents feel their own responsibility for the religious training of their children cannot be adequately fulfilled by sending them to Sunday school. Some of these would teach them at home; but have not convenient material for lessons.

One help is offered here for a few weeks in a study of our Lord's Life in outline. Not too much is attempted; only what may be accomplished with a reference Bible (Oxford, preferred) and a Prayer Book as text books. Yet even this may bring definite and real information with reasonable study and effort.

In giving scriptural references for written answers, the pupil's ideas are sought, and more than mere memorizing gained. At first it will be best for the answers to be written in class under the teacher's instructions. If written beforehand, these must be corrected by the pupils during the teacher's class instructions. Then they are to be memorized and recited to secure permanent results. To all this regular reviews given here at intervals will help. The questions vary in difficulty; for home classes of brothers and sisters contain always pupils of various ages. The teacher will select appropriate questions or supplement them for each one. Indeed these brief lessons ought to be enlarged and developed in interesting details in the actual instruction. The information is furnished here. The teacher is expected to furnish the enthusiasm and persuasion and be guide along this life-journey of our Blessed Lord.

Collect for First Sunday in Lent.

O Lord, who for our sake didst fast forty days and forty nights; give us grace to use such abstinence, that our flesh being subdued to the Spirit, we may ever obey Thy godly motions in righteousness and true holiness, to Thy honor and glory, who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God. World without end. Amen.

8. Tell the meaning of this Name and of Immanuel. Matt. 1:21 and 23.

9. What does His Name show He can do for you? 1 Tim. 1:15.

Lenten Stepping-Stones.

1. Examine yourself carefully before deciding how you will keep Lent this year. View the question from all angles. The forty days mean much to you and you will garner untold spiritual benefits if you will use them rightly.

2. Have a Definite Plan. Pledge yourself to attend certain public services, to give so many minutes daily to private devotion, to read so many chapters of the Holy Bible, of other devotional books, to put aside so much money each day for your Easter offering. Abstain from such articles of food, give up such habits as hinder you in your search for God's grace.

3. "Be of Good Courage." "Therefore endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." Adhere to your pledges cheerfully and with persistence. Ignore all attempts from within or without to tempt you into giving up the observance of the great fast.

Place your feet firmly on these stepping-stones and you will cross the troubled stream of Lent dry-shod and enter into the glorious land of Eastertide with spirit renewed and in closer union with your Redeemer—Jesus Christ.—Selected.

Patient with others, but strict with myself;
Loving to give, and refusing all self;
Doing the right, though it brings me no fame;
Honoring Christ, because signed with His Name;
Helping the downcast, and cheering the sad;
Living our creed till it makes the world glad;
Fond of our work, of our friends, of our land;
Walking by faith, daily led by God's hand;
This is the pathway the saints all have trod,
This is the life hid with Christ's life in God.

The Lenten Call.

"Come ye apart into a desert place and rest awhile."

"Come ye apart and rest awhile,"

What tender words, and soothing!

Oh, traveler telling o'er the hill,

What care and fret removing!

The foxes live, the lilies blow

Safe in the Father's keeping,

Come, leave thy burden, rest awhile,

Thou, more than they, He's seeking.

The desert glows with God's repose,

God's spirit broods caressing,

The very clod is sweet with God,

In rest and prayer is blessing.

Then leave the things of time awhile,

Come, rest in fullest measure,

In times apart th' Eternal God

Reveals His richest treasure.

Awhile in peace His presence feel,

Then, rested, lift thy burden,

And hearten them that toil with thee,

In this lies half thy guerdon.

That task of thine is God-bestowed,

Thy laboring is praying,

God's messenger of Christ should go

To prodigals astraying!

Rest! Rest awhile. In peace refreshed,

Then work, more Christ-like, for thy rest.

On Keeping Lent—a Good Illustration.

On the day after Ash Wednesday, as the Old Parson was returning from a sick call, his trolley car stopped at the door of the city's principal theatre, while a crowd of people, coming from its doors at the close of the matinee, got aboard. Into the seat beside him came a young woman, her eyes dancing with happiness, a happiness which did not fade when she saw by whom she was sitting. At her greeting he turned to find in her the daughter of his Junior Warden and one of his best Sunday-school teachers.

"Oh, Doctor," she said, "I have just had the most wonderful afternoon. You know Galli Curci has been singing here today. It is such a rare thing that we have good music in a town of this size and I am so glad I could go."

The Old Parson's face had a not unkindly sternness upon it, and he said nothing. The girl's smile fled at the lack of his responsiveness and she seemed for a moment puzzled. Then she said, "Oh, I suppose you think it's wrong to go because it's Lent. Well, Doctor, I don't. If it were just a question of going to the movies, or something one could go to any time, I should not have gone. But this is exceptional."

"You mean it is exceptionally enjoyable, I suppose," said the Old Parson. "You are willing to give up a little enjoyment for the sake of keeping this holy season, but not a great deal of enjoyment. Have you ever thought, my child, that it was not a little thing, but the joy and glory of Heaven itself, that the Lord gave up for you. I imagine there are arch-angels in Heaven who can sing even better than Galli Curci, yet Jesus forsook their music and heard instead the jeers of the mob on Calvary, because he cared a great deal about you."

The young woman was silent for a while and so was he. Then he commenced to see an increasing resentment burning in her reddening cheeks.

"That's not fair of you," she said. "I think I do love our Lord, but I can't believe that He wants me to deny myself the beauties and the glories of life for Him. I think Lent is a piece of un-Christian foolishness. I think it's a survival of a medieval misconception of life. Why should God want to punish me or have me punish myself? Is it not service that He wants rather than this sort of spiritual self-laceration?"

"You must not get excited about this thing, Miss Anderson," said the Old Parson, kindly. "The trouble with some of you young moderns is that you get a half truth and imagine that you have the whole truth. You have said that what Christ wants is service. You are absolutely correct in that. Nothing else can take the place of it. A Lent, for instance, which consisted in giving things up just for the sake of giving them up would not please God, because it would be such a silly thing. Almighty God does not like silliness, even holy silliness. But I think you have forgotten something that goes with the service. Where did you brother John spend his vacation last summer?"

"At Plattsburg, of course," said the girl. "You know that. He was in the training camp."

"Yes, I know it," said the Old Parson, "but I thought you might have forgotten. I suppose they were under rather severe discipline there, were they not? Or did they perhaps do just as they felt like while they were there?"

"Yes, indeed," said the girl, "the discipline was very strict; it had to be, you know, because there was so much for the boys to learn about the service of their country."

"Yes," said the Old Parson. "Before I took orders I served in the army and I know all about that. Did you ever hear of the Church being called 'the Church Militant'? I suppose you were brought up on 'Onward, Christian Soldiers' and 'The Son of God Goes Forth to War,' 'Fight the Good Fight,' and 'Am I a Soldier of the Cross?'"

The girl said nothing and he went on.

"Rightly looked at, Lent is an annual training camp for soldiers, the soldiers of the Lord. These soldiers have to fight in the world all the time and Lent is a time when they go apart for special discipline and extraordinary study and spiritual refurbishment of their armor and replenishment of munitions of war so that during the rest of the year they can fight the better. Lent is a Plattsburg Camp for Christian souls."

"Now a man who goes into training for the army is not allowed to pick and choose which regulations of the training camp he will keep and which he will neglect. He gets his orders from those in charge of the army and he keeps them whether he likes them or not. If the orders say he shall eat army rations and nothing else, he eats army rations and nothing else, even though he may have a great dislike for beans, which, in my day at least, formed the principal part of the diet. If there is a lecture on tactics going on he is present, and if the camp is supposed to be drilling he is at drill. If Galli Curci gave a concert in Plattsburg and orders had been given for the men in training to stay in camp, do you think your brother would have been at the concert?"

"Especially this year, my daughter, it would seem to me that the Army of God ought to be glad to go into training. This year the whole world is on a great strain. The possible destruction of modern civilization is what we are facing. The need of a stern, virile, trained and determined Christianity is immensely great at this time. Considering our national situation, Lent comes at a peculiarly fortunate time."

"The world is marshaling its armies. Surely God wishes to marshal His army. I do not believe you have realized the situation. I am afraid you have not heard what those who have ears to hear are hearing the loud trumpet call of God. I am afraid you are making the same mistake which England made in the early years of the war. I am afraid you are saying this Lent 'Business as usual.' Do you know that you have gone two blocks past your street?"

The girl looked at him very seriously. "Do you know, Dr. Jones," said the girl, "that you have spoiled all the pleasure of my afternoon?" And then she smiled a little as she rose. "And the strangest part of it is that I am very grateful to you for having done so"—Mission Herald.

Christmas Packets Bring Great Joy to Our Fighting Men on Land and Sea.

The American Red Cross gave out, approximately, one million Christmas packets to members of the United States Army and Navy. No soldier or sailor spending the Great Holiday in any of the big camps or cantonments in this country, or in service abroad, was overlooked. Such men as were fortunate enough to go home on leave had their Christmas celebration with family or friends. There were many such. The Red Cross Santa Claus naturally left them off his list.

Captain O. P. Jackson, Chief of Staff to the Commander-in-Chief of the Atlantic Fleet, sent this message to the War Council of the American Red Cross:

"The men of the Fleet send New Year's greeting to the Red Cross, and thanks for Christmas gifts received this date."

"The Commander-in-Chief desires to add his appreciation of the excellent work of your organization, and to thank you for the Christmas gifts which cannot help but add to the determination of every one in the service to do his utmost to protect those at home by bringing this war to a successful conclusion."

General Pershing, commanding the United States' forces in France, and Admiral Sims, in command of the American fleet in European waters, expressed the appreciation of their soldiers and sailors for the work and devotion of the Red Cross women.

General Pershing sent this cablegram:

"Please express to women of American Red Cross sincere thanks of all ranks for Christmas greetings. The love and confidence of our women will make us all better men and better soldiers, and hold us firm in courage and determination to win."

Admiral Sims' message was:

"Officers and men of the United States naval forces operating in European waters deeply appreciate cordial message of love and sympathy from the women of the American Red Cross."

The message and the senders are alike an inspiration to the Navy."

Red Cross Christmas gifts were not confined to American soldiers exclusively. There were wounded soldiers in Italy who were remembered, as well as in France. In many places they were the only Christmas presents received. One wounded poilu said: "I do not know what we would have done for Christmas if it had not been for the Red Cross."

In the American camps in France each company assembled on the morning of Christmas day in its own barracks, and Red Cross workers gave out bags and presents to every man, amid cheers. The men were delighted with contents of Christmas bags. One soldier said:

"I'll bet it was a bunch of mothers who made up these bags. There's everything a fellow needs but does not know enough to buy."

The camps were filled Christmas day with men carrying Red Cross bags on their arms and smoking the first cigarettes they had had for days. Gramophones and records given companies by Red Cross were surrounded all day by crowds of singing and dancing soldiers. In hospitals the first present the sick soldiers saw on Christmas morning was Red Cross Christmas bags, which the nurses had tied to the beds after the men were asleep. The soldiers were awakened by singing of corals by nurses and in the afternoon there was a Christmas tree for every ward. The contents kept boys cheerful all day long. One said:

"The Red Cross was the best Santa Claus ever came to me."

At one great Christmas tree celebration a French Poilu in regular uniform with white cotton beard acted as Santa Claus and gave out Red Cross bags to our men. He said:

"My pack is small, for I am on my way to the trenches, but I bring you each a Red Cross bag in the bottom of my sack. I have a great present which I shall come back and give you next year—that is, VICTORY."—Red Cross Bulletin.

America in France.

Take them, O beautiful France,

Close to your generous breast;

Keep them, my dear dead sons,

Honored, beloved, at rest.

Under your glorious flag,

Under your red, white and blue,

Near to your gallant boys,

Bury my laddies, too.

France, there are tears in our heart;

Bravely we bite back our pain,

Proudly we try to smile

Over our children slain;

Over the soldiers we bore,

Over our bravest and best,

Over our loved and lost—

Lo, we will stand the test!

Sister and comrade and friend,

Lift up your heart and your head;

Mothers of men are we,

Mothers of noble dead!

Liberty, Justice and Right;

These are the price of their blood,

Shed on your sacred soil—

Glorious, gallant flood!

Steadfast, I come to your aid,

Steadfast, I stand by your side,

There where our heroes fell,

There where our great sons did.

Take them, then beautiful France,

Close to your generous breast;

Keep them, my dear dead boys,

Honored, beloved, at rest.

How the Workingman Can Help Food Conservation.

Among the most difficult people to reach on the question of substitution are the men who are doing hard, outdoor work. They, and usually their wives with them, insist that the workingman must have his meat three times a day.

Talk of calories and proteins is idle when a man not used to thinking along certain lines is thoroughly convinced that meat is a necessity at his every meal. This attitude is not confined to the workingman by any means, but it is especially important to him to be converted because of the saving to his pocketbook when all meats are so high.

Wherever possible, then, he is to be persuaded to give a fair trial to a new kind of luncheon, using, instead of his customary bread and meat, sandwiches made from rye bread and baked beans, and from rye or bran bread and peanut butter. Bought in large quantities, the peanut butter is the cheapest food at our command, for one tablespoon of it is equal in nourishment to an ordinary slice of meat. Though hearty, it is not so bulky as meat, and so the beans, also high in nourishment, and perhaps more satisfying to the stomach accustomed to meat, are good to use at the same time. Then, too, they are easy to cook, and that must be thought of, for the average wife of a workingman has not time to prepare "fussy" dishes.

If the man is full of doubt, let him start by taking one or two more sandwiches with him than he has been in the habit of having. When once he has found by actual trial that science is correct, and that certain other foods are fully as sustaining as meat, he is ready to take his place behind the Food Administration as a saver of meat.—M. B. Grose.

Dr. Chester's Errand.

It was a bright September morning, and Dr. Chester, a bit of a frown on his face, stood on the steps of Dorton Inn.

"I came here where I did not know a solitary individual for a much-needed rest. I want a long ride through the hills just by myself. I do not wish to talk or exert myself in any way," he was saying to himself.

"I wish that boy had kept out of my sight, for I am sure that he needs help in some way. And I know very well that I shall have no peace of mind unless I invite him to go with me and see if I cannot do something for him. Why I should flatter myself that every Tom, Dick and Harry I run up against needs my special counsel is more than I see. But the poor boy looks wretchedly discouraged—he's in a hole of some sort. I know—and it behooves you, Richard Chester, to help him out if you can. So here goes!"

The boy in question, a lad of sixteen or eighteen, stood at the further end of the piazza, his whole attitude one of boneless discouragement and indifference. The doctor walked briskly over to him.

"Good morning!" he said cheerfully. "You seem to be alone here and so am I. I'm off for a long ride in my car over the hills this glorious morning; will you not go with me?"

The boy's face brightened instantly. "There's nothing I should like better, for I did not know what to do with myself. I'm not quite up to tramping and time hangs heavy on my hands. But—wouldn't I bother you? I'm not very good company."

"Possibly you will not find an old codger like me a very jolly companion," was the laughing reply.

"I will risk it if you will," replied the boy, as he sprang into the car.

It was indeed a glorious day, and the doctor drew in long whiffs of the invigorating mountain air.

"Such a day as this makes life seem worth living, does it not?" he said presently.

The young fellow's face clouded instantly.

"If you are making a success of life, it may," he answered, "but if everything has gone wrong, it makes one feel like giving up the struggle."

"But you see, my young friend, I do not believe in giving up the struggle under any circumstances. Tell me about your troubles—if you will, perhaps I can help you," said the doctor in such a sympathetic tone that the boy's eyes grew misty.

"I have wanted—ever since I was a little shaver—to be a big doctor. I have worked hard for it and I hoped to enter college this fall. But my father died suddenly this spring, and we found his estate greatly involved. I was taken sick with typhoid fever, and am up here to recuperate. I was not able to take the examinations, and could not have gone to college even if I had passed, for I must help my mother support the children. So you see I might as well give up first as last. I shall never have a chance to do anything worth while."

"O, my boy, but you are greatly mistaken! There's a glorious chance for you to do your God-given duty, and that is far better than to choose one's work."

"But I wanted—you do not know how I wanted to be a doctor so I could help people—poor people who perhaps would have to suffer or die because they could not afford a doctor—I meant to do so much good!"

"Well, if God wills, you may yet do good in your chosen way. If not, can you not be just as willing to do good in His way? The way may open yet for you to do as you wish. You must not give up at the first rebuff. God often leads us by devious ways to our desired haven, and we never fail to find that His way is best."

"Speaking of giving up, do you remember the old colored preacher's definition of perseverance? 'Fustly, to take hold; secondly, to hold on; thirdly and lastly, to nebber let go.'"

"I read once that David Graham Phillips, the writer, said he had manuscript after manuscript rejected before his first novel was accepted. Success is like skating, he said. 'When I was a boy another boy asked me enviously how I learned to skate so well. Just by getting up every time I fell down, I told him.' And that is the only way we win success in anything—nebber let go; get up every time you fall down, and go at it again."

"Get up now and do the task God asks of you faithfully and willingly. In time you will find something else will open up. The time will not be wasted if you are faithful to your duty. We do not arrive at greatness rapidly, you know."

"Some one says that when God wants to make an oak He takes one hundred years, but when He wants to make a squash He takes only a few months."

"Remember another thing: Success is spelled with four letters—w-o-r-k. Get well and strong—that is the duty of the moment; then help your mother bravely and cheerfully, and trust your Heavenly Father to open the way for you to attain your heart's desire—if it is the best thing for you."

It was a long, happy day, for the doctor had a rich fund of travel and adventure to interest his companion.

"I can never, never thank you for giving me this day. I have never had anything like it in my life," the boy said to the doctor as they drew near the hotel again. "You have cheered and encouraged me, and given me a higher and better view of life. I shall be a better man, God helping me, all my life for your help this day."

"That's good, and as Benjamin Franklin said to some one he had helped, pass it along to some one else when you have opportunity."

"I think I did have an errand," said Dr. Chester to himself as he went to his room, not quite as rested, perhaps, as he had hoped to be. "Somehow, I felt every time I looked at the boy that he needed some one to help him. I prayed to be guided where to go, and I am sure I was."—Kate S. Gates.

For the Young Folks

Saturday Night.

Placing the little hats all in a row,
Ready for church, on the morrow, you know;

Washing wee faces and little black fists,
Getting them ready and fit to be kissed;
Putting them into clean garments and white,

That is what mothers are doing tonight.

Spying out rents in little worn hose,
Laying by shoes that are worn through the toes;

Looking o'er garments so faded and thin;
Who but a mother knows where to begin?

Changing a button to make it look right,
That is what mothers are doing tonight.

Calling the little ones all round her chair;

Hearing them lispen their evening prayer;
Telling them stories of Jesus of old,
The Shepherd, who gathers the lambs
To his fold;

Watching them listen with childish delight,

That's what mothers are doing tonight.

Creeping so softly to take a last peep—
Silence the token of childhood's sleep;
Anxious to know if the dear ones are warm;

Tucking the blanket round each little form;

Kissing each little face, rosy and bright,
That is what mothers are doing tonight.

Money for the Mite-Boxes.

Dear Children of the Southern Churchman:

Lent has come again, and we are ready to try to fill our mite-boxes in response to the calls from our Bishop and Bishop Tuttle; but this year it seems harder than usual to think of ways to make money, as we are doing all we can for the Red Cross; and Mr. Hoover tells us not to use sugar or flour where it is not absolutely necessary, so we cannot sell candy and cakes as so many of the children have been used to doing; we must think of other ways to make money, for we do not want our soldiers on the firing line of the Church's army all over the world to think that we have forgotten them because we are thinking of our soldiers on the firing line in France, so we want to do as much for them as we always do.

Now the Southern Churchman wants to help you and wants you to help it, so we are going to make you an offer which we think will help everybody. You know there are some people in the church who do not take the Southern Churchman, some little children who do not have anything for their mothers to read to them on Sunday afternoons, and we think that if they knew about our paper they would be glad to have it come to them every week. Don't you think this would be a good thing for you to do? Go to the people in your church who do not take the Southern Churchman and try to get them to subscribe to it. The price is $3.00 a year, and out of every new subscription you get you send us $2.25 and keep 75 cents for your mite-box, and for every person who has been taking the paper but owes for another year and pays you for it, you can keep 50 cents and send us $2.50, so you can make right much money if you get only a few subscriptions, and you will be helping us and helping the people who do not read the paper now. We will be glad to send to any child who wants it a list of the people in his church who takes the paper now, except in Richmond; there are too many people here for us to copy their names. I am sure your Sunday-school teacher will help you do this. Maybe your whole class can work together. Think about it and write to us.—Southern Churchman.

How He Met Washington.

"When I was a boy," said Grandpa Colton, one twenty-second day of February, when we boys were keeping Washington's birthday, "we lived at Long Meadows, two or three miles out of Springfield, Mass., and when Washington made his presidential tour in 1789 it was my good fortune to see the Father of His Country.

"And you really and truly saw Washington?" we cried.

"Yes, lads, I not only saw the great man, but I shook hands with him, and he also gave me this silver pocket-piece as a token," and grandfather drew out from his pocket a worn silver dollar which he exhibited to us.

"O, how grand!" we cried. "Tell us about it, grandpa, and just how it happened," and we gazed delightedly at one who had seen the pater patriae.

"Well, you see, my father had been a militia officer and had served under Washington at Trenton and Monmouth; and so when he learned that his old commander was going to pass through Springfield on his tour through New England he made up his mind that he would drive over to see him. I was a boy ten years old, and I was a happy youngster, I tell you, when father said I could go, too.

"It was a dull, drizzly October morning when father harnessed the old farm horse to a lumber wagon, which had no springs, and we started for Springfield. We had to purchase some household supplies, and I remember father bought some codfish, molasses and salt at Stephen Brown's little store on the corner. We had some crackers and cheese for dinner, and as it was still raining we left our team in the First Meeting-House shed and waited on the porch of Zenas Parson's tavern.

"There was quite a crowd there, I remember, and it kept increasing as the hours went by. It was as late as the middle of the afternoon when it ceased raining and the sun came out, and by that time there were a thousand people there all waiting to see Washington. The town authorities had sent out a troop of horses as an escort to the President, and presently a boy came running in and told us that Washington and his company were just half a mile away and would be along in a quarter of an hour.

"Everybody was all attention now, and it was not long before the President's escort appeared, followed by the great man himself. Washington rode in a great coach drawn by four horses. There were two gentlemen with him besides his secretary and six servants. There were extra horses to draw the coach when needed, and one of the servants led a stately white horse which Washington sometimes rode for a change.

"There was loud cheering when the coach drew up in front of the tavern and Washington alighted. He was a large, tall man with a commanding presence and rather a stern face. He was dressed all in black that morning and wore a cocked hat. He was rubbing his hands and bowing to the crowd when he chanced to see my father standing by the door. What do you suppose he did? He stepped forward with a smile on his face, and, grasping father's hand, exclaimed:

"Why, here's my old sergeant."

"And it's my old commander," said father.

"And the two stood there a long while, shaking hands and looking into each other's faces. Finally observing me, he inquired of father if I was his son. Father answered that I was and that I had come into town with him to see the President.

"And what is your name, my lad?" he asked.

"George Washington Colton," I replied as proud as a peacock.

"Washington laughed again as if delighted and pulled a silver dollar from his pocket and gave me.

"Come up this evening, sergeant, and sit with me and the other gentlemen," said Washington as we turned to go away.

"Father saluted and said that he would, and the great man and his suite walked forward into the tavern.

"I didn't know whether father really intended to keep his promise or not, but after we had milked the cows and done the chores he harnessed Old Dobbin again and attached him to the lumber wagon, and we started for Springfield. There was quite a crowd still around the hostelry, and I don't know how much New England rum was sold over Zenas Parson's bar that night, but it was no small quantity.

"Father had already sent his name up to Washington, and after a time Colonel Lear, his secretary, came down and escorted us upstairs. There were perhaps a dozen in the room, leading men of the town, when we entered, sitting around in various positions. As soon as Washington saw us he arose, and advancing to father, seized his arm and led him around and introduced him to every one in the room.

"Sergeant Colton was with me at Trenton and at Monmouth," he said, "the coldest night and the hottest day of the whole war. I found him a hero on both occasions, and this is his son, whom I am proud to say bears my name."

"All those big bugs made a lot of father, and he told them how he froze an ear while crossing the Delaware on that Christmas night when they captured the Hessians at Trenton. As for me, I sat in Washington's lap for an hour, and he showed me his big silver watch and told me of his little adopted son, George Washington Parke Custis, who was about my age, he said. It was the most enjoyable time I ever experienced in my boyhood.

"The great man had torn his coat that morning and he inquired of his secretary if there was any one at the inn who could mend it. Colonel Lear brought up a young girl, who set about it very deftly, using her thread and needle with great skill. After she had performed her task he gave her a silver dollar, and because, he said, she looked like a little girl that he knew at home, he kissed her. That was the first time I ever saw your grandmother, boys.

"At the hour of ten the President arose very slowly, and courteously announced that it was his time for retiring, and bade everybody good-night. And we all arose, and bowing our adieus, went quietly out of the room. The last thing I can remember is of seeing that majestic figure bowing graciously to us as we took our departure. The silver dollar I have always kept, and it will be handed down to my great-grandchildren."—Fred Myron Colby, in the Standard.

Coasting.

Uphill, uphill,
With the sled;
Tugging, trudging;
Feet like lead.
Work comes first,
Then comes play;
Always that's
The wisest way.

Downhill, downhill,
See us go!
Flashing, dashing,
O'er the snow!
Labor gives Pleasure zest.
Well-earned fun—
That is best.

What Amy Said.

"There's a bad boy moved into the house next ours," said Bobby Magee to Amy Brown. "When my ball rolled into his yard he—he kept it. Then I threw a stone at him and he threw one back. He set his dog on my cat. And I can't begin to tell all the mean things he's done."

"That's too bad," said Amy. "A naughty little girl lived near me for a while, but I made her go away."

"How did you do it?" asked Bobby. "Do you suppose I could make Willie Travers move, too?"

"Why, of course, you could," said Amy, holding up one plump finger. "I did it by throwing things back."

"Throwing things?" said Bobby. "That is just what I did."

"Yes, but you threw the wrong kind of things. When Nellie threw a stone I threw an apple. When she found my paper dolls and tore them up, I made a funny little one out of an ear of corn and put it in the mail box. She pulled up my flowers once, but I gave her some pansy plants. After that she was nice."

"That sounds," Bobby said, "like something we learned at Sunday-school, about 'returning good for evil.' I guess I will try it with Willie. I'll invite him to my party."

"I think that would be very nice," said Amy. "We will all see that he has a good time."

"Thank You": A True Story.

Inga is a little Swedish girl only eight years old, whose home is in the country many miles from town.

Swedish parents teach their children to be very polite. Every little favor or gift meets with a prompt, "Thank you." It sounds very sincere, and if they are especially grateful the "thank you" is apt to be emphasized by a hand-shake. When the Swedish children eat a meal at a friend's home, upon arising from the table they smile and say, "Thank you very much for the meal." It is a very pretty custom.

Now, Inga is very fond of something all boys and girls enjoy, though she very seldom has it—only at Christmas. It is candy.

One day an aunt came to visit Inga's parents, and she brought a box of candy and gave it to Inga. Immediately Inga treated the entire family. Finally the box was put away, so as to save the candy as long as possible, but when it was brought forth the family once more was treated and the box again put away. Inga had just put the pretty candy box on the table, and was about to take a piece when her mother entered the room.

There were only three pieces left, and she had been very generous. Mother was busy and had not noticed the box. Inga could easily hide it away, but, no! she would be selfish were she to do that, so she called, "Come, mother, have some candy."

"Yes, dear," mother responded, but when she looked in the big box and saw only three pieces of candy left her mother-heart made her exclaim, "No, mother doesn't want any; keep it yourself, you have been so generous to all."

Back came the reply of her small daughter with such a sincere ring of thankfulness as almost made her gasp in surprise, for Inga wildly shook her mother's hand, exclaiming, "Thank you, mother; thank you very much, for not taking any."—M. E. G.

Penny and Turtles.

When the first strip of interstate road was constructed in our rugged Connecticut town, it happened that a silver thread of a brook that made its own zigzag course through the pasture and woodland was blocked at the foot of a slope. It seemed so inconsequential that no culvert or tiling was considered necessary. The road foundation of rock and loose stone through which the little stream was expected to filter formed a dam; and the water, as water has a way of doing, proceeded to find its level, and, as if it fancied that for the first time it was proving its individuality, it filled to overflowing an inconspicuous, fern-hidden grassy hollow, and then stretched itself out day by day up and down the rapidly forming embankment. We saw a pond gradually taking form and wondered if the busy river had time to miss it.

Before the summer had waned there was the shallow, grassy basin of a useless half acre filled with clear, cool brook water lying in the sunshine, mirroring sky and cloud and the near-by woodland.

When winter came the owner of the land awoke to the fact that here was a valuable and easily accessible ice supply; and the little pond was accepted not only as a picturesque addition to the locality, a convenience as a watering place for stock, but also as a valuable asset of the departed brooklet.

From the first the formation of the pond interested us. It seemed to enjoy being of consequence. It was impossible not to note the aquatic plants brought into life by the wonderful resources of the soil. The rapid growth was soon in bloom and bending over to admire the reflection in the bright water.

One morning there were exclamations of surprise at the discovery of a small turtle sunning himself upon a stump, monarch of his wee island.

We wondered where he came from, how he learned about the new pond, and if he had come to stay. We knew very little about turtles—"mud turtles" the country children almost invariably call them. Shortly there were two of the mysterious little strangers. The next summer there were baby turtles and in four or five years scores of them.

It was diverting indeed to drive that way on an early summer morning, especially when there were children guests, and count the turtles. It was not unusual to locate one hundred covering the stones and clinging to reeds, ferns and mossy stumps on the far edge of the water.

About that time a Skye terrier was sent to us from kennels in Pennsylvania that we named, for the State of his nativity, "Pensie," for short. Pensie soon became Penny with the neighboring little people. The name fitted so well that it stuck, for Penny was always turning up.

Penny discovered the turtles and soon began bringing tiny ones home in his mouth. The way being mostly uphill, the easy-going horse walked while mail was looked over and news-headlines read. The little dog trotted along behind the carriage and made no detours after squirrels or to familiar woodchuck holes.

At home he dropped his prize in the shrubbery near the drive; under the shade of a huge clump of syringas, and here they afforded him occupation, probably amusement, and possibly companionship. He could not harm them; for when he discovered his guests in the act of running away they would "shut up shop" and be safe.

Sometimes Penny dug a hole in the soft cool earth of the flower beds and buried his treasure. They were not long in digging to the surface; or he dropped them into his drinking basin, to which they seemed to have no objection, scrambling out when feeling the need of change. What they subsisted on we did not know, but they grew and kept pace with the family at the home pond.

When they became too many at the house we picked them up with tongs and carried them back in a small basket to their native place.

Late in the fall, when the turtles had hibernated, it was amusing to find Penny console himself with a small, flat oval stone that he picked up on the roadway. He kept it in the house the whole winter, carried it about; barked at it, poked it with his feet and nose, and ran after it when some one was considerate enough to give it the impetus of a roll.

Penny went the way of all good dogs, and the little oval stone was kept for a memorial. It was used as a paperweight and was known to the family and familiar friends as "Penny's turtle." Once a casual visitor inquired: "Is this your petrified turtle?" The story of the turtles had gone abroad and a new figure of speech added to the language.—Mrs. Annie Preston, in the Christian Register.

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of St. James Guild, Boydton, on Wednesday, January 23, a committee was appointed to draw up the following resolutions:

Whereas, it pleased God to call to Himself, on January 1, our loved member, Mrs. Lulie Baskervill Young; therefore, be it resolved,

1. That this Guild and St. James Church have lost a most faithful and active member.

2. That our community has lost one of its loveliest characters, a young woman, whose cheery disposition and purity of spirit endeared her to all.

3. That, in appreciation of her lovely qualities and her activities within our Guild, we render to her this tribute of love and respect, and tender to her family our sincere sympathy.

4. That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of St. James Guild, be published in the Southern Churchman and the Chase City Progress, and copies be sent to her husband and parents.

Waiting for the Morning.

Rev. 19:7.

There is no roof in all the world, of palace or of cot,
 That hideth not some burdened heart,
 nigh breaking for its lot.
 The earth is sunk in pain and tears,
 and closer draws the gloom;
 And balm for cure there can be none,
 till Christ the Lord shall come.

"O morn, when like a summer bird, my spirit shall go free—
 When I shall see Thee as Thou art, and be, my God, like Thee!
 Like Thee! like Thee! All spotless white—this heart, this will as Thine!
 O love of God, O blood of Christ, O
 grace and power divine!

"My Saviour, who doth know the thirst the longing spirit feels—O Bridegroom, now so long afar, why stay Thy chariot wheels?
 Were ever eyes so dim with grief, breasts so oppressed with care?
 Did ever hearts so yearn to catch Thy whisper from the air?"

Thou lonely one, lift up Thy head, array Thee for the feast;
 He that hath tarried long is near—the glow is in the East!
 O Morning Star, so soon to lead, Thy chosen one away—
 O Sun of Righteousness, bring in the everlasting day!

 Poems.

WANTED— Both Vegetable and Animal Fats.

Fertilize Your Soy Beans and Peanuts

THE world needs both vegetable and animal fats, and is paying big prices for them. Thousands of farmers are growing soy beans and peanuts—feeding them to hogs—or harvesting and selling to oil mills.

Don't think of growing these crops without fertilizer. If you "hog down" the crop, V-C Fertilizers will greatly increase the yield—give you more pork from every acre. If you sell them as a money crop, you will find that every dollar invested in V-C Fertilizers yields rich returns.

Many think of these crops as legumes that help the soil. They do when you plow them up and turn them under. But nobody is burying soy beans and peanuts in this manner when they bring such excellent prices. They are invariably harvested, and when harvested they take away fertility, exhaust your soil—just as corn, cotton, and all other crops do. They must be fertilized. There are V-C Fertilizers made by formulas to suit these and every other Southern crop.

ORDER V-C NOW

Freight is congested—cars so scarce—that every farmer should give the dealer his orders now. V-C Crop Books tell how to make the most from every acre of soy beans, peanuts, or any other crop. They will be sent free upon request. Just write saying what crops you grow, and the books will be sent you free.

The Shadow.

By Elizabeth Carter.

The altar flame was white, the flowers red,
Through the hushed chancel, from the altar side,
Came the priest's prayer before the Living Bread,
He prayed, "O Saving Victim, opening wide—"

Rough scaffolding outside a shadow threw
On the tall window, veiled to hide the sun,
Crossbeams and bars, a tracery that grew
To a mute symbol of the day begun.

For, climbing, pausing, noiseless as a thought,
Black on the amber curtain's narrow span,
Among the bars and beams his hands had wrought,
There rose and crossed the shadow of a man.

A man—a carpenter. What breath of awe
Swept cold across our prayer-wrapt ecstasy,
In place of lights and kneeling priest we saw
A Workman's home in far-off Galilee.

Thy Church, Thy brother workmen!—
This we know—
(Help us, O Christ, the gulf is deep and wide)
We kneel in peace where the tall candles glow,
Thy brother workmen face the world—outside.

—From the Survey.

The Church and the Nation.

I do not believe that I am mistaken in saying that of all the ardent workers and supporters of the United States Government in this great crisis, the clergy of the Church have been most active and devoted in their loyalty and their labor. They have been conspicuous for their untiring efforts to create and encourage the spirit of patriotism not only in their own congregations, but they have gone out into the country districts and surrounding villages over the State and have made patriotic addresses in various public gatherings. They have been deeply interested in the work of the Red Cross, and have ministered to the soldiers in the camps wherever it has been possible for them to do so. There has never been the slightest thought of personal gain or selfish motive in this service. The Church has taken its positive and progressive attitude, officially, in this war, and there can be no question as to the desire on the part of the Church in all sections of the country to render every assistance within its power to the administration and to the nation in this supreme sacrifice of life and property for the preservation of our country and her sacred institutions. —Bishop Beecher.

Men are to pray not because they hope to change God's plan, but because God's plan is the wisest and most loving. They are to pray not with the idea of inducing God to be kind, but because He is kind. Christ revealed God as everywhere present—working in every life, searching every soul.—E. L. Hull.

An Appeal to Loyal Americans.

One good effect of this war is that it has aroused our people to the recognition of the truth that they have obligations to humanity and are citizens of the world. It is essentially the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, Who commanded His disciples to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." In Christ's lofty idealism the nation is but a larger individual having moral relations with and obligations of service to all mankind.

Therefore, the man to-day who practices self-denial and makes sacrifices in order that the nation may efficiently render service for the good of humanity is exemplifying the spirit and obeying the law of Jesus Christ.

The United States, as a nation, has been forced to take up arms in the high endeavor to bring about a condition of enduring peace founded upon righteousness for all the peoples of the earth. And this means war, suffering and many sacrifices; but it is in the name and faith of that Word of God whom St. John saw in apocalyptic vision, "Faithful and true, and in righteousness judging and making war."

The loyalty of American men and women, who rally to the nation's service in this hour, is the kind of loyalty that supports the Church, gives to missions, encourages education and promotes the love of liberty, truth, justice and honor among men; for the salvation of the world and the incoming of the Kingdom of God.—Bishop Gailor.

Ye Shall Be Witnesses.

Forget not that your first and principal business as a disciple of Christ is to give the Gospel to those who have it not. He who is not a missionary Christian will be a missing Christian when the great day comes of bestowing the rewards of service. Therefore ask yourselves daily what the Lord would have you do in connection with the work of carrying the news of salvation to the perishing millions. Search carefully whether He would have you go yourself to the heathen, if you have the youth and fitness required for the work. Or, if you cannot go in person, inquire diligently what blood mortgage there is upon your property in the interest of Foreign Missions, how much you owe to the heathen because of what you owe to Christ for redeeming you with His precious blood.—Dr. A. J. Gordon.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"To be dead in earnest is to be eloquent."

When God tells us to rejoice it is a sin not to do it.

Do not wish, but will, to be at one with God.—Huntington.

The consciousness of ignorance lies at the root of true teachableness.

If the Good Shepherd is leading us there is no such thing as accident.

Doubt is not something to be proud of. It is an enemy to be fought.—Selected.

"Oh, make me feel it was my sin,
As if no other sin were there,
That was to Him who bears the world
A load that He could scarcely bear."

God wants to hear about whatever occupies our time and thought, not that He may be informed, but that we may keep in communion with Him.—Ex.

It is not so much the teaching of Jesus, which is very like that of the best of His predecessors in Israel, that accounts for His influence in the world. It is Jesus Himself.—Bosworth.

The Pentateuch shows the need of a Priest; the historical books the need of a King; and the poetical and prophetic books the need of a Prophet.—W. H. G. Thomas.

Hope never hurt any one, never yet interfered with duty, nay, always strengthens to the performance of duty, gives courage, and clears the judgment.—Macdonald.

"Let the Church return to the life of prayer and give proof that she is willing to trust to spiritual means alone for success, and in that same hour the era of enduring conquest will begin."—William J. Dawson.

There are two-stones we may not dare to cast;
The stone of stumbling in our brother's way;
The stone of judgment at our brother's past—
We who like sheep have gone astray.
—Selected.

God dwells in the light of joy as well as purity, and instead of becoming more like Him as we become more miserable, and as all the brightness and glory of life are extinguished, we become more like God as our blessedness becomes more complete.—R. W. Dale.

Many mean things are done in the family for which moods are put forward as the excuse; when the moods themselves are the most inexcusable things of all. A man or woman in tolerable health has no moral right to indulge in an unpleasant mood.—J. G. Holland.

When tyrant feet are trampling
Upon the common weal,
Thou dost not bid us bend and writhe
Beneath the iron heel.
In Thy name we assert our right
By sword or tongue or pen;
And e'en the headman's axe may flash
Thy message unto men.
—John Hay.

The reason for a man's falling in a conspicuous emergency is often found in a long series of earlier failures at inconspicuous points of his. Evidently telling the exact truth under all circumstances had not become an instinct of Peter's nature; and Judas was accustomed to small pilferings from the common treasury before he sold his Lord.—Adapted.

"We may not always be consciously thinking of God, only we must think of all things in and through Him, as we do not always look at the sun, yet see all things we know only by the sun's shining."

It is curious to note how many people insist on having all the Christian doctrines and sacraments explained before they will accept them. And the fact that the explanations are often partial and dim seems to them a reason for "disbelief." But who rebels against using electricity? And who has explained its nature and laws?

What it is to find God or to be found of God every devout man knows, but the secret cannot be told. We feel His touch and we know that the unseen Hand can be only His. There is a power upon us, and we need no visible sign or symbol to assure us that it is the power of the eternal. A light shines; we know that it is divine.—R. W. Dale.

The discovery of new truths puts no strain upon the Creed of Christendom; that Creed is not a brittle thing that it should break. What happens to the Creed when larger knowledge comes to man is simply what happened to it in your mind and mine when we passed from childhood into maturity—it takes on a grander meaning, is interpreted by a more worthy standard, in a word, is better appreciated than before. Christianity is a religion of light. It has everything to hope and nothing to fear from more light. Time may irradiate the Creed; it will never annul it.—W. R. Huntington.

Lest We Forget.

If the victory for which our country and her allies are struggling with such tremendous earnestness and self-sacrifice is to be all that we would like it to be, and not in the end a bitterness and disappointment, it must be in its very essence a moral victory, and the triumph, in a righteous way, of righteousness and justice in the earth. This is God's world and ultimately a moral world, and in it immoral forces are futile, a delusion and a snare. The triumph that mere numbers or brute force may be able to bring us will not be a triumph in which we can long rejoice. To forget the great righteous issues of life which made the war from our point of view necessary; to let God drop out of sight in our struggle; to fail to consecrate our sacrifice with prayer and penitence and humility; to act as if we thought money and munitions and big battalions were all that we needed—is to make a real victory altogether impossible. Nothing will really avail us if God is forgotten and His will ignored.—Christian Guardian.

The Laity.—In a familiar Good Friday Collect we pray that every member of the Church in his vocation and ministry may truly and godly serve the common Lord. This means not only the deacons and the priests as well as the Bishop; it means the lay people of every variety of profession as well as the Clergy of all ranks. Service in Holy Orders is only one form of ministry in the Church of Christ. Bishops, priests and deacons have their special functions as organs of the body; but that is all. They do not make up the Church; they should not be its only ministers.

We need to be reminded that it is only in a secondary sense that the word "Laity" is used to distinguish unordained men from those who are ordained. In its primary sense the word distinguished the Christian people, the Lord's people (Laos), from those who were not baptized or reckoned among His servants and subjects. All of the Lord's people have their high privileges as members of the Church, and their corresponding obligations and duties. This is recognized in our Diocesan Council with its lay members, and in our Parochial organizations with their lay officers. Let it be recognized in the spiritual activity of all the mem-

The yoke of Jesus is the source of release from the chafing of daily life. There are relatively few who succeed in availing themselves completely of the relief that may be found in the Master's yoke; but the relief is there in spite of human failure. The Tragedy of Laodicea.

The greatest tragedy, after all, for men and churches, seems to be that they should be morally indistinguished, neither cold nor hot. That means that they will probably be sane, selfish, perhaps level-headed on a low level; but it will also mean that they will be without poetry, without enthusiasm, without much capacity for pity, without much room for faith, capable of seeing neither the golden glory of the heavenly city nor the red and angry glow of the inferno, capable only of seeing the every day narrow circle, capable of seeing that two and two make four, but incapable of asking why in the world they should not make five, or any other question that would thus open the gateway to the illimitable, the mysterious, the divine. It is a common type, this Laodicean type, the type that never takes risks, never knows what a spiritual adventure is, never prays as if God could hear, and never lives as if God were at one pole of the moral universe and the devil at the other. Let us rouse ourselves. Better a hundred blunders by attempting great things than a non-committal self-security which keeps the lower levels and never sees the sky. Better be a fanatic in some cause you think worthy than a cipher that never stands for anything either in this world or in any world where moral issues matter. Do not let us dread enthusiasm. The Gospel is an enthusiasm. Christ is an enthusiast. I am sure He welcomes the outbursts of affection, even if they be sometimes followed by reactions far more than a tepid reverence that never hears His heart calling, never sees His quivering face, as He bears the world's sin away. Let us be anything, rather than Laodicean. Better a daring anarchic agnosticism, storming the gates of mystery, blind, presumptuous, but awake, upon the quest of all the ages, than a Christian Church or a so-called Christian life out of which the note of reality, the pulse of life, have gone. Than that a man should say, "I have need of nothing," better far that he should say in any human language, however tragic, wild, or inarticulate, "I have need of God."—Alex. Connell.

The Glory of Service.

"Jesus knowing that He was come from God, and went to God, took a towel and girded Himself, and began to wash the disciples' feet," John 13:3, 4, 5.

I have heard the passage explained thus: "Although perfectly conscious of His very high birth and His very high destiny, Jesus nevertheless submitted to perform an act of humiliating service." I do not like that explanation. It makes the ministrant act of Jesus something foreign to His nature, something alien to His descent and to His goal. My reading of the passage is exactly the opposite: "Jesus, conscious that He came from a land of love and went to a land of love, felt that there was no sacrifice and no humiliation in this particular act of service." He did not feel that He was stooping below Himself in washing the feet of the disciples. He had not the sense of doing anything unworthy of His royalty, disparaging to His claims of Sonship. It was not felt to be an act of condescension. It came natural to Him. The spirit of ministration was in His blood; He got it by heredity from His Father. In the light of His antecedents, in the light of His prospects, He was unable to help it. It was His native air, His primitive culture, the necessity of His being, the law of His life.

My brother, hast thou considered this argument for service? It is not because thou shouldst be humble that thou art called to serve; it is to prevent thee from being too humble. It is because service is a divine thing that God calls thee to it. It is not to humiliate thee that He bids thee work in the vineyard; it is to save thee from humiliation. In thy Father's land the servants are the upper circle. It is the lower circle that is waited upon, they whose lamps are gone out. Is it not written, "He shall carry the lambs in His bosom"—the weaklings of the flock? Wouldst thou always be a lamb, a member of the lower circle? Dost thou not hear a voice saying, "Come up higher?" Obey that voice, my brother. Put on thy menial robes. The apparel of the heavenly spheres becomes less gorgeous as we climb. The wedding-garment is a soiled garment. Thou shalt know the souls in front by the homeliness of their garb. They are dressed for the road, for the dust, for the mire. They have the livery of the hospital, the wrappings of the infirmary. They are weighted with implements of service. They carry the ligaments for wounds, the salves for pain. Men say, "Who are these that have the air of serving by day and by night? Who are these with apparel so stained, with robes so dyed?" And the answer comes clear from the pure

HAS THIS CHURCH AN ANSWER?

Three and a half years ago, when the world stood aghast at the spectacle of nation after nation being drawn into the vortex of the most terrible war of all time, the question was freely asked, "Has Christianity failed? Otherwise, ought not its influence to have prevented this infernal outbreak of cruelty and death?" It was a frequent topic in the pulpit and religious press, and we well remember that in the spring of 1915 one after another of our Bishops, in his episcopal address, made it the subject for discussion, showing that it was not Christianity but the lack of it, the neglect of its teachings and the repudiation of its principles, that was responsible for the great disaster. It was to an appreciable extent the discussion of this question that brought home to our American people an understanding of what the causes of the war really were. Since this has become known little reproach against the religion of our Master is heard on account of it, in the English tongue at least. But there is a great deal to be said about the part Christianity has to play in the conduct of the war and in deciding how and with what results it shall end.

But while our holy religion itself has been exonerated, there is a strong and growing dissatisfaction and sense of delinquency in the Church, supposed to represent Christianity and to be the body or organ through which it acts and exerts its saving and sanctifying influence in the world. Is it as a whole measuring up to its opportunities and responsibilities in these times of change and reconstruction, of the clash of opposing forces, moral and spiritual, as well as material? With the growth of Christian intelligence as well as of Christian charity the conviction has long been gaining ground that a divided, discordant, distracted Church does not and cannot adequately present the whole truth of Christianity or marshal its full force for the world's salvation. And never has a growing conviction been more strongly fortified by facts or justified by the unmistakable logic of events than this, within the period of the war and because of its demands. It was not the religion of Jesus Christ that failed to preach peace to the nations, to teach them to subordinate their selfish interests to the common good, to forego unjust gains and repudiate unrighteous ambitions; it was the Church, divided by selfish interests and pride of opinion into rival, contentious and contemptuous sects, that failed to teach and enforce what itself did not practise. When in all the earth the exigencies of the present distress as well as the hopes of that better future to which a war-weary world is looking calls aloud for unity and fellowship, when nation is joining hands with nations and party is blending with party and class with class, it is the Church which has so far been unable to put aside its jealousies and demolish its barriers and to speak and act in unison. What has been the result? Here in America at least, instead of the tremendous force of Christian sentiment in this great nation speaking with one compelling voice of divine authority, we have the twittering of an hundred voices almost lost in the general tumult. Instead of being able to act with controlling efficiency through agencies of its own, its power must largely be relegated to secular channels. Not to the Church and its ministry but to a voluntary association of laymen must be intrusted the sacred task of ministering to the moral and religious needs of the army. Not to the Church but to a secular organization developed for the purpose is committed the Christlike mission of extending our mercy and charity, and so exemplifying our religion of love and tenderness, to distant peoples. In other words, the Church, because of her divisions and jealousies, has been officially declared incompetent to perform the very offices with which she was intrusted by her Lord. A great crisis has arisen in the life of the world, mighty changes are imminent which will affect its destiny through all time, and the Church of Christ, which ought to stand forth as the visible embodiment and with the commanding authority of the Kingdom of God militant on earth, is impotent to gain a hearing or to demand respect, a force almost negligible among the many forces of good and evil striving for the mastery.

But, thank God, there are signs that the Church, in at least some of its parts, is becoming conscious of the facts and is growing ashamed of itself and humbled before God. The necessity for unity in the Church is being felt, the demand for it is finding voice, as never before, at least among the Protestant Churches of America with which we of this Church have immediately to do. The old and vaunted substitutes for unity—federation and co-operation and ordinary Christian courtesy and good feeling—are being urged and used with good effect as far as they can go, which is a very little way indeed; but are plainly manifesting their inherent weakness and vice of concealing instead of curing the disease from which the Church is suffering to the death of half its powers. The want and the desire of something more real, more radical than this is showing itself in many ways.

This Protestant Episcopal Church of ours has for a long time stood forth as the advocate of a real Church unity. The story of her gracious and most sincere overtures in this regard is to be found, not only on the brightest pages of her own annals, but inscribed in the records of her sister Churches to whom she has gone with her invitations to prayer and conference. She alone has made in the past, and it still stands unrevoked, a clear-cut proposal as a basis of corporate unity. The other Protestant Churches recognize her position in this regard and, if not officially yet in the person of many of their influential and most thoughtful members, are looking to her for leadership and perhaps for the clue out of the maze of our difficulties.

Has this Church an answer for these anxious questionings, a message for a dissatisfied American Christianity, disturbed in its self-complacency and awakening to a sense of its weakness and inefficiency, of which she herself is a part? And if so, can it find expression, now, in the hour of opportunity?

Let it be noted that it is action, not academic discussion or diplomatic pronouncement, that is wanted. The World Conference on Faith and Order need not be anticipated. No compromise or surrender of any man's views or convictions need be suggested. No elaborate scheme for a universal consensus of judgment or opinion could be attempted or foreshadowed. No abolition of existing ecclesiastical organizations is necessary. What is desired is some definite, practical demonstration in act that will break down some one barrier and make a beginning, provide a rallying point, manifest in one particular that self-abnegation, that bold venturesomeness, that high, self-forgetful faith and courage that will dare take a risk, dare throw down a defense, dare brave a danger, dare override a hundred prejudices, that the schisms in Christ's Body may begin to be healed. What is wanted now is to make a beginning.

We believe that some such action as that suggested in the appeal of Dr. Newman Smyth and his eighty-odd fellow petitioners as published in these columns three weeks ago, taken in the spirit so splendidly advocated by Bishop Anderson in his recent Hale Memorial Sermon on "The Work of the Church on Behalf of Unity," would meet with a response of grateful welcome from the Protestant Churches around us and go far toward opening the way for yet further steps toward the mobilization of the Church's dissipated forces. Is there in this Church and at this critical time the leadership, the courage, the bold, venturesome faith, that can bring it about? If so, may God set it free, and make this thing as a fire in our bones until it be accomplished.

Studies in Religion for War Times: The General Board of Religious Education, in compliance with their resolve at their late annual meeting, has issued in a neat pamphlet form, under the above title, a series of Outlines for Meditation and Discussion intended for use in any class or group of people who wish to study some of the spiritual problems of the hour. There are six of these studies, presented in the form of questions only, the answers to which are to be gained by thoughtful consideration and inquiry. The point is to induce people to ask the right kind of questions, which, even in case no categorical answer can be arrived at, will guide their thinking in the direction of truth and confidence and lead from temporal fact to eternal realities. While well adapted for Lenten work, the Studies are suited for use at any time and might well form an outline of pastoral instruction or for Bible Class work. Copies of the pamphlet may be had at the rate of two dollars a hundred from the G. B. R. E., 289 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Church has never suffered through her zeal for expansion, and she never responds to mere mandatory decrees or false stimulation. Experience soon showed that Christian fidelity is best preserved and developed by imparting it through an ever-widening series of concentric circles—Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria and the world.—Bishop Brent.

The Soul of Lee. By One of His Soldiers, (the Rev. Dr.) Randolph H. McKim. Longmans, Green & Co., New York. Pp. 267. $1.50, net.

Dr. McKim does not undertake to add another to the biographies of General Lee. His purpose is to convey in brief compass "a true impression of his genius as a soldier and his exalted character as a man." He thinks the occasion a timely one, when so many young men are offering their services in defence of democracy, to present for their inspiration the life and character of the great Virginian and American as well as a study of the strategy of this greatest soldier of his age. The army, which was so largely created by his genius and sustained by devotion to his person comes in also for a share of attention, and the exhaustive study which Dr. McKim is known to have given to the relative numbers engaged in the hard-fought contests in the War Between the States is manifest in his discussion of this point to which he devotes an interesting chapter. It is needless to say that Dr. McKim writes well and that his book is graphic and full of striking incidents. His leading purpose, to depict the soul of the great Southern leader in its transparent beauty and nobility, is never lost sight of, and he has made a worthy contribution to our knowledge of the man as well as of the cause with which his illustrious name will always be identified.

The Outer Courts. A Waking Dream. By M. Agnes Fox. With a Foreword by Bishop Brent. Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 87. 75 cents, net.

Here is a little book that is not to be analyzed or criticized, but just to be read and to be glad of. The author warns us, quoting from Kingsley, that we "are not to believe one word of it, even if it is true." It is just an imaginative story of a soul that wakes up to find that it has passed from the Here to the There, and of what it discovers and how it fares during its first few days in the unseen world. Any one with a sufficiently vivid imagination, and who is not afraid to use it, as most people are, can construct the outer fabric and details of such a story and picture the framework of the life within the veil according to his own fancy. But not every one will make the spirit of their dream so consistent with the wholeness of life, so correlated with the stage that now is, so conformable to the laws which govern our personality here, as our author succeeds in doing. To picture the sameness of life without the familiar conditions of life is our difficulty. In the story the very human soul whose experiences are imagined doesn't find that difficulty at all, simply because he doesn't realize at first that the conditions have changed. He is as much astonished when he discovers that he hasn't on his body as when he learns that he isn't talking English. But these incidents are small beside the spiritual facts which come to him by experience and through human companionship.

We are glad that he didn't have to learn everything at once and be transformed into an absolutely perfect creature in the twinkling of an eye. It was foggy when he first got there, and he slept a good deal the first few days. But he made some delightful friends, who tell him that "if we are willing and obedient it is surprising how we get on," and that "we don't explain things up Here; we discover them, and that is so much better." What a rebuke to Dante and Milton and Bickelsteth, with their long-winded Angels!

We think, with Bishop Brent, that this little book will bring courage and consolation to those who read it.

COLORED SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

A good lady misunderstood a remark in the article in our last week's issue on the Oak Hill Sunday-school and supposed that the author meant to say that this was probably the first Sunday-school for negroes in the United States. Of course he meant to make no such statement, but said that it is probably the oldest of its kind now being maintained. The Oak Hill School has been for forty-three years in continuous operation. Is there an older anywhere? If so may we not hear of it?

But our correspondent goes on to write of the Sunday-schools maintained for the servants in so many parts of the South in ante-bellum days:

"In South Carolina, my home for many years, Sunday-schools for the plantation negroes were kept by their owners, and when the lady of the house was sick or absent the daughters took her place regularly. My mother used an easy Catechism, written by Bishop Capers of the Methodist Church. I can remember the opening questions and answers: 'Who made you?' 'God.' 'What did He make you for?' 'His glory.' 'Who is God?' 'The Almighty Maker of heaven and earth.' 'This Catechism had the Lord's Prayer, Belief, ten Commandments and everything necessary for the Christian child, all in simple language.

"The churches in our towns and cities were built with galleries, or had seats at the back, where the negroes sat and worshipped and communed with their masters and mistresses.

"Sunday-school was held in the galleries before the morning service. One of the vestrymen being superintendent. The classes were taught by the ladies and gentlemen of the congregation, each feeling responsible, and having their place filled by a friend if called away for even one Sunday.

"After the war all this was changed. Churches were demolished and 'our people' (as we always called them) scattered. Later they preferred to worship in their own churches, and have their children taught, both in the Sunday and secular schools, by those of their own color."

But here is an older! Since the above was prepared for the printer we have the following from a lady, a native of South Carolina, who knows a Sunday-school for negroes which antedates the Oak Hill school:

"I read with a great deal of interest Mr. Doty's account of the forty year Sunday-school for negroes in Albemarle County, which he states is probably the oldest one in the United States; but Virginia always finds it hard to get ahead of South Carolina, however much she tries.

"Mrs. Charles Sinkler, now long dead, started a Sunday-school for her negroes on the famous Eutaw plantation (where the battle between the English and Americans took place during the Revolution). She began it at least fifty years ago, probably more nearly sixty years now, as I think it began before the war, and it is still carried on by her daughter-in-law and granddaughters, in a chapel built for the purpose by her daughter, Mrs. Charles Cox, of Philadelphia.

"I have been to the Sunday-school myself and seen negroes of all ages there in attendance, and heard their recitations and excellent singing of our Church hymns. So the Sunday-school in Albemarle is not the oldest in the United States."

Alas that it had to be done, but it had to be done and we editors can understand it. Our valuable organ of the Southern Church, the Southern Churchman, comes out with a letter, "Owing to the increased cost of production the management of the Southern Churchman has found it necessary to advance the subscription rate. After January 1, 1918, the rates to the Southern Churchman will be $3.00 per annum in advance." That's a pity, but they held out longer against the inevitable than did most papers. A friend has suggested that in view of the same conditions the subscription to the Church News should be advanced to seventy-five cents. He is well acquainted with the Diocese and says that we would not lose twenty subscriptions by the advance. We wish we dared make the move. If you won't tell it to the business man of your family, we will say confidently that it costs us fifty-five cents to get the paper to the subscriber on a fifty cent subscription.—Church News (Miss.).

Take courage, brother, and do it. Our business office tells us that our subscription list is growing right along under our advanced price—a rebuke to our timidity.—Ed. S. C.

THE LATE WILLIAM H. MEADE, D. D.

Memorial Sermon,

Preached on the Anniversary of His Death, January 13, 1918, in St. John's Church, Roanoke, by the rector, the Rev. J. W. Cantey Johnson.

* * * Dr. Meade was born on November 7, 1838, of a parentage committed to Virginia and the ministry of the Mother Church, and therein of marked distinction in the person of the Right Rev. William Meade, Bishop of Virginia, his grandfather. His natural course and pride were accomplished in the educational opportunities of the Episcopal High School, the University of Virginia, and the Virginia Seminary. He was ordained deacon at the Seminary in the year 1862, and in the following year, priest in the war church of the Confederacy—St. Paul's, Richmond. The ministry of the succeeding years was spent in the following Parishes: At first in Clarksville, Va., and then at Charles Town, W. Va., from 1864 to 1882, during those precious years of a fruitful ministry from the age of twenty-six to forty-four. The next four years were spent as rector of the Church of Our Saviour, Philadelphia.

It was then that the vigorous new city of Roanoke secured his services for the somewhat older Parish, St. John's. This was in 1886. He continued to be your rector until 1898.

In the middle years of his work here this present church building was constructed, a notable edifice, and on most acceptable lines of church architecture. The former church, on Commerce Street, serving as Christ Church until quite recently, was sold to the Methodists, to be later re-entered by the new congregation of Christ Church. For the next ten years, the last of his active ministry, we find Dr. Meade surrounded by the quiet, well ordered life of Chapel Hill, the seat of the University of North Carolina. After that he came among you again, as a retired priest, but ready to do service wherever he was needed, and always finding joy and comfort for himself in such services, and giving consolation to others. In my own ministry, he added richly to the meaning of our holy religion in his gentle presence, in his partaking and distributing the sacred elements of the Body and Blood of Christ, and by his occasional word of exalted Christian ideal and of blessed hope through Jesus Christ.

Reflecting upon his personality, and what he came to mean for us who were privileged to know him, some things stand out in him that especially we love to have linger with us. We cling to them as the sweet savor of his life.

First of all was his own personality. Always frail of body, and delicate of voice, as most of us knew him, it impressed everybody that his physical media of expression fitted the gentleness and quietness of the man's nature. And yet withal there was a stalwart heart and courage that found him strong either in adversity, or in opportunity to witness for his Master. There was a quaintness, not to be identified alone with keen intelligence and advancing years, but that was ever on edge for the genuinely humorous, and also saw and seized the apt comparisons of life or literature, giving to his companionship a certain lightness that was always happy, and beautifully tempered with Christian grace. Bishop Tucker, in his last Council address, referred to him in these words: "It was a benediction to know him. A man true to the traditions of his family, gentle and yet strong, scholarly, and full of spiritual fervor."

It is of these two last mentioned qualities, his scholarship and his spiritual life I shall speak in further characterization of Dr. Meade. There is evidence that his scholarship was always thorough, discriminating, and of that type which preserved the human and imaginative element in the study of truth. It was a natural consequence that he had left, in his advancing years, that certain mark of real learning, the ability and the zest to enjoy what had been learned, and the constant reaching out for fresh sources of inspiration for intellectual life. He had, happily indeed, the benediction of true scholarship; an appreciation of the books of his day, however far spent his day, with mental powers still keen to absorb the new literature, and yet able to keep a sane balance for more matured thought. He was alert and vigorous in public questions, sympathetic for certain advancements which were not yet popular in his native State.

And now, with reference to his spiritual life and his ministry, what is written is from the knowledge of this man of God in his years of retirement and, as I reflect others, from the knowledge of those who came in touch with his ministry from the time of his first coming to Roanoke.

It is to be remembered that Dr. Meade was nearly fifty years old when he began his rectorship of St. John's Church. With very few exceptions, then, our knowledge of the man is in the middle and maturer years of his life. We knew him in the finer years of tempered balance. What, especially in a new city, was taken frequently for over-moderation and excess of conservation, was the result of a spiritual equanimity that saw further than the demand for more evident and material results. This spiritual ideal for the exercise of his ministry remained with him. "Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." The time came to him, as it does in every ministry that preserves loyally its high trust, that men who saw materially, rather than spiritually, were not patient with the consistent preservation of his ideal. It was so with the dear Lord who sent him on his mission as a minister and priest among His people. With whatever humility, Dr. Meade could say of himself, "It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful;" he knew the high sense of a calling from above, a calling from God to witness in the things of God to the needs of man. These things possessed him. "With me," he could join in St. Paul's saying, "with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you or of man's judgment, yea I judge not mine own self—he that judgeth me is the Lord."

In this connection I cannot but think of the application of all this to the current quickly read thought of the day that makes of the ministry and its message the thing that the pew, the Donald Hankeys and the H. G. Wells would create. It is an apt saying; "No one can be trusted to define another man's vocation. Never can priest and prophet safely trust the layman to define the responsibilities and stewardship of the Church."

How truly did Dr. Meade live in his ministry, not apart from the world, but above worldly conceptions of that sacred office to which he had given his life as God's servant, and as the trusted steward of the mysteries of God.

Again, he kept himself independent of the worldling's view that wanted the minister to be hail fellow well met with the man of the street, and to play soft pedal on many of its weaknesses. How finely one of our Church papers put this recently:

"We do not know that it is essential that the clergyman should feel perfectly at home with the man of the world, but we are certain that it is more desperately necessary than his being a good mixer that he should impress the man of the world and the genial rake that the Church is fitted by its stewardship of the mysteries of God to tell worldlings some truths for their everlasting benefit that cannot be learned at the club or in the street."

"The patronizing nod that the parson, when he aims to be a good fellow, receives from the man of the world is not always worth all that it costs. It will carry him further towards the 'efficiency' for which he was ordained if he, through converse with the things of God, has come to understand the heart of a saint and has learned how to tell dying world-sick sinners the meaning of the forgiveness and the love of Christ."

The spirit, our friend had received "was not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God." Surely his was "the mind of Christ." He laid "no other foundation than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." There was wisdom in his preaching as well as the clear evangel of the redeeming Christ. With the message of the "Christ crucified" he spoke of "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God." His repeated witness in word and life, and physical stature even, was that "the weakness of God is stronger than man." No doubt always, certainly as age came on, he more and more wrapped himself in the spirit of personal devotion. His knowledge of devotional literature was broad and thorough. It permeated his every public address. Those who have led the music of this church will remember the love of music that brought him often in bitter weather to choir practice and his reverent enjoyment of the Church's music.

When he laid down his life, long spent in the Master's service, somehow none of us, especially none who had been close beside him in the chancel, could think of death in that presence. There was so little of the body. There was so much of the spirit. In him life eternal was made visible.

THE MINISTRY AND THE NEW AGE.

An Essay read before the North-western Convocation of the Diocese of West Virginia, by the Rev. R. E. L. Strider.

(The Editor regrets the cruel treatment this excellent paper has received at the hands of his blue pencil.)

The mighty, worldwide catastrophe in the midst of which we find ourselves is making itself felt more and more in every aspect of human life. By the time the war shall have ended there will remain hardly anything just as it was before. It is inconceivable that the Christian Church remain unaffected. When peace is finally declared it will be a new world in which the Church will find herself. It will be a somewhat different humanity to which the Church must then direct her words and her energies. There will be thousands of cripples cast back upon our shores like driftwood from the sea; there will be mourners to be comforted, and bitter souls to be tempered and sweetened. Hundreds of thousands of young men will come back to us sobered and saddened by the glimpse they have caught into the black depths of war's hell, around whom the new race must crystallize. A wrecked world will need to be rebuilt, and humanity, rendered more thoughtful by its narrow escape, rehabilitated. For us in America, will dawn besides, those new cares and duties incident to the passing of our country out from provincialism and youth into the stern business of mature manhood and worldwide responsibility. In view, then, of these numerous changes it behooves the Christian Church to be making herself ready for the new and difficult day that lies ahead.

Will the Ministry of the Church, as at present constituted and equipped, be equal to the tasks of the future? Wherever the fault may lie, I am sure that I am not hopelessly pessimistic in saying that the Church will fail somewhat in attaining her high destiny in the new age if the efficiency of her official ministry be not somehow increased. If that be true then, how may the increase in efficiency be brought about? The answer will, partly at least, indicate the cause of the condition that makes the question necessary.

1. The first duty of the Church to the new ministry of the future falls under the head of her preparation of the Clergy for their work. That the training offered to young men looking forward to the sacred ministry is inadequate, scarcely admits of reasonable denial. It is a readjustment and a modernizing that the seminaries stand in need of to-day.

There can be no question that many of the seminaries have been woefully deficient in their teaching of that most essential subject, Pastoral Theology. This should be the course in which students are taught how to apply the theories they may have learned to the practical details of the work in which they are about to engage. How can young theological students, having dipped into Hebrew, Greek, Sociology, Polity, Liturgies, Church History and Theology, be expected to go out and bring all this mass of theory successfully to bear upon the problems of modern life, unless they have also had a thorough course in Pastoral Theology? We might as well set out to make a man a musician by teaching him the history and theory of music. Pastoral Theology offers a sort of gradual transition from the academic curriculum to the sudden plunge into life's stern reality. An adequate course in this subject, pointing out the more troublesome problems, warning against dangers and pitfalls, with a sane discussion of methods, is both invaluable and indispensable.

I have examined the catalogues of many of our seminaries, and I have received the impression that Pastoral Theology is a minor subject, rather than in a sense the major of majors. If no more were accomplished than to impress the students with the importance of the study it would be much to be thankful for. Alas, some of us discover that Pastoral Theology is essential when we sit, like that famous classical personage, amidst the ruins of some wrecked parochial Carthage, and wonder how it all happened. The Church pays dearly now and then that the minds of her Clergy may be enlightened in the sadness of some tragic aftermath. Again, it is no disrespect to the scholars who occupy the chairs at our seminaries to say that they are not the ones to teach Pastoral Theology. They are too often out of touch with parish life. The one to teach this branch is he who comes fresh from the firing line of parochial duty. Every seminary should be endowed with a fund sufficient to call within its walls each year three or four clergymen, conspicuously successful in parish administration, to lecture on Pastoral Theology to the middle and senior classes. Such lectures would, of course, supplement the more academic discussions of the classroom.

A word or two on the teaching of business methods in our seminaries. A clergyman cannot be a specialist in complicated business matters. He is not expected to finance railroads and organize corporations. But he is expected to pay his debts, to keep a set of books, to understand something of the principles of banking, to live approximately within his salary, and to account in a business-like way for every penny not his own that passes through his hands. Even on that Olympus, where the gods of Episcopacy dwell, there has been at times shortcoming in certain of these respects. If young men entering the seminary have had no training to these ends they should not be allowed to begin parish work until they have had it. A portion of the middle or senior year could be devoted to the purpose, with the result that much sorrow and damage might afterward be avoided.

2. One very necessary requirement for greater clerical effectiveness is some sort of standard of efficiency. In the business and professional world there is a standard to which all must conform, and that standard finds its sanction in a motive more vital than personal inclination or pride. I know the danger of applying worldly standards and tests to the affairs of the Church, and I do not for one moment counsel that. But I do think that when a clergyman is commissioned and guaranteed a living he ought to be made to know that the Church will not tolerate idleness and inefficiency, much less indifference, in the discharge of his duty. Clergymen at present are subject to scarcely any requirements of a definite nature. The Church has no standard of efficiency, and can only say, "Beware, young man, lest you deny an article of the Creed, or commit a crime; in which case you shall be tried." Why not say to a clergyman being instituted, in language that he cannot fail to comprehend, "You are placed in this Parish to be faithful, and if you will not be faithful you may be no longer steward." Such of the Clergy as are faithful would welcome such a supervision. Then the churches would know officially who is worthy, so that when positions of responsibility are vacant they would have something more definite and reliable to base their selection upon than the word of the would-be incumbent and his promoters.

3. One way to meet this problem would be to have a commission for the purpose of enabling clergymen who have been unsuccessful to secure other positions in the Church where their abilities could be used to better advantage, perhaps to their ultimate success. It is by no means fair to assume that because a man has failed in one position he will therefore fail in all. On the contrary, the presumption is that every man can do good work somewhere, and it is the business of the Church to help him find his place. There are men who would make excellent assistants, but cannot successfully administer a Parish. Some are born teachers. I have heard of those whose only qualification for clerical work seemed to be a good voice. Very well, let the Church show a willingness to aid such an one to find a position where reading the service will be the principal duty. One who has a talent for preaching, for administration, or for pastoral work, should be allowed to exercise and develop such powers, for they are all too rare. I am not pleading for specialization in the Church but only for official assistance to those who are trying to find their places.

4. As a means to this end, I believe the establishment of a longer diaconate would be valuable. At present the diaconate is a perfunctory formality in many cases. We have much to say about the three orders of the ministry, but practically we have only two. The diaconate is a period of time, too often shortened, and not an office at all. Young men are restive under it. They chafe at the delay, and fancy that their "work" is being interfered with by having to wait six months or a year for priest's orders. And the Church officially encourages such a feeling. Now, all this might be very different if the period of the diaconate were longer, say, five years, and if it were made a time of trial, probation and apprenticeship, upon which the whole future might depend. Before ordination to the priesthood there could be an investigation into the fruits and achievements of the diaconate to ascertain whether it were worthy of promotion to wider service. Such, we are taught, is the method pursued by Almighty God in bestowing the blessings of higher life, and it could, therefore, scarcely be construed as unworthy of the Church.

5. One more suggestion needs to be made. The Church must guarantee to the Clergy a living salary. All honor to her for her all too tardy awakening to the need of Clergy pensions. But now having safeguarded the rights of the superannuated and the dead, she should turn her attention to those who are still alive. * * *

These, then, are some of the duties which the Church owes to that new and better ministry needed to carry on her work in the new age. But the Clergy must do something to make that new and better ministry a reality.

6. We hear much to-day of the "humanity" of the Clergy, and assuredly the ministers of the gospel should be human. By all means let us be sociable, sympathetic, approachable and friendly, but let us never forget that the moment we cease to be indefinitely different from men of the world we begin to lose our usefulness as ministers. Even he who would entice us into the pleasures and amusements of the world will despise us if we forget who we are. * * *

The minister must estimate character above all else. Neither intellect, nor personal magnetism, nor ability as a preacher, nor anything conceivable, can take the place of character. The clergyman must exemplify as well as preach the gospel. His greatest sermons will be preached not on Sunday, but as he moves among his people during the week. When a ministry begins to esteem anything more than character that ministry already has become decadent. The new age will demand that the Clergy lead the way in the noble art of living. * * *

7. Preaching is one of the clergyman's richest opportunities. The pulpit when occupied by a strong, manly, righteous voice is one of the most far-reaching mediums for good known. Through the pulpit we instruct our people in the ways of truth and life; through the pulpit we strengthen the faint, encourage the baffled, soothe the sorrowing, convert the sinner; through the pulpit we educate public opinion on the great moral questions of the day. Happy is he who is called to stand in a pulpit and lift up his voice on the Lord's side. We hear it said that this age does not desire to be preached at, that the power of the pulpit is declining, etc., but it is not true. When the right kind of preaching is to be had the people gladly hear. Preaching based upon the ever-living Word, directed to men's and women's real needs, illustrated and enforced by reference to present-day problems and conditions, all delivered with sincere conviction—this sort never has gone, and will never go, out of fashion. Such preaching the people, both within and without the Church, are as ready to hear to-day as in the times of St. Paul, Savonarola or Phillips Brooks. I am quite sure that many of us could be more effective preachers than we are.

8. In regard to reading the service, it is lamentable how frequently we hear our service positively butchered, the inherent beauty of it but serving to intensify the unattractiveness with which it may be rendered. Reading the Prayer Book service well is first of all a question of naturalness and ease of manner. Attempts at dramatic and elocutionary flights spoil it, but a reverent attitude, supplemented by the voice that we most easily assume when we are not thinking of it, is all in the way of elocution that we need. Add to these a mind intent upon what is being read, not wandering to the four corners of space, and especially striving not to be rehearsing the sermon while the service is in progress. Above all, let there be spiritual appreciation of what is being read. The lessons are sometimes unintelligible to the congregation because they are hopelessly so to us. If we really understand what we read, and think of ourselves as interpreters of it to the congregation, then there is nothing to fear.

9. And now before I close I must have a word on the personal touch of the Clergy. Inefficiency on the part of ministers of Christ is frequently due to failure to keep in close personal contact with the people. He who sees most of his people, who talks much with them face to face, who enters their homes and sits at their tables, who discusses their work with them, and shows an interest in all that concerns them, will do the most successful work. He who enters into the life of his people will be heard with interest and profit when he mounts the pulpit to preach. If we minister faithfully to the sick, comfort those who mourn, enter our people's homes regularly and as often as we can, remembering always that we, like the Master, are come to seek and save the lost, then we need not tremble for our stewardship.

There is a glorious future ahead for the Church. When the great war is over there will be a boundless field ready-prepared for the sowing, spread out before her. If the Church will but awake to the situation, endeavoring to realize what she owes to the equipment and safeguarding of those through whom she must do her work; and if the Clergy themselves will arouse their souls to the true nature of what they are called to do, ceasing to be clergymen in a half-hearted, partial sense, settling down under God to do their best; then we may meet the new age as eager men await the daybreak, with assurance and expectant hope. But be it known once for all that if the Church and the Clergy do not awake, then the new age will cast us aside like broken and useless tools. But I have no fears. God's arm is not shortened. The living Christ still works, and His gospel is still the one thing that the world cannot possibly do without. In that thought we take courage.

The world of men has become wearied unto death of man-made doctrines and denominational interpretations of Divine Truth. That world is clamoring for "unity" of Christian effort. The soul-hungry and spirit-starving man wants the follower of Christ to come to him with something real—wants him to "speak as one having authority." This world-man asks, "What is truth?" One said, "I am the truth!" So today the world-man wants the follower of that One to say, "I am feeding upon the Truth, and I can show you the Truth and you may abide in Him." Do not be led astray longer by the American clamor for "something new!" Your soldier boys and those with whom they are allied in their cold, far-away loneliness, offering their precious young lives for a democracy which shall be safe for the world, do not want those new things—they want the Simple Prayers and old love-borne gospel of the Truth! They want the assurance that the folks at home are learning to live vitally and pray affirmatively. A stricken world begs us of America to revive the true catholic power of faith with all the authority of "the Truth once delivered to the saints," not in any sectarian narrowness, but with a real and vital desire to bring about that unity which shall bring all men as one unto Him!—Rev. C. N. Tyndell; Lenten Letter.

BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW AT CAMP SHERMAN.

The enlisted man who uses profane language is made to do double duty washing dishes. This is the novel punishment decreed by one of the groups, working under the direction of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew Camp Secretary, at Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, O.

Reports from the Camp Secretaries indicate that the groups of enlisted men, in nearly every cantonment, are entering actively upon a program of personal work. These men discourage profanity, gambling and immorality. They encourage attendance at church service and at celebrations of the Holy Communion.

By kind words and thoughtful acts they help the "other fellow" on all occasions. Theirs is a mission of uplift. They are an army within the national army, working quietly and unostentatiously for righteousness. Who shall estimate the far-reaching effect of their endeavor?

A church has been opened for soldiers at Camp Sherman, bearing the name of the Church of the Centurion. (It will be distinctly a soldiers' church, as the name indicates, and it will minister to hundreds of enlisted men, irrespective of their denominational affiliations.

The church building has a social room, which is open every day and evening, a quiet, homelike place, where the men can read, write letters and swap experiences.

The Rev. T. W. Attridge has given up his work at Christ Church, Cincinnati, to take charge of the Church of the Centurion. He and Mrs. Attridge will live in the church building, and their presence will make the social room a real home for the men of the camp.

John T. Price, Camp Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew at Camp Sherman, is assisting the Rev. Mr. Attridge.

THE PALESTINE OF THE FUTURE.

(Church News Association, 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, New York.)

A commission composed of scientific men from the ranks of Jews of the United States, Great Britain and Russia will start early next month for Palestine, there to make careful surveys of boundaries, to study water supplies and sanitation, and to determine upon methods by which Jerusalem shall become a healthy city. The Russian members of the commission are already in London, where they have conferred not only with the British Government, but have also met representatives of that other strong branch of Judaism, the men from Spain. It is known that the British Government is anxious to have the commission in Palestine at the earliest possible moment, without waiting for the end of the war. It is not yet determined who shall comprise the American members of the commission.

A friendly discussion has arisen over the name of the political state which Jews of the world hope to establish in the Holy Land. The Jews of Jerusalem are said not to favor the name Palestine, oftenest employed by Jews of England and America, saying it has no significance. They favor Judea as the name, saying it rests on a historical and sentimental basis. It is said by Jews here to be the purpose of the British Government to bring into existence four small states, each to be politically independent, and under British protection, or the protection of the league of nations which is to follow the war. These four are Armenia, Lebanon, Judea, or Palestine, as may yet be determined, and Arabia, the last named the land of the Muslims. Judea is to extend on the north to Damascus and Beirut, but does not include those cities.

Jews of the United States and of Great Britain are each in the midst of campaigns for $2,000,000, half in each country, to restore prostrate Palestine institutions, and especially to maintain the schools and carry on provisional government until such time as the republic can be set up. It is not held that this sum will be sufficient, but that it is a start. The American $1,000,000 is subscribed up to $800,000, and at the present rate of progress the goal will be reached early in March. Even Jews of Russia are assisting as far as they are able. They adopted the unique plan of imposing an income tax upon themselves.

Jews throughout the world express gratitude to Great Britain in terms that know almost no bounds. The reasons are not only that Jewish aspirations of two thousand years are now to be realized, but that British statesmen are actively interesting themselves in plans for the new Jewish state, and the welfare of the people at this crisis. For example, the British Government found time, the other day, to ask Jewish committees in London and New York whether they had seen to it that farmers in Palestine are supplied with seed for crops to be put in this spring. And along with the inquiry was an offer to fill a requisition for seeds.

Since the taking of Jerusalem the Jews of Palestine have set to work to revive their ancient tongue, unused for two thousand years. This tongue is the Hebrew of Bible times, only modernized where necessary. It is said to have become quite out of fashion, to utter words in any language employed before General Allenby took possession. Day and night schools have been set up to teach Hebrew, and letters to Jews of the world, coming from Palestine, are beginning to employ the tongue of twenty centuries ago.

Already it is planned to erect in Jerusalem the University of Jerusalem, to be the centre of Jewish culture and learning of the world. A site has been tentatively agreed upon, said to be about midway between the two great synagogues of the city. It is said that these synagogues are large enough to serve as the principal places of Jewish worship. Hence, at present no new and imposing synagogue is talked of. The commission soon to start from London, already referred to, will take up the matter of an educational system for Jerusalem and the entire Palestine state, and its relation to the University of Jerusalem.

With the aid of Zionist funds and enthusiasm there was recently founded a Jewish Institute of Arts and Crafts. Greatly crippled by war conditions and now to be restored, it has already done much to adjust one grave problem. For centuries it has been the custom of pious Jews of many countries to go to Jerusalem to pray and to die. They found the climate so healthful they often failed to die, and had to be maintained by charity. The Arts and Crafts Institute, interfering not at all with their praying, has taught these aged Jews to weave rugs, an easy and lucrative trade. However, these old men are but a small fraction of the institute's students. The far greater number are young men and women.

A WORD TO LETTER-WRITERS AT HOME.

(Church News Association.)

General Pershing in France, and the commanders of the cantonments throughout the Southern States, are appealing to parents of enlisted men to refrain from writing letters to sons and brothers that divert their minds from military training and patriotic ambitions. The government is asking churches to communicate these desires to parents and other friends of enlisted men, adding the information when so doing that if the war is to be won men who do the fighting must know not only military tactics but must also be imbued with the fighting spirit. Only so can the Huns be downed, say those in command of American boys. Similar desires were long ago expressed to the parents of England and France through the churches of those countries.

The commanders, in giving details, say that parents write all sorts of distracting news to the boys in the cantonments and in France—mortgages coming due and no money to meet them, buildings burned and details of losses, friends sick unto death and inquiries as to what to do if death actually comes, love affairs made and broken off, all to such extent that men are mentally unable to put their minds upon training, much less upon the aims of the war. The commanders are saying that this matter of letter writing to their men in training must be made a part of American military training of people at home. Ministers in many parts of the country are taking hold of the task of presenting the matter to families in their memberships and communities.

Her Children Shall Rise Up and Call Her Blessed.

Ida Mason Burke.

She walked the ways of earth, so sweet in little things,
So great in goodness; so ever swift to bear
Burdens too heavy for the sorrowful,
Nor faltered 'neath the weight of human care.

She walked with God. She was so pure in heart
She saw His presence in the least of men;
And ever listening to her Master's voice,
She learned through Him to call the outcast "friend."

And when at last God called her to Himself
Her spirit was so ready to be free,
That those who looked upon her sleeping, knew
It was not death, but crowning victory.

A Simple Message.

He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it.—S. Matthew 10:39.

The greatest find is one's self. And it is never accidental. The result is always by following along a prescribed course. That course consists of the willingness and determination to spend the best thought and activity for others. On the surface it appears to be loss. But actually it is gain. Christ established this course by His own matchless life—He really lived for men. Because of this He is the outstanding man. Only as we follow His example can we experience our largest self.—The Witness.

The Great Commission

Board of Missions—Receipts.

Mr. King reports that up to February 1 there was a falling off of $14,699 from the receipts of the corresponding period of last year. Reminding us of the great needs confronting the missionary operations of the Church, he continues:

"In the present year of grace the opportunities before the Church are so immense that she is challenged, as never since history began has she been challenged before. Everywhere the mists of ignorance and oppression are rolling away. Nations, waking from the night of medieval barbarism, turn eagerly toward the dawn, and the flames of the Church's lamp must burn very brightly if she is to show them the way. And unless the rays are strong enough to penetrate into the farthest corners of the world, what then? We shall have failed in our greatest opportunity; have proved ourselves unworthy of our trust, unworthy of our men who have given all they had and gone forth to face death for our ideals.

"But we shall not fail. Once the people of our country realize that a need is vital, there is no question of their refusing to meet it. Our bill is high this year, higher too probably by $200,000 than we expected it to be, because by so much has the war increased the rates of exchange for the China Missions. But the work is imperative and the bill must be paid. We ask you to help us, men and women of America, with full confidence in your answer. You have never failed us; you will not fail us now.

"GEORGE GORDON KING,
"Treasurer."

The Igorot children of Easter School, Baguio, Philippine Islands, have sent to Bishop Brent, who is now in France, $24 for the relief of Belgian orphans. At a special service held for the Baguio people, $50 were given and sent to Bishop Brent for any purpose that commended itself to him.

Some Chinese girls, inmates of an Orphan Asylum, desirous of having a part in the Lenten offering for missions, came to their matron with this request: "We haven't any money, but you pay money for what we eat every day. If we will, all forty of us, eat less every day will you figure up what you save on our food bill and let us have a mite box and put the money for the food we don't eat into it to help carry the message of Jesus to the people up in Shensi Province who haven't heard it yet?" The matron said she would do it for them, and on Easter morning there was one mite box with eight Chinese dollars in it and a little slip of paper with Chinese characters on it which mean "Scholars' Less-Food Contribution." When you think that ten cents will feed one scholar one whole day and there were eighty times ten cents in the box, it means that those forty girls went without right much food.

The Philippine Leper Mission: Mr. John W. Shannon, Treasurer of the Philippine Mission, says:

"The Philippines has the largest leper colony in the world at Culion Island. It houses over 4,500 people and is said to be the most modern settlement in the world, which speaks well for this government. A small Protestant church graces the island and there are about two hundred in the congregation."

The Missionary as a Guide Book.

Some years ago in Tokyo I met Carl Crow. I was about to take my first plunge into China, and was then carrying in my grip Crow's guide-book to the country. "What suggestions have you for the trip?" I asked. "How can I see China best?" "Go to the missionaries," replied Crow. Then he modestly added that his guide-book was largely a compilation of information which he had collected from the missionaries. "They are the only people," he explained, "who really know the country." I have had frequent occasion to test this assertion and I feel impelled to record that it is profoundly true. The temples and the bazaars have their value in introducing one to the country, but they chiefly give one a glimpse of what the past has been. The people who are the present, and who are determining the future, cannot be found there. If one wishes to see the Orient that is, one will have to make very generous use of the missionary. And yet very few tourists see him at all. The missionary is often the one person available who understands both the language of the tourist and the language of the country; but more important is the fact that often he alone understands why one asks the questions one does. He knows the background of the questioner's mind and is at the same time intimately familiar with the life about which the question is asked. The English-speaking native may understand one's words, but unless he belongs to the very limited class of those who have been educated abroad he is practically at a loss to understand why any one would ask such a fool question anyhow.—From "What Asia Thinks of Missionaries," by Tyler Dennet in January "Asia."

Fellowship by Prayer.

Above all other means, prayer is the most efficient in creating and strengthening the consciousness of God's presence. The very act of prayer brings us into fellowship with Him to whom we speak. Think of prayer as Christ did when He sought the companionship as well as the guidance of His Father. It is not a duty, but a privilege; not a matter of petitioning, but of fellowship, seeking the inspiration and strengthening that comes with the sense of being with one who is an unfailing, sympathetic and sufficient Friend, in whose love is no flaw and whose wisdom never errs.—Selected.

A Prayer for Inward Peace.

Almighty God, Who art the only source of health and healing, the spirit of calm and the central peace of the universe; Grant to us, Thy children, such a consciousness of Thy indwelling presence as may give us utter confidence in Thee. In all pain and weariness and anxiety, may we throw ourselves upon Thy besetting care, that knowing ourselves fenced about by Thy loving omnipotence, we may permit Thee to give us health and strength and peace; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.—("The Class Prayer" of the class in Personal Religion, St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston, Mass.)

Church Intelligence

FOR THE NEEDS OF THE GENERAL WORK OF THE CHURCH.

Important Action Taken, Looking to Raising One and a Half Million Dollars.

Upon the invitation of the officers of the Board of Missions, a number of Church men and women from the sections of the country included in Provinces I, II, III and V met at the Church Missions House recently to confer upon the possibility of taking steps to meet the present urgent needs in the Church's general work. It was recognized that 1918 is certain to be a critical year. Church people are giving much time and energy on behalf of war needs. Seventy-five thousand Churchmen are already in the ranks of the new army. Many of the clergy, some of them from the leading parishes of the country, are serving in connection with the War Commission or the Y. M. C. A. in the Army and Navy.

The Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and numerous war funds are making appeals to meet compelling war needs. Under these circumstances it is possible that the absolute requirements for the Church's Mission may be overlooked to some extent, unless they are placed fairly before the people of the Church. On the other hand, the wonderful response of the nation to the call of the Government through the Red Cross, and the more than generous gifts that have been made through other agencies, show clearly that the people of the country are not only ready to give for a cause that they consider vital, but are ready to make real sacrifices for it.

In view of this situation, the Conference considered the question:

Would it be right to allow this spirit of sacrificial giving to be expressed chiefly through agencies outside of the Church, while the Church makes no concerted effort to call forth a similar spirit of giving on behalf of the fundamental matters entrusted to her?

The Conference took note of such facts as these:

1. That the Board of Missions and the General Board of Religious Education closed their last fiscal year with deficits.

2. That the Social Service Commission has plans which it is unable to carry out for lack of funds:

3. That several of the schools federated under the American Church Institute for Negroes are hampered in their work because their incomes are insufficient to meet the increased cost of operation.

The question was asked:

Would it be practicable for these various agencies for once to make common cause and present to the Church in one statement the needs of the various activities for which they are responsible, instead of allowing each to carry its load alone? Would it be possible to go a step further and to ask the domestic missionary bishops, all of whom have to carry a heavy load of anxiety in providing for that portion of the salaries of their clergy not provided for by the appropriations of the Board of Missions, to pool their needs and so present to the Church a unified statement and make a united appeal on behalf of these needs?

After hearing the statement of conditions in the field at home and abroad from the Rev. T. R. Ludlow, of China; Bishop Touret, of Western Colorado; Dr. Teusler, of Japan; Dr. Gardiner, of the General Board of Religious Education, and the Rev. F. M. Crouch, of the Commission on Social Service, the Conference appointed a Committee to formulate the judgment of the Conference for presentation to the agencies whose work had been under discussion. Upon the recommendation of the Committee the Conference adopted the following statement:

That this Conference recommends to the Board of Missions, General Board of Religious Education, and the Joint Commission on Social Service, that plans be adopted at once to make provision for an additional sum for at least one and one-half millions of dollars to provide for the immediate needs of the Board of Missions, General Board of Religious Education, and the Joint Commission on Social Service, and the American Church Institute for Negroes.

That the Conference further recommends that a complete expert study of the Church's work in all fields as well as the ability to give be undertaken immediately, and that a commission of the ablest men whose services can be secured be appointed or employed by the three Boards, to put before the Church a plan which will adequately support the work already undertaken as well as furnish necessary funds for increased activities throughout this country and the whole world.

That a Committee be appointed from this Conference to present these recommendations to the Board of Missions at its next meeting, and to the other Boards and Commissions at the earliest possible moment.

On February 6 the Committee, through its Chairman, Mr. Oliver J. Sands, of Richmond, presented the matter to the Board of Missions. The Board immediately appointed a committee of five, consisting of the Very Rev. Carol M. Davis, Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, Messrs. Oliver J. Sands, Charles E. Mason and Dr. J. H. Gillard, to study the report and make recommendations to the Board.

This committee, through its Chairman, Dean Davis, submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Board of Missions has heard with interest of the general plans proposed by a committee appointed at a conference of Church men and women on January the 30th for securing the means necessary to meet the needs of this Board during 1918 and learn from it the needs for the next five years and to determine the method to be adopted to meet these needs. The Board gives its cordial assent to the general purpose of the committee and authorizes it to proceed with a committee of five from the Board in a plan to create a national committee composed of representatives from dioceses and missionary districts in the country in such a way that each Province shall be represented. From this general committee an executive committee may be appointed to supervise the carrying out of the purpose of this resolution.

Resolved, further, That the Board of Missions requests the committee hereby authorized to consult with the General Board of Religious Education, the Joint Commission on Social Service and the American Church Institute for Negroes, or other like agencies of the Church, for the purpose of unifying and co-ordinating the needs of the Church and securing annually a sum sufficient to conduct adequately the various branches of the work of the Church.

Vigorous steps are now being taken to secure the organization of the National and Executive Committee provided for by the resolution. While no date for the concerted effort has yet been decided upon, it has been proposed that the week April 28 to May 5, both inclusive, should be selected for this purpose.

The needs which it is proposed to meet by this special effort would include, among other things, the deficit of the Board of Missions, the heavy extra expense to which it has been put through its entrance into the Pension System on behalf of missionaries at home and abroad and the great rise in the cost of silver in the Orient, certain building operations to which it is already obligated, such as St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, the Church Hospital at Wuchang and St. Paul's College, Tokyo, the requirements of the Domestic Missionary Bishops in addition to the appropriations of the Board, the plans of the General Board of Religious Education to meet the opportunities resulting from the war in reaching the students of the country, and numerous other items.

High Cost of Foreign Exchange.

In even figures the American people are giving $22,000,000 a year to spread Christianity throughout countries other than their own, and they are finding that the war and its effect upon exchange are costing them $2,500,000, possibly more, for the payment of exchange. For example, one society that has extensive work in countries on a silver basis finds it costs $500,000 a year more to buy the Mexican dollars required by those countries than the same dollars cost five years ago. Another society puts its added expense at $375,000. These sums cover the exchanges on funds used not merely to pay salaries of missionaries, but to maintain schools, hospitals and in many instances to maintain native workers.

A curious condition is assisting remittances of American money to the Near East. There wealthy men and business houses, often of the Islam faith, fear the confiscation of their money. To get it out of the country, sometimes to use in business here, but oftener to invest and so keep it out of enemy's hands at home, are going to agents of American missionary societies and depositing it. The cable instructs the societies here to pay the money to banks or business houses, and the transaction is complete. The American money has never gone to the field—and yet it has. Exchange is saved and so is the expense of transmitting gold. So far as American societies can learn, every German missionary has been driven from every foreign field.

Armenian and Syrian Relief.

The office of the American Committee, No. 1, Madison Avenue, New York, reports generous contributions, $125,493.99 having been received during the week ending February 5th. Advices from the workers administering relief in Western Asia, however, indicate the pitiable insufficiency of the means afforded them to meet the demands made by the suffering and privation to which they minister. Still larger contributions are needed to bring these destitute people through the winter and to enable them again to win their own support in some measure.

The Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, having offered to do any work at the Church Missions House or in the field that the Board of Missions might desire, the Board at its meeting on February 6 authorized the officers to make such arrangements as might be practicable to secure Bishop Jones' assistance for work at the Church Missions House until April 10, when it is expected that the House of Bishops will meet to consider his resignation as Bishop of Utah.

Late Tidings From Bishop Lloyd: A cable was received at the Missions House on the 13th instant from Bishop Lloyd, sent via Dakar Tabou, in which he reported that all was going well.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Rev. John Lloyd, who is a private in Ambulance Company No. 33, at Camp Green, Charlotte, N. C., will be advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Gibson in St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, on Sunday, February 24. Mr. Lloyd will be presented by the rector of St. Andrew's, the Rev. J. F. Ribble, and the sermon will be preached by the Rev. E. P. Dandridge, of Petersburg.

Miss Helen Littell, of the Church General Hospital, Wuchang, China, will be in Richmond on Wednesday, February 27, and will speak in the Sunday-school room of St. Paul's Church at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and in the evening at 8:15, at a drawing room meeting in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas M. Moore, 819 West Franklin Street.

Miss Littell is one of the most interesting missionary speakers in the Church, and is remembered with much pleasure by a great many Richmond women, who had the privilege of hearing her in Charlottesville in November. An urgent appeal is made to all women, especially members of the Woman's Auxiliary, to take advantage of this opportunity to hear her speak.

The Rev. W. Roy Mason, rector of a large group of missions in Greene County, Va., will speak in the interest of mountain missions at St. James Church, Richmond, on Friday afternoon, March 1, at 5 o'clock.

Mr. Mason is an interesting speaker, and his long and varied experience in the mountain work qualifies him to present its cause with full understanding of its needs and promise.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerrey, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, of the Missionary District of Asheville, N. C., has accepted work under the Bishop of South Carolina. Mr. Morgan will have charge of the work of the Church at three important points, viz., Bamwell, Allendale and Blackville.

The Rev. W. S. Poyner, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Birmingham, Ala., has accepted the call to the rectorship of St. John's Church, Florence, S. C.

The Rev. A. S. Thomas will remain as rector of St. David's Church, Cheraw, S. C., until April 1. After that date Mr. Thomas becomes rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbia, S. C.

The Rev. C. W. Frazer, of Cuba, has been called to St. Helena's Church, Beaufort, S. C.

The Rev. W. B. Guoin, rector of the Church of the Holy Comforter, Atlanta, Ga., has accepted the rectorship of St. Jude's Church, Walterboro, S. C., and entered upon his duties the first Sunday in Lent.

The Rev. Oliver Hart has successfully passed the examination for a chaplaincy in the United States Army and is awaiting orders.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

St. Luke's Church of Powhatan County is proud to have fourteen stars on her service flag, which was raised Sunday, February 17, near the chancel. The names are as follows: Brigadier-General Henry Jervey, Colonel James Jervey, Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Macon Wesson, Major B. Randolph Kennon, Captain William G. Kennon, Lieutenant Robert S. Pendleton, Second Lieutenant William Carter Lee, Second Lieutenant James Dudley Pendleton. The "noncoms" are: First Sergeant Robert R. Lee, Jr., Corporal George Lee, Corporal Edmund Pendleton, Cadet Wilton Johnson, Privates Jack Silverwood and John Richardson. With the exception of one these boys all volunteered. Corporal George Lee has seen service with the Canadian troops in France.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

The ninety-first Annual Council of the Diocese of Mississippi was held in St. Andrew's Church, Jackson, on Tuesday, January 22. In spite of the inclement weather, which was the coldest known in the South for forty years, there was a good attendance and the spirit of the Council was excellent.

The Council met in the midst of preparations for an Every-Member Canvass in St. Andrew's Parish. Bishop Bratton for one week before the Council had the Rev. Robert W. Patton, D. D., the Rev. Louis Wood, and the Rev. F. L. Clarke in the Diocese in an educational campaign for missions. Their work came to a climax at the Council when a good part of the time, night and day, was given over to these secretaries, who, while conducting the campaign for St. Andrew's, also conducted the campaign at the Council for the benefit of the delegates. This is to be followed by an Every-Member Canvass in the interest of missions throughout the whole Diocese conducted by a group of clergymen appointed at a conference after the Council. The campaign will be completed by mid-Lent.

The Bishop, thinking to let nothing interfere with the Diocesan campaign for missions, was about to withdraw the request for a coadjutor. When this became known among the clergy they held a conference on Wednesday and appointed the Rev. Albert Martin to see that certain resolutions were adopted. At the afternoon session Mr. Martin called for a committee of the whole with Judge D. W. Houston in the chair. Resolutions were adopted calling for the election of a coadjutor as soon as possible; increasing the assessment of each parish and mission 75 per cent. to meet the salary of the proposed coadjutor until such a time as an endowment of $50,000 could be raised; and placing a man in the Diocese to raise this endowment. These resolutions became resolutions of the Council when the committee rose, and it is hoped that a coadjutor will be elected within this year. Bishop Bratton, although recovered from his operation, is not a well man and the extent of the Diocese is vast.

Although this year was only eight months long, reports of financial committees showed large balances on hand, a great many parishes and missions having met their assessments on a twelve-month basis.

Standing Committee: The Rev. William Mercer Green, the Rev. J. Lundy Sykes, the Rev. Albert Martin, the Rev. L. W. Rose. Lay: Judge L. Brame, Marcellus Green, Dr. Dunbar Rowland, P. S. Gardiner.

Secretary: The Rev. Albert Martin, Yazoo City.

Treasurer: Mr. I. W. Richardson, Meridian.

Registrar: The Rev. Nowell Logan, D. D., Pass Christian.

Chancellor: A. M. Pepper, Lexington.

By an amendment to the canons, Jackson, as being the central point in the State, was made the permanent meeting place of the Council.

ASHEVILLE.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Bratton Speaks at Trinity Church on Christian Education.

In connection with the campaign now going on in the Carolina Diocese to raise $250,000 for St. Mary's School, Raleigh, on Sunday morning, February 10, the Rt. Rev. Theodore D. Bratton, Bishop of Mississippi, preached on "The Responsibility of the Church to Education" at Trinity Church, Asheville. Bishop Bratton was formerly rector of St. Mary's School in Raleigh, and is an ardent advocate of Church schools and colleges and of this movement that has been inaugurated by the Trustees of St. Mary's School. A large congregation filled the church and the speaker preached a powerful and convincing sermon, setting forth the fundamental and permanent place that education occupies in the Christian system. The Bishop of Asheville was present, and in introducing the speaker urged the necessity of pressing this matter at once, notwithstanding the many calls of the day, that the school may be prepared when the war is over to carry on its constructive work. At the evening service Bishop Bratton spoke more particularly of the school and its wonderful contribution to society, Christian culture and the Church during its long life of seventy-five years.

In the afternoon the Rev. Francis M. Osborne, who is the Special Representative of the Trustees, in the movement to raise the $250,000 Fund, held a conference with the committee of representative men and women of the District to lay plans for a canvass throughout the District of Asheville. The work of preparing for such a canvass will be begun immediately, and it is hoped that by the time the canvassing now going on in the Dioceses of North Carolina and East Carolina is finished, the organization for work in the District of Asheville will be complete and canvassing will immediately follow.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

One important mission station (Clovis, N. M.), left vacant by Rev. W. S. Trowbridge, on his going to Santa Fe, N. M., is now supplied by Rev. Francis M. Bacon, who comes from Boulder, Colo. He is a graduate of the Seabury Divinity School, with a wide experience in missionary work in the West. He seems well fitted for work in this Missionary District.

A Greek Funeral. At our church in Gallup, N. M., on February 4 occurred the funeral of a Greek who was accidentally killed in one of the coal mines. About sixty of his countrymen were in attendance. The burial service, as provided in the Prayer Book, was used. In addition, the Lord's Prayer and the Nicene Creed were said in Modern Greek. As one of their number read the lesson in Greek the people arose and remained standing reverently.

At the close of the service in the church the coffin was removed to the vestibule, and there, as each Greek passed out, he made the sign of the cross, and then kissed on the forehead the body of the deceased.

At the grave portions of the burial service were also used in Greek. At the words of committal, instead of one, about a dozen persons each took a handful of earth and cast it upon the coffin.

The missionary, Rev. D. A. Sanford, visits these Greeks, scattered at various coal mining camps, doing what is possible to minister to them religiously.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, Jr., of Wilmington, Del., has accepted a call to the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Pittsburgh, and will enter his new field of labor soon after Easter.

Church Home. The Bishop of the Diocese made his annual visitation to the Home on the Feast of the Purification, confirming fifteen of the children at the afternoon service. The offerings for the day were devoted to the support of one of the "fatherless children of France," to be known as "The Church Home Child."

The Noonday Services under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Assembly of the Brotherhood of Saint Andrew are being held as usual in Trinity Church, Pittsburgh. On Ash-Wednesday the address was made by the rector of the parish, the Rev. E. S. Travers. Other speakers during February will be the Rev. George P. Atwater, of Akron, Ohio; the Rev. Dr. Karl Reiland, of St. George's, New York, and Bishop Howden, of New Mexico. The attendance at the opening service was exceedingly good.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

The people of Green River, Wyoming, are closing an energetic campaign by which they have purchased a splendid little rectory, to be added to the property of St. John's Church, Green River. The work in Green River is under the charge of the Rev. W. Hewton Ward, who has been directing the movement.

Christ Church, Cody, the Rev. Alan R. Chalmers, rector. At the close of December the final payment was made on the indebtedness of over $700 which had been over the church property for thirteen months. This was made possible by the kindness of many friends, but perhaps chief credit belongs to the efficient Guild, which managed to raise almost half of the money required.

Cathedral Home for Children: Mr. John W. Hay, of Rock Springs, has added to his many kindnesses to the work of the Church in Wyoming, by promising that by the first of April he will see that the remainder of the money necessary for the completion and equipment of the Cathedral Home for Children is in hand. Last year Bishop Thomas purchased from the ecclesiastical authority of the Roman Catholic Church the property belonging to the old St. Joseph's Hospital, a splendid possession near to the University of Wyoming, at Laramie. Through the kindness of Wyoming citizens the work of renovation and repair has been going on, and now with this fine pledge of Mr. Hay, it will not be long until the building is ready to receive the large number of dependent children of the State, many of whom have been unable to be cared for, owing to lack of accommodations.

The Board of Managers of the Cathedral Home for Children has suffered loss through the death of Mrs. R. E. Fitch, of Laramie, after an illness of many months. Mrs. Fitch was at one time President of the Board, and was always one of its most devoted and earnest members.

The Rev. Oliver Kingman has taken up duties in the Missionary District of Wyoming, being assigned to All Saints Church, Wheatland, with duty at Chugwater, Glendo, and several other adjacent missions.

Mr. Howard R. Brinker, who graduated from the Philadelphia Divinity School at Midyears, has arrived in the District, and is now in charge of the work at Christ Church, Douglas, and St. George's Church, Lusk. Mr. Brinker is a candidate for Holy Orders in this District, and has served during the last two summers as summer worker in Wyoming, being in charge of the work at Meeteetse during one vacation, and serving at Glenrock in the summer of 1917.

The Second Volume.

In the groined alcoves of an ancient tower
Amid a wealth of treasured tomes I found
A little book, in choicest vellum bound;
Therein a romance of such tragic power
It held me rapt through many a tranced hour;
And then, the threads of interest all unwound,
Abruptly closed, I searched that palace round
And for its mate still earth's preserves I scour,
Perchance that was the whole? Then purposeless
The pain of conflict, and the bitter doubt
But half resolved; love in a dire distress,
Deserted, baffled, with its joy left out!
Could life so end, half told—its school so fail?
Soul, soul! there is a sequel to thy tale!

—Robert Mowry Bell.

There are times which reveal to us the mysterious identity of our ever-changing lives; when we read old letters, visit well-remembered scenes, grasp the hand of old friends, or indulge in the silent luxury of their presence. You know the subtle influence of such seasons; with what reality they recall the past. The coincidences of life are designed by God to reveal us to ourselves and to show what is God's guidance of our life.—A. Mackennal.

Personal Notes

The Rev. T. P. Baker, rector of St. Paul's Church, Bennettsville, S. C., has resigned the charge of that parish and will return to his old home in King George County, Va.

The Rev. J. M. Walker, Jr., has become rector of St. Paul's Church, Albany, Ga.

The Rev. William B. Allen, minister-in-charge of the Church of the Transfiguration, Saluda, N. C., has resumed his duties after a severe illness.

The Rev. Lyman P. Powell, D. D., President of Hobart College, has resigned, to take effect July 1. Dr. Powell has been president of Hobart College for five years, and concludes a most successful regime.

The Rev. Dr. R. D. Roller, rector of St. John's Church, Charleston, W. Va., has not resigned, as it was erroneously reported in the Church papers recently.

The Rev. R. E. Gribbin, rector of St. John's Church, Wilmington, N. C., who has been for the past several months serving as chaplain at Camp Sevier, S. C., returned to his home in Wilmington recently and found his residence had been looted of everything except furniture too large to remove.

The Rev. Douglas H. Atwill has entered upon his duties as rector of St. Augustine's Church, St. Louis, Mo.

The address of the Rev. Henry B. Bryan, rector of Grace Church, Jersey City, N. J., is 268 Second Street, Jersey City.

Ordinations.

On Sunday, December 23, in Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, N. D., Bishop Tyler advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Frederick Gunnell, presented by the Rev. J. S. Brayfield, rector of Grace Church, Jamestown, who also preached the sermon. Mr. Gunnell has served the mission at Linton for over two years and expects to remain in charge of this field.

In St. James Church, Philadelphia, on the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, the Bishop of the Diocese advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Allen Evans, who was presented by the Rev. G. Pomeroy Allen, of Ardmore. Chaplain Dickens preached the ordination sermon. Mr. Evans has been engaged as assistant to the chaplain at the navy yard.

On January 30, in St. Mark's Cathedral, Salt Lake City, Utah, the Rev. Stephen C. Clark, Jr., was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Hunting, of Nevada, acting for the ecclesiastical authority of Utah. The Rev. W. W. Reese presented the candidate, and the Rev. J. H. Dennis preached the sermon. Mr. Clarke will continue as missionary in charge of St. Luke's Church, Park City, Utah.

In Trinity Church, Elmira, N. Y., the Rev. H. E. Hubbard, rector, on Sexagesima Sunday, Bishop Fliske advanced to the priesthood the Rev. John Edenden Wootton, who was presented by his brother, the Rev. Ray Wootton. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.

Mr. Wootton will remain in charge of St. John's Church, Marathon, N. Y.

Deaths.

The Rev. Henry Martyn Sherman died at his home in Bridgeport, Conn., on February 4, aged eighty years. The funeral services were held on Thursday, February 7, in St. Paul's Church, Bridgeport, of which parish he had been rector before his retirement in 1903. Among those taking part in the services were the Rev. J. Chauncey Linsley, the Rev. Matthew G. Thompson, representing the Standing Committee, and the Rev. Kenneth MacKenzie. The committal service was taken by Bishop Brewster.

The Rev. William Alexander Coale, rector emeritus of St. Stephen's Parish, North Sassafras, Md., died on Thursday, January 31. Funeral services were held in St. Stephen's Chapel, Cecilton, interment being in St. Stephen's cemetery, Farleville, on Monday, February 4.

The Rev. Custis Parsons Jones, for the past fifteen years a retired clergyman resident in Baltimore, Md., died recently at Johns Hopkins Hospital.

An Inspiring Story.

Have you been reading recently the inspiring story of the Mayo brothers? The other day these world-famous surgeons, Drs. William and Charles Mayo, of Rochester, Minn., turned over to the University of Minnesota "the bulk of their savings for more than a generation," in all $1,650,345, to establish a fund for "medical education, research and investigation." Explaining the gift, one of the brothers said:

"The money came from the people, and we feel it should return to the people—a continuing fund that shall serve this State for generations to come."

It was aptly remarked by a metropolitan daily that "the world can scarcely ask more from this fund than that it will develop more Mayos."

These surgeons appear to demonstrate again the truth of the old maxim that real skill is bound to attract attention, and "you cannot keep a good man down." Even though you dwell in a forest, "the world will wear a beaten path to your door" if you provide what is really needed. Here were two young men who worked in a village drug store, studied pharmacy, and aspired to be physicians. Graduating from college, they began as village doctors to labor zealously to relieve suffering. Renown was not long in finding them out, for no case seemed too desperate, and they performed marvelous operations and effected cures where other distinguished men had given up. Local fame became national, then worldwide. Their hospital at Rochester, Minn., became one of the greatest institutions of its kind, and surgeons came to them from all over the world for advice and instruction. It is not surprising to know that these brothers have helped to develop plans for aiding the wounded in the war, and that they are planning to take turns in France with the American army. As a story of American achievement, this is inspiring, and the surrender of their life savings that humanity may be still further served by the long vigil and patient ministries of their years of wonderful devotion, makes it truly glorious. May such a spirit as this be multiplied throughout the land, and may it be especially evident in all our churches!—The Reformed Church Messenger.

The Shepherd Who Stayed.

There are in Paradise
Souls neither great nor wise,
Yet souls who wear no less
The crown of faithfulness.

My master bade me watch the flock
by night;
My duty was to stay. I do not know What thing my comrades saw in that great light,
I did not heed the words that bade them go;
I know not were they maddened or afraid;
I only know I stayed.

The hillside seemed on fire; I felt the sweep
Of wings above my head; I ran to see
If any danger threatened these my sheep.
What though I found them folded quietly,
What though my brother wept, and plucked my sleeve.
These were not mine to leave.

Thieves in the wood and wolves upon the hill.
My duty was to stay. Strange though it be,
I had no thought to hold my mates,
no will
To bid them wait and keep the watch with me;
I had not heard that summons they obeyed;
I only know I stayed.

Perchance they will return upon the dawn,
With word of Bethlehem, and why they went;
I only know that, watching here alone,
I know a strange content.
I have not failed that trust upon me laid,
I ask no more—I stayed.
—Theodosia Garrison, in The Century.

Help in Temptation.

An English naval officer told a grateful story of the way he was helped and saved from dishonor in his first experience in battle. He was a midshipman, fourteen years old. The volleys of the enemy's musketry so terrified him that he almost fainted. The officer over him saw his state and came close beside him, keeping his own face toward the enemy, and held the midshipman's hand, saying in a calm, quiet, affectionate way: "Courage, my boy. You will recover in a minute or two. I was just so when I went into my first battle." The young man said afterwards that it was as if an angel had come to him and put new strength into him. The whole burden of his agony of fear was gone, and from that moment he was as brave as the oldest of the men. If the officer had dealt sternly with the midshipman, he might have driven him to cowardly failure. His kindly sympathy with him dispelled all fear, put courage into his heart, and made him brave for battle.

It was thus that Christ is touched with a feeling of our infirmity when, assailed by sudden temptation, we quail and are afraid. He comes up close beside us and says: "I understand. I met a temptation just like yours that tried me very sorely. I felt the same dread you feel. I suffered bitterly that day. I remember it. Be brave and strong, and your fear will vanish and you will be victorious." Then He takes our hand, and the thrill of His sympathy and of His strength comes into our heart, dispelling all fear.—J. R. Miller.

Second Sunday in Lent: The first Old Testament lesson Sunday morning records the beginning of the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy of the Seventy Years' captivity, which was the first lesson for last Sunday morning. Jehoiachin came to the throne in 597 during or just before the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. He was a fatuous youth of eighteen who played at being a king for three months and then was dragged to Babylon at the head of prominent Jews of all classes who thus constituted the first group of captives, referred to later by Jeremiah as "good figs," and among whom apparently were Daniel and Ezekiel. Once again God did what He said He was going to do. (See first morning lessons for first and second Sundays after the Epiphany.) Jeremiah's appeal to the example of loyal Rechabites; his pleas for social justice; his hoiding out the offer of God's pardon; all were rejected with scorn. Truly "the sin of Judah was etched with a pen of iron and the point of a diamond, graven upon the tablet of their heart and upon the horns of their altars." But the cool insolence of a Jehoiachin, throwing the leaves of the prophet's writings into the fire, was not going to stop God's truth from "marching on."

For the second lesson we have given our Lord's denunciation of scribes and Pharisees, ending with the lament over Jerusalem, not without the note of hope which also belonged to Jeremiah, "ye shall not see me again until ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." (Note: Compare Matt. 23:37-39 with 2 Esdras 1:30, 33.)

For the evening lessons the Book of Daniel is continued and the deliverance of Daniel from the lions' den is given, accompanied by our Lord's denunciation of lip service and of man-made traditions and doctrines, setting forth the necessity of purity of heart and deliverance from evil thoughts, rather than ceremonialism.

These lessons, one and all, seem to fit in not only with Lent in general, but with the specific eucharistic teachings of this particular Sunday. They set forth the inevitableness of the penalty of sin; the value and right use of Divinely ordained discipline; the hope and promise of deliverance; and the absolute necessity of a pure heart. "This is the Will of God, even your sanctification" (Epistle). To this supreme end all providence is directed. Whether "adversities which may happen to the body" (Collect) are averted, as in the case of Daniel, and the Woman of Canaan (Gospel), or permitted, as in the case of Judah and Jerusalem, the Divine purpose is one and the same.

Again, the Gentiles, who are the instruments of God's discipline in one lesson, are themselves the recipients of God's mercy both in the Gospel and the Daniel story. The week day selections from Jeremiah belong between the events of this and those of the next Sunday.

What President Wilson Thinks of the Bible.

Extracts from an address made by the President when Governor of New Jersey, and published in the Expositor.

The beauty about the Bible is that it is the most wholesome, the most perfectly symmetrical, the least morbid picture of life and motives of men in the world. Almost every other book has a streak of morbidness in it, but this book is wholesome and sweet and natural and naïf from cover to cover. Here are no dull moralizings; here is the life of man set forth as it was simply lived from generation to generation.

He alone can rule his own spirit who puts himself under the command of the Spirit of God, revealed in His Son, Jesus Christ, our Saviour. He is the Captain of our soul; he is the man from whose suggestions and from whose life comes the light that guideth every man that ever came into the world.

I am sorry for the men who do not read the Bible every day, I wonder why they deprive themselves of the strength and of the pleasure. It is one of the most singular books in the world, for every time you open it some old text that you have read a score of times suddenly beams with a new meaning.

Collect for the Second Sunday in Lent.

Almighty God, who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves; keep us both outwardly in our bodies and inwardly in our souls; that we may be defended from all adversities which may happen to the body, and from the evil thoughts which may assault and hurt the soul; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Matthias' Day.

O Almighty God, who into the place of the traitor Judas didst choose Thy faithful servant Matthias to be of the number of the twelve Apostles; grant that Thy Church, being always preserved from false Apostles, may be ordered and guided by faithful and true pastors, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

There is no other book that I know of of which this is true; there is no other book that yields its meaning so personally, that seems to fit itself so intimately to the very spirit that is seeking its guidance.

Every Sunday-school should be a place where this great book is not only opened, is not only studied, is not only revered, but is drunk of as if it were a fountain of life, is used as if it were the only source of inspiration and of guidance. No great nation can ever survive its own temptations and its own follies that does not indoctrinate its children in the Word of God; so that as schoolmaster and as governor I know that my feet must rest with the feet of my fellow-men upon this foundation only; for the righteousness of nations, like the righteousness of men, must take its source from these foundations of inspiration.

I want to advise that we get down to hardpan again, that we regard the whole business of the Sunday-school as the familiarizing of the children with the Word of God.

Give it to them unadulterated, pure, unaltered, unexplained, uncheapered, and then see it work its wholesome work throughout the whole nature. It is very difficult, indeed, for a man or for a boy who knows the Scripture, ever to get away from it. It haunts him like an old song. It follows him like the memory of his mother. It reminds him like the word of an old and revered teacher. It forms part of the warp and woof of his life.

I conceive my theme, therefore, to be the exaltation of the Word of God as the one and only theme for study on this sacred day, when we call our children together to drink from the original fountains of human life.—Sunday-school Times.

There is a zeal which is fed by regard to the opinions of others, and sustained by a wish to be thought earnest and useful; which is rather the warmth of nature than the holy fire of grace, and which makes a man a mere tinkling symbol, because he does not love Jesus Christ.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Family Department

A Lenten Prayer.

Thou loving Maker of mankind,
Before Thy throne we pray and weep;
O, strengthen us with grace divine,
Duly this sacred Lent to keep.

Searcher of hearts! Thou dost our ills
Discern, and all our weakness know:
Again to Thee with tears we turn;
Again to us Thy mercy show.

Much have we sinn'd; but we confess
Our guilt, and all our faults deplore;
Oh, for the praise of Thy great Name,
Our fainting souls to health restore!

And grant us, while by fasts we strive
This mortal body to control,
To fast from all the food of sin,
And so to purify the soul.

Prayer and Self-Denial.

Lent is the time set for us to look squarely at sin, and to make special effort to overcome it.

One of our great modern thinkers and teachers defines sin to be "a reversion to our brute ancestry, after having seen the vision of a higher life." The brute follows his instinct, and commits no sin. The savage satisfies his animal nature, does whatever he happens to feel, and commits no sin. But the man living today in a Christian land, recognizing duty, knowing the right and the true, seeing the beauty of love and purity and holiness, sins, when he turns from these noble things and lives like the savage or the brute, following instincts, doing simply because he likes to do. How clearly does our Lord teach this truth when He said to the Pharisees, "If ye were blind, ye would have no sin; but ye say, 'we see'; therefore your sin remaineth."

St. Paul pictures vividly the Christian's fight, ay! the human fight, as the struggle, the battle to the death, between the flesh and the spirit, between the lower or brute nature in us and the higher or spirit nature in us. The brute nature would drag us back down to the lowest savage; the spirit nature would lift us up akin to God. We ask, "How can we be victors in this long and terrible battle, which each child of man must fight?" the answer can be condensed into two simple and great words: Self-denial and Prayer.

Self-denial is the saying "no" to the brute instinct; it is the denying the animal appetite; it is the controlling the savage temper. Prayer is the stretching out of the hands to God our Father, that we may climb where He stands; it is work with Christ our Saviour in the things of the spirit; it is the opening of our heart, mind and will to the blessed influences of the Holy Spirit.

Self-denial exercises itself in many practical ways; fasting from food and fleshy indulgence, that the body may be the obedient servant and the perfect instrument of the conscience and the will; giving freely of our substance, that we may help forward God's work and that we may cut at the roots of our degrading selfishness; suffering cheerfully pain, loss or lack of appreciation, that the lower self may be so weakened that the higher self may grow and flourish.

Prayer is calling on God to help us in our work of self-denial, realizing

His presence and power, as we strive to quench our desires, to control our tempers and to humble our base ambitions, making the hard fight before Him and with Him.

Prayer is, again, quietly communing with God, thinking of Him, talking to Him, loving Him, praising and thanking Him. Prayer is, thirdly, resting and remaining alone, opening or yielding ourselves alone, opening or yielding ourselves to the spiritual forces that are ever playing about us, whose work in this universe is to make us like Christ, to lift us up to God.

Self-denial and Prayer. How well and wisely they work together! How necessary they are to each other! Self-denial, honestly begun, makes us realize the need of God's help and opens the way for prayer. Prayer gives the needed help, and opens our eyes to visions of nobler life, which demand a truer and a deeper self-denial.

"This"—power over all evil things, transfiguration into the holiest and the most beautiful—"cometh by prayer and fasting" (self-denial), spoke the Master. So the Church wisely and obediently points her children to Self-denial and Prayer as the chief work for Lent. —Bishop Strange.

Pointers.

When we are asked to substitute corn meal for wheat, we are simply asked to eat what is abundant and just as good for us, in order that those who are fighting for us may have the food they absolutely need.

The American people merely face substitution, while the peoples of Belgium, Poland, Serbia and Armenia have long suffered starvation.

Do not confound substitution with sacrifice. The heart of real religion is the principle of sacrifice, and we should be ready for it at the call of country and duty; but we have not been asked for any real sacrifice as yet in food conservation. The sacrifice is in the giving of sons, husbands, brothers, fathers. And that sacrifice will be far worse than in vain if we do not supply them and their comrades in arms with bread and meat.

Eat corn cakes, corn muffins, corn bread, corn pone, corn-meal mush. You may not save money by so doing, but you will help save your country and the world from the abomination of desolation represented by the Prussian system.

The largest corn crop ever raised; the winter wheat crop much smaller than hoped and anticipated, owing to weather conditions. That tells why we must substitute corn meal for wheat flour. The more corn eaten at home the more wheat to send abroad—and we must send or surrender.

Some people say they do not like corn bread, as though that were a sufficient reason for not eating it. Such Americans ought to live in London for awhile, where the innocent victims do not like German bombs, but cannot choose.

Who will not substitute when they may, should live to hunger another day.

The Food Administration calls for voluntary substitution by us to prevent otherwise inevitable destitution on the part of those who are fighting our battles for us.

Eat more Irish potatoes. Discover the value of a baked potato, skin and all.

It is far better to eat a corn dodger than to be one.

To show how savings count up, the railway dining-car service of the country reports that during October and November the savings were as follows: Meats, 469,508 pounds, or over 234 tons; wheat flour, 238,098 pounds, or over 1,214 barrels; sugar, 25,699 pounds, or over 12½ tons. And this despite an increase of 20 per cent. in the number of persons fed, as compared with the corresponding two months of the previous year.

So far the hotels and restaurants make a better showing in food substitution and saving than the homes do. It is easier, of course, to reach the public eating places because of organization, but we hope it may be possible to change this record, and the churches can bring it about if the people will take the matter as seriously as it deserves.

There are fifty ways at least to use corn meal to make good and appetizing dishes for dinner, supper, lunch or breakfast. Variety, therefore, is the spice of corn meal as of life.

Send for Farmers' Bulletin 565, "Corn Meal as a Food, and Ways of Using It," to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., which will furnish it without cost.

There is more body fuel in a cup of corn meal than in a cup of wheat flour. And it is fuel that makes the man go as well as the engine.

Eat corn bread in order to send white bread to your son in France. If you haven't a son there, then eat the corn bread to send the white bread to somebody else's son. We are all bound up together in this war. "No man liveth unto himself alone."—U. S. Food Administration Bureau.

"I Dread the End of the Year."

"I dread to come to the end of the year," said a friend to us recently. "It makes me realize I am growing old."

That suggests a question: When is a man old?

In Shakespeare's time a man was old at forty, and often, because of the gay life, inviolated long before that.

Sir Walter Scott at fifty-five bemoaned the fact that he was an old man.

Montaigne retired to his castle at thirty-eight to spend his declining years in peace and study.

Dr. Samuel Johnson once remarked that at thirty-five a man had reached his peak, and after that his course must be downward.

Physiologists tell us that in all mammals except man the period of life is five times the period of growth. A dog gets its full growth in two years, and lives ten; a horse in five years, and lives twenty-five. On this basis a man should live from one hundred to one hundred and fifty years.

Why were these three men—Scott, Montaigne and Johnson—old while they were still comparatively young?

The answer is, because they felt old and acted old.

William James, the great psychologist, said that most men are "old fogies at twenty-five."

He was right. Most men at twenty-five are satisfied with their jobs. They have accumulated the little stock of prejudices that they call their "principles," and closed their minds to all new ideas; they have ceased to grow.

The minute a man ceases to grow—no matter what his years—that minute he begins to be old.

On the other hand, the really great man never grows old.

Bismarck, who died at eighty-three, did his greatest work after he was seventy.

Titian, the celebrated painter, lived to be ninety-nine, painting right up to the end.

Goethe died at eighty-three, and finished his "Faust" only a few years earlier; Gladstone took up a new language when he was seventy; Commodore Vanderbilt increased the mileage of his lines from 120 to more than 10,000 between his seventieth birthday and his death at eighty-three.

Laplace, the astronomer, was still at work when death caught up with him at seventy-eight. He died crying, "What we know is nothing: what we do not know is immense."

And there you have the real answer to the question, When is a man old?

Laplace, at seventy-eight, died young. He was still unsatisfied, still growing, still sure that he had a lot to learn.

As long as a man can keep himself in that attitude of mind, as long as he can look on every year and say, "I grew," he is still young.

The minute he ceases to grow, the day he says to himself, "I know all that I need to know"—that day youth stops. He may be twenty-five or seventy-five, it makes no difference. On that day he begins to be old.—Every Week.

To One Fallen Asleep.

Late evening hush is over all the land;
The stars ablaze in black-blue deeps of space

Obeysome vast processional of grace,
Some organ-peal unheard on this low strand.

Yet beauteous, too, our silence, as we stand

In pale submission, trying to embrace
The wondrous thought of God's own dwelling place,

Still nestling in the hollow of His hand!

O my beloved!—In that strange profound Where angel wings and starry circles go

Still flying, rolling, flashing evermore,
Thy living place must be! Where all around

Is Life, no death, no past of earthly woe

Can dim His Presence whom we both adore.

The American Red Cross in Italy.

The story of what we did in Italy may constitute the best example of the effectiveness of the work that we have done in influencing the actual progress of the war.

A Rout of the People.

At the time when the smash came and the Germans and the Austrians broke through, they found a situation in the Italian Army and among Italian people that was very distressing. The whole country was tired of war. The victory was not a military victory; it was the rout of a large number of the Italian people. They came streaming back from the north of Italy, some half million refugees, in dreadful condition. There were children born on crowded trains. There were people who died on them. There were those who fell and died of exhaustion coming down from the roads to the railroad centers. There were people who had never left their little farms and little villages who were going out stripped of everything they owned in the world into a strange country.

The question at the time of holding the line that the armies took was a very open one. The general impression through the country was that the Piave line was a temporary one, and that a retreat would follow. If that had come about, it would have meant a million and a half or two million more refugees thrown on a country already impoverished by war and short of supplies. It might have meant the elimination of Italy as a factor in the war.

If there was ever a time in the history of the world when a country needed moral support and somebody to come up and stand beside them, it was Italy after the break.

Italy Misunderstood Us.

Now, our country was very considerably misunderstood in Italy at that time. A careful propaganda had been carried on which had developed among the people the belief that America was not really interested in the war as far as Italy was concerned. We had not declared war on Austria. There were stories that we were afraid to war with both Germany and Austria. The idea had become current that America was suspicious of Italy—suspicious of her motives in the war and unwilling to help her.

There was no possible way for America to speak as a government at that time. Congress was not in session and a declaration of war on Austria was impossible. Yet it was absolutely necessary that in some way the people should be made to feel that America was with them. Our State Department felt it; the Italian Government felt it. And there was only one agency that could speak and that was the American Red Cross.

No Organization in Italy.

We had no organization in Italy at the time. We took from our French organization a number of men under Carl Taylor and sent them down to break ground. We began to hit before we broke the ground. The first thing we did was to send telegrams immediately to every American consul in Italy to ask if they could use money, how much and what for. And we sent each consul all of the money that he asked for. We started forty-six freight carloads of necessary supplies from our French storehouses. We started ambulances from France in charge of experienced ambulance drivers. We opened soup kitchens where we gave to the Italian refugees the first food and hot drinks that were served to them in Italy. We arranged for the transportation of refugees from the North.

We opened storehouses and warehouses at the essential points. We employed in the manufacture of surgical dressings, besides refugees, the families of soldiers fighting at the front. We opened hospitals where we could concentrate contagious diseases.

Ambulances to Piave Front.

Our first ambulances went to the Piave front four days after we declared war on Austria. They went from Milan through streets that were covered with American flags and allied flags. They were cheered by great crowds as they passed. The ceremony of taking them over was assisted by representatives of the British, French and Italian armies and representatives of the Italian Government and our own State Department. And the word spread of this wonderful thing that America had done four days after the declaration of war; men in khaki moving off to the front.—Major G. M. P. Murphy.

It is almost as presumptuous to think that you can do nothing as to think you can do everything.—Phillips Brooks.

Questions.

You have lived long and learned the secret of life, O Seer!
Tell me what are the best three things to seek—
The best three things for a man to seek on earth?

The best three things for a man to seek, O Son! are these:
Reverence for that great source from whence he came;
Work for the world wherein he finds himself,
And knowledge of the realm toward which he goes.

What are the best three things to love on earth, O Seer!—
What are the best three things for a man to love?

The best three things for a man to love, O Son! are these:
Labor which keeps his forces all in action;
A home wherein no evil thing may enter,
And a loving woman with God in her heart.

What are the three great sins to shun, O Seer!—
What are the three great sins for a man to shun?

The three great sins for a man to shun, O Son! are these:
A thought which soils the heart from whence it goes;
An action which can harm a living thing,
And undeveloped energies of mind.

What are the worst three things to fear, O Seer!—
What are the worst three things for a man to fear?

The worst three things for a man to fear, O Son! are these:
Doubt and suspicion in a young child's eyes;
Accusing shame upon a woman's face,
And in himself no consciousness of God.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

"My Grace Is Sufficient for Thee."

"The other evening I was riding home after a heavy day's work; I felt very wearied and sore depressed, when swiftly and suddenly as a lightning flash that text came to me: 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' I reached home and looked it up in the original, and at last it came to me, and I said, 'I should think it is, Lord,' and burst out laughing. I never fully understood what the holy laughter of Abraham was until then. It seemed to make unbelief so absurd. It was as though some little fish, being very thirsty, was troubled about drinking the river dry, and Father Thames said, 'Drink away, little fish, my stream is sufficient for thee.' Or, it seemed like a little mouse in the granaries of Egypt, after the seven years of plenty, fearing it might die of famine; Joseph might say, 'Cheer up, little mouse, my granaries are sufficient for thee.' Again, I imagined a man away up yonder, in a lofty mountain, saying to himself, 'I breathe so many cubic feet of air every year, I fear I shall exhaust the oxygen in the atmosphere;' but the earth might say, 'Breathe away, O man, and fill the lungs ever, my atmosphere is sufficient for thee.' Oh, brethren, be great believers! Little faith will bring your souls to heaven, but great faith will bring heaven to your souls."—C. H. Spurgeon.

Be Sure to Say You're Sorry.

W. R. Savage.

Be sure to say you're sorry,
If sorry you should be,
For if a man won't say it,
A sorry man is he.

Be sure to say you're sorry,
Not only try to show it,
But, say it out, "I'm sorry,"
That neighbors, all, may know it.

Be sorry when you witness pain,
And many people have it,
Be sorry that you "did not think,"
If 'twas you who gave it.

Be sorry for the hasty word
Shot forth without a thought,
Be sorry for the unkind deed
Through which much harm was wrought.

Be sure to say you're sorry,
When sorry you should be,
For if a man won't say it,
A sorry man is he!

Luck.

"Some people are born lucky, that's all!" grumbled Dick. "Look at Tommy Andrews' new bicycle. I've been wanting one for a whole year, too. It's nice to be lucky!"

Ruth looked up from her paper dolls, and added a sigh to Dick's grumble.

"Alice Matthews is lucky, too. She's head of the class again, and I'm sixth. It is nice to be lucky."

Little Polly sighed now, thinking of her chum, Patty.

"Patty found a quarter in the gutter," said Polly; "she could not find the owner, so she kept it, and now she has the best rubber ball of any of us."

"The rest of you needn't talk about luck," cried Robert, looking from one to the other with a scowl on his face. "Look at Max Webster if you want to see luck! He's been asked to recite for the School Club this month, and everybody knows I can recite better than he can."

Robert's books went down on the table with a loud bang, and mother put down her pen, and pushed aside the letter she was trying to write.

"Well! Well!" she said. "My four-leaf clover is certainly in trouble. Surely a four-leaf clover ought to be lucky. Let's talk over this wonderful luck which seems to come to Tommy and Alice and Patty and Max. Tommy's bicycle is a beauty, Dick. I do not wonder that you want one like it. Do you remember how hot it was last summer?"

"Yes," answered Dick, gloomily, "but that has nothing to do with Tommy's bicycle."

"Hasn't it?" said mother. "It was very hot, yet Tommy worked all summer long selling papers. He earned that bicycle himself. This spring he is enjoying his wheel—but he is also selling more papers, for now he is working for a football. He told me so yesterday. L-U-C-K spells—"

"Luck!" said all the children, except Dick. He was silent save for a long-drawn-out "O-oo!"

"Now, it's Ruth's turn," said mother, picking up one of the pretty paper dolls which Ruth delighted in dressing. "Ruth stood sixth in her class, and Alice stood first, yet one little girl is just as bright as the other."

"See—it's luck!" cried Ruth. "That's what I said."

"Wait a minute," advised mother. "Does Alice like paper dolls, too?"

"She loves them!" answered Ruth. "Don't you remember what beautiful dresses she made when she was over here last Saturday?"

"When?" asked mother.

"On Saturday," repeated Ruth, looking puzzled.

"Oh, she plays with paper dolls on Saturday, does she?"

"Yes; on Saturday and on Friday night. The rest of the time she is too busy with her—"

Ruth stopped suddenly, and mother smiled.

"L-U-C-K spells—"

"Luck!" said Polly and Robert, but Ruth and Dick were silent.

"Robert is next," continued mother.

"Mother, you know I can recite better than Max," urged Robert, eagerly. "I stood head in my class, and they ought to have let me recite this month. I deserved it."

Mother had hard work to keep from smiling as she asked:

"How often does the School Club meet?"

"Every week."

"How often did you go last month?"

"I didn't go at all, but I was too—"

"Wait a minute," said mother. "How often did Max go?"

"Every time," answered Robert, slowly.

"The teacher depends on Max. He never seems to fail her. What did Max say to you the last time you recited?"

"He said I did 'dandy good work,'" Robert said, more slowly still.

"What did you say to Max when you heard he was going to recite?"

"I didn't say anything. I was too mad."

"Max has improved wonderfully lately," mother continued. "Every one is noticing that. And, Robert, I am sorry to tell you, but you didn't recite as well last time as you did—"

Mother did not finish her sentence. Instead she asked:

"L-U-C-K spells—"

There was dead silence in the room, and after a few moments mother said:

"Does Polly want her turn?"

"No, no, mother!" cried Polly. "I was worst of all. I spent two hours hunting a quarter in the gutter, after Patty found hers, and I could have earned one easily, for father said he'd give me a quarter if I picked the weeds out of the path this week. Don't say anything about me, please!"

"All right," laughed mother; "but I'd like to ask my four-leaf clover again:

"L-U-C-K spells—"

"Work!" shouted the children, all except Robert, for Robert had disappeared. The front door slammed, and mother picked up her pen smiling. She knew, and the rest knew also, that Robert was running down the street at full speed toward the house where Max lived. She knew, and they knew, that "lucky" days were beginning for the four-leaf clover.—Anne Spottswood Young.

Three Stories by Little Folks.

I.

What Happened to My Fish.

(Margaret Reed French, Alexandria, Va., aged nine years.)

Once I went out to fish with some other children. When we came home I went into the house to ask mother if Sarah could cook them (the fish). I left the fish on the lawn and a dog came up and ate them. When I came out they had disappeared and I was very sorry. But the next day I went out fishing by myself. The dog did not eat the fish this time, and I had them for my supper that night. They were good, but I did not get over one mouthful, they were such little fish.

II.

A Pony Story.

(John Carlyle Herbert Bryant, Alexandria, Va., aged eight years.)

I have a little pony; his name is Edgewood. I want to tell you something funny about him. One day he came into the house, and now he has learned to open the kitchen door. He is the smartest pony I have ever seen. I am going to tell you how he opens the kitchen door. He takes his teeth and turns the door-knob and comes into the kitchen and eats the things off the table in the kitchen. He scares the cook.

III.

My Dear Dog.

(Evelyn T. Peake, Alexandria, Va., aged ten years.)

Once I had a dear black-and-white dog. He was real fat and shiny. He had dark brown eyes and he was very, very affectionate. His name was Traveler. He would play "tag" with me, and "hide and seek," too. He would stay in one place and I would hide and call him; then he would look for me. Traveler was quite a big dog, but very nice to play with. One day when my grandmother was going to town to market I went with her. It was summer, so we drove in with our horse Dixie. Traveler always followed us when we drove town. We missed him that morning, but we just thought had gone with some other dog around home; but when we got half way to town we found my dear dog lying in the road. An automobile had run over him! Oh, how sorry I was. I shall always remember my dear dog Traveler.

Bobby and Betty Chickadee.

"Whew!" chirped Bobby Chickadee, shifting from one foot to the other on an icy twig. "Whew, but it's cold!" "Cold!" sputtered Betty Chickadee, Bobby's trim little wife. "Cold! It's more than cold. It's colder. It's coldest. That's what it is—coldest."

"If only we could find a few plantain seeds," wished Bobby, "or some of those red berries that taste so good. With our stomachs comfortably full, we wouldn't mind the cold—not very. But the berries are all gone, Bobby, and the plantain seeds are deep under the snow. We'll have to think of something else."

"You think, Betty. You're so good at thinking," encouraged Bobby.

Betty cocked her pretty head on one side and looked so pleased and wise. "Hm," said she, "hmmm." Then she cocked her head to the other side. "Hm," she began. But she stopped right there, and flew a graceful little circle around Bobby. "Bobby Chickadee," she chirped. "Look, look! There's smoke coming out of the chimney of the little brown house. Somebody has moved in. Maybe that means crumbs."

"Maybe," hoarsely chirped Bobby.

"Come on!" cried Betty.

Away they flew toward the little brown house. Nobody at the back window. Snow dishearteningly smooth and white! Around to the end flew the hungry little pair, and O—

"Goody!" chirped Betty.

"Ditto!" chirped Bobby.

There, fastened to the trunk of the old apple tree by the kitchen window was a nice square board, and on the board were crumbs and bird seed and a lump of suet nailed down!

"O, look!" cried Betty.

"O, look!" cried Bobby.

"O, look!" cried both in unison.

A little girl standing by the window, with her small nose flattened against the pane, clapped her hands and hopped up and down and called: "Mother, daddy, come quick! Here are two dear little chickadees already!"

"See what nice people there are at the window, Bobby," said Betty. "Just look."

"Hmmm," mumbled Bobby, with his mouth full. "They're all right."

"See how hungry they are, daddy!" said the little girl. "Do you suppose they'll come every day to my picnic table?"

"Not a doubt of it," answered daddy.

"What a dear little girl!" exclaimed Betty Chickadee.

"Sure!" responded Bobby, stopping row to take a good look at her. "She has such good judgment about food for chickadees!"

"This table fastened here so firmly looks as though she meant to serve meals regularly," observed Betty hopefully.

"She'll have at least two steady patrons," chuckled Bobby.

"Hear the dear little things, mother!" exclaimed the little girl. "Just hear them: 'Chickadee-dee-dee!' How thankful they are! 'Chickadee-dee-dee!' I wish I could understand bird talk."

"You understand bird feelings, and that is better," smiled mother.—Minnie Leona Upton, in the Christian Register.

When Marie's Eyes Were Opened.

Marie had big, bright brown eyes that could see the birds and the flowers and the trees, and that could see to read and to go about, yet there were many things that those bright eyes did not see at all. At night, somehow, the eyes could not see the chair where all Marie's clothes should have been neatly placed. If they had her tired mother would not have had to pick up 11 clothes from the floor before she went to bed.

In the morning they did not see the place in the bathroom where the towel should have been hung; at breakfast they did not see the napkin ring. They did not see that the clock said there was plenty of time to help mother before school.

One day Aunt Margaret came to visit, and she felt so sorry about those bright, blind eyes that she began to help her to see.

"Suppose we tidy up this room before mother comes in," she whispered one day. Marie was going out to play, and had not noticed how the room looked, but she joyfully clapped her hands as she saw her mother's delight when the room was done.

When once the eyes began to see things that ought to be done, they soon began to hunt for things to do to make people happy. And if you have seeing eyes yourself, I need not tell you how much happier and more beautiful the world became for Marie and for every one about her.—Exchange.

The Attic Window.

Of all the windows in our house

I like the attic window best,
Because it's high and small and round,
And oh, so different from the rest!
For every single way you look
Is like a fairy picture book!

Such lovely things there are outside!

Red chimney stacks, and near, blue sky,
And fat cats walking on the roofs,
And baby cloudlets skipping by;
And pigeons cooling on the sill,
So I can stroke them, if I will!

The smoke plumes from the chimney stacks

Are banners waving to and fro,
While gallant "Knights, with prancing steeds,

Through the long roof-lanes come and go.

The clouds at sunset often hold
Great palaces of shining gold.
—Isabel Ecclestone Mackay.

When in Danger.

Wilbur shook the last hickory nut from the slender bough and turned about to climb down to the ground. But Wilbur had not reckoned well. Much to his surprise, the fork of the tree held one foot as firmly and securely as if it had been nailed there with hammer and nail. A twist, a wiggle and a pull, backed by a lot of determination, failed to loosen the tree's hold. The bright little face clouded, and the blue eyes filled with angry tears.

"Let me go! Let me loose!" shouted Wilbur in a loud voice as with a clinched fist he pounded the sturdy old hickory.

A brown squirrel, gathering his winter store near by, squinted his merry eyes at Wilbur as if he thought: "Ho, ho, little boy! You're caught in a trap."

Wilbur returned the squirrel's gaze for a moment; and then, ashamed of his tears, he called out suddenly: "You'd cry, too, little brown squirrel, if you were invited to a party this afternoon and were caught up in a hickory tree. It's a mile to the house, so they will never hear me call; and this is the last place they will come to look for me. O, dear!"

Wilbur's sobs had frightened the little brown squirrel away. Even the birds had flown to the bare walnut trees in the far end of the grove, where they twittered as if afraid to sing. A tired little fist continued to pound the old hickory, which seemed not to mind in the least, and a hoarse little voice continued to call out: "Let me loose! Let me loose!"

Then suddenly Wilbur remembered something that his father had read in the newspaper at the breakfast table. It was an account of a man who had faced a great danger and throughout the ordeal was calm. Father had said it was the man's calmness that had enabled him to think clearly and thus to plan his escape from danger. Wilbur remembered it all now. Was this being calm, to pound the old tree which was not at all to blame for his plight and make his throat sore by crying?

Ashamed at his behavior, Wilbur stared down at his imprisoned foot and resolved to act from this time on just as his father would want his boy to act. For a long time Wilbur stood there; and so silently did he wait that the little brown squirrel returned and, setting his head on one side, blinked his eyes as if to say: "O, you are still here, are you, little boy?"

Just then a merry shout rang out: "I'm going to be free, free, free!" Wilbur then unfastened his shoe and, stepping out, sprang lightly to the ground, leaving only the shoe a prisoner in the fork of the old hickory tree. "Good-by, little brown squirrel," called Wilbur, as he waved a farewell and started homeward; "and when in danger, don't forget to use your thinking cap." —Ethel Lynn Andrews, in Christian Observer.

Why Every American Child Should Be Patriotic.

The Great Billows of the Ocean rolled and thundered!

A tiny little grain of sand lay between the Great Ocean and the fair land where the little children were to play, laughing and frolicking, free of fear and unconscious of the danger so frightful.

The Great Ocean Billows were roaring and piling nearer and yet more near, only, one little grain of sand lay between it and the children. One little grain close to many other little grains. And while the little grains lay close together the children were safe.

Now, the little grains of sand lay close together, and, though each little grain of sand alone would indeed be a mere morsel in the grip of the Great Cruel Ocean, together they weighed many tons and tons in the path of the Great Cruel Ocean Billows who were roaring so mightily against them.

"Oh," laughed the Great Ocean Billows, "I'll take the little grains of sand one by one and they will not be able to keep me back; then I will get those innocent little children who they are put to guard and murder them and their fathers and mothers and all who oppose my progress. 'Ha! Ha!'" laughed the Cruel Ocean.

Presently one little grain of sand said to itself, "What does one little grain of sand count against the Big Ocean? I think I'll just roll away by myself and let the others take care of the little children, the little helpless children." So away rolled the little grain and the Ocean Billows crept just that much nearer the children.

Then the next little grain of sand said to itself, "Look, there goes one little grain of sand rolling away by itself. I think I will go too, for what does one little grain of sand count?" So away rolled the little grain, but not by itself, for it loosened several other grains who might have stayed where the Great God of the Universe had put them to stay the Cruel Ocean in its greedy rush to devour everything. Away they rolled, and after them rolled many other little grains just as you have seen little children "follow their leader," and now those who had tried to stay were too few and weighed too little to keep back the cruel Ocean Billows who roared on and on and overtook the grains of sand who had neglected their Duty and deserted their Station of Honor and Safety and presently the little children, too, were in its grasp and the fair land disappeared and only devastation and destruction reigned where all was so fair and happy while the grains of sand were holding close together as it was their duty to do.

THE ORDER OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE KING.

An organization for the women of the Church throughout the world (communicants of good standing in their parishes) for the spread of Christ's Kingdom, especially among women, and for the strengthening of the Church's Spiritual life by means of constant prayer and personal service.

The order calls for a corporate Communion by every Chapter on the third Sunday of each month at the early celebration, and a Bible class is desired in every parish.

Handbooks at the office of the Order, Room 55, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Eubank-Logan: Married in Greenville, S. C., on January 30, 1918, at the home of her sister, Mrs. A. L. Butler, by the Rev. F. A. Juhn, Martha Webb Logan to Arthur Lawrence Eubank, of Greenville County.

Carter: Died at her home at The Plains, Fauquier County, Va., on February 8, MRS. ISABEL B. CARTER, aged seventy-eight. She was the widow of the late Josiah T. Carter, and leaves two sons and four daughters to mourn their loss.

Mrs. Carter's was a lovely example of the earnest, serious Christian life. She was diligent in the Father's business, fervent in His worship, and doubtless has passed over to receive the Saviour's approval: "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Those who knew her well will long feel the loss of her counsel and example; and the poor and the sick, and the afflicted of the community will miss her.

J. J. N.

Garth: On Sunday, February 10, 1918, EDWARD BIRCKHEAD GARTH, after a long, painful illness, quietly and peacefully fell asleep in Jesus at the home of his parents, Charles P. and Annie B. Garth, near Profit, Albemarle County, Va. His mortal remains, followed by a large company of loving, sorrowing friends, were laid to rest in the family burying ground at "Norven," his mother's girlhood's home, where rest those of many of this highly esteemed family. The services of the church were conducted by his mother's former pastor, Dr. H. B. Lee, and the solemn rites of the order to which he belonged by their chaplain, the body being tenderly borne by six sturdy young men, in the uniform of the order, accompanied by many others. The hymns were sweetly sung by a choir composed of neighbors. The floral tributes were profuse and beautiful.

These tokens and expressions show the estimate in which this dear boy was held. There was a sweetness and gentleness, accompanied by many traits which drew many to him, and the quiet patience, with which he bore his long, tedious illness, revealed a character of sterling worth, one which would have impressed itself upon the community for great good and usefulness, had his life been spared.

In early childhood he was received into the congregation of Christ's flock in holy baptism, and a little over a year ago, he with his sister and two brothers, ratified the baptismal vows in confirmation in Christ Church, Charlottesville.

In every relation of life this young man was true and faithful, loyal and conscientious. We can but wonder why a life so full of promise should be so soon ended (he was in his twenty-fourth year), even though we know that our heavenly Father doeth all things well.

Macon: Died on Sunday morning, February 10, at his home in Williamsburg, Va., WILLIAM HARTWELL MACON.

Morton: Entered into life more abundant on February 11, 1918, ANTONETTE FITZHUGH YERBY MORTON, wife of John A. Morton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Yerby, in her thirty-second year; a devoted communicant of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Forest Hill, Richmond.

McKnight: On Wednesday, February 6, suddenly, after a brief illness, at the Bryn Mawr Hospital, Bryn Mawr, Pa., ALICE EMMERY MCKNIGHT, daughter of Kate S. and the late William M. McKnight. The funeral was from her home in Bryn Mawr on Friday, February 8, and the interment at Chambersburg, Pa.

Why be afraid of death as though your life were breath!

Death but anoints your eyes with clay,

O glad surprise!

Is sleep a thing to dread? Yet sleeping you are dead?

Till you awake and rise, here or beyond the skies.

The dear ones left behind. O foolish one and blind.

A day—and you will meet; a night—and you will greet!

This is the death of Death, to breathe away a breath,

And know the end of strife and taste

the deathless life,

And joy without a fear, and smile without a tear,

And work, nor care, nor rest, and find the last the best.

—Maltbie D. Babcock.

William Hartwell Macon.

Elizabeth Williamson Harrison.

Entered into rest at the ringing of the church bells on Sunday morning, February 10, WILLIAM HARTWELL MACON from his residence at Williamsburg, Va., in the sixty-seventh year of his age, son of the late Dr. William Hartwell Macon, of New Kent County, and long a communicant of Bruton Parish, which his grandfather of the sixth generation served as vestryman a hundred years before the Revolution. Mr. Macon was a man of unusual kindness of disposition, of simple manners, of absolute loyalty, of genuine goodness—one of God's noblemen.

"Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his."

From the same home on Monday, February 11, ELIZABETH WILLIAMSON HARRISON, wife of the late Colonel Randolph Harrison, of Williamsburg, daughter of Gabriel Williamson, of the United States Navy, in the eighty-fourth year of her age, a gentlewoman whose presence was an afterglow of ante-bellum days. The oldest citizen of Williamsburg, she came "to her grave in a full age like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season." She was a faithful communicant of Bruton Parish Church for more than half a century, a saintly character, whose gathering enriches the garner of heaven.

"Right dear in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."

E. RUFFIN JONES.

Rector of Bruton Parish Church.

Minutes on the Death of Mr. MacMaster.

The Prayer Book Commission, meeting in New York in January, for the first time since the death of its Treasurer, Mr. F. J. MacMaster, which occurred last fall, desires to put upon record its sense of loss. Mr. MacMaster has been the faithful and painstaking Treasurer of the Commission from the beginning of its labors in 1913, and the Commission acknowledges with gratitude how much it has owed to him. A man of strong convictions regarding what he conceived to be fundamental positions as to biblical authority, and as to the Church and its Sacraments, Mr. MacMaster presented his views with unfailing courtesy and persistency throughout the deliberations of the Commission. His fellow-members held him in high esteem and will greatly miss him and his helpful activities. To those who were nearest to him they desire to express their sincerest sympathy.

Was He Successful?

"It was a sad funeral to me," said the speaker, "the saddest I have attended for many years. Edmondson died poor—poor as poverty. His life was one long struggle with the world, and at every disadvantage. Fortune mocked him all the while with golden promises that were destined never to know fulfillment."

"Yet he was patient and enduring," remarked one of the company.

"Patient as a Christian—enduring as a martyr," was answered. "Poor man! He was worthy of a better fate. He ought to have succeeded, for he deserved success, and yet he died poor. Nothing that he put his hand to ever succeeded. A strange fatality seemed to attend every enterprise."

"I was with him in his last moments," said the other, "and thought he died rich."

"No, he has left nothing behind," was the reply. "The heirs will have no concern as to the administration of his estate."

"He left a good name," said one, "and that is something."

"And a legacy of noble needs," remarked another. "And a precious example."

"Lessons of patience in suffering, of hope in adversity, of heavenly confidence when no sunbeams fell upon his bewildered path," was the testimony of another. "And high truths, manly courage, and heroic fortitude."

"Then he died rich," was the emphatic declaration. "His whole life was a series of successes. In every conflict he came off the victor, and now the victor's crown is on his brow."

Fertilizers

Feed the Fields that Feed the World!

THE world is asking for bread and meat. Bigger crops cannot be raised by increasing your acreage, the shortage of labor makes that impossible. To meet the demand for bread more grain must be raised on the acres you now cultivate.

You must fertilize. You cannot ship away more fertility in the form of bigger crops unless you bring more fertility in.

To raise more livestock, we must have more feed. The only way to grow more feed, is to add to your soils supplies of plant food. Upon the use of fertilizers depends both bread and meat.

In the vast storehouses in the earth, Nature provided food for the soil, Nitrates and Phosphates, just as she provided food for man and beast. These plant foods we gather from the four corners of the globe, and make into V-C Fertilizers that are balanced crop rations—that benefit the crop immediately—nourish it from seed time until harvest. The crop is not overfed on one element and starved for the lack of another.

Freight is Congested—Order Early!

We have more than 50 factories in the North, South, East and Middle-West. We are able to get fertilizers to you with a minimum amount of hauling, but the car shortage is serious. Fertilizers should be ordered early, so that the dealer can assemble his orders and have every car loaded to maximum capacity. If you do not order now you may have to do without them!

We have published a series of crop books, which are really text books on better farming. They are written by a foremost authority. Tell us what crops you are interested in, and special books about these crops will be sent you free.

The Tide Is Sure to Win.

On the far reef the breakers
Recoil in shattered foam,
Yet still the sea behind them
Urges its forces home;
Its chant of triumph surges
Through all the thunderous din—
The wave may break in failure,
But the tide is sure to win!

O mighty sea! Thy message
In clanging spray is cast;
Within God's plan of progress
It matters not at last,
How wide the shores of evil,
How strong the reefs of sin—
The wave may be defeated,
But the tide is sure to win!
—The Outlook.

Optimism.

The following is such a splendid expression of optimism that we venture to reproduce it. It has been called "A French Soldier's Litany."

A certain French soldier has told how he overcame the corrosion of fear or worry. The line of reasoning is worth consideration by those who may never face a physical foe but who can never avoid the invisible foes of the mind. It runs as follows:

Of two things one is certain, either you're behind the lines or you're on the front. If you're behind the lines, there is no need to worry.

If you're on the front, of two things one is certain, either you're wounded seriously or you're wounded slightly. If you're wounded seriously in a safe place there is no need to worry.

If you're exposed to danger, of two things one is certain, either you're wounded or you're not wounded. If you're not wounded there is no need to worry.

If you are wounded, of two things one is certain, either you're wounded seriously or you're wounded slightly. If you're wounded slightly there is no need to worry.

If you're wounded seriously, of two things one is certain, either you recover or you die. If you recover there is no need to worry.

If you die you can't worry.

For Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup,

Asthma, Sore Throat, Coughs, Bronchitis, Colds, Catarrh.

Don't fail to use Cresoline for the distressing and often fatal affections for which it is recommended. It is a simple, safe, effective and drugless treatment. Vapo-Cresoline stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves Spasmodic Croup at once. In asthma it shortens the attack and insures comfortable repose.

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresoline relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria.

Cresoline's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use. Send postal for Descriptive Booklet.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Our dead are with the undying love.

A perpetual calm will never make a sailor.

A good conscience is the best armor against calumny.—Ex.

God never takes away what He has once given.—Phillips Brooks.

Those who follow Christ make a great path of light through the world.—C. H. G.

"He lets us have a draught of His cup; but He alone drinks it to the dregs."

Nobody wants to keep a run-away horse, but many keep a run-away temper and think nothing of it.—Ex.

"The steps of Faith
Fall on the seeming void and find
The Rock beneath."

It is the great principle of God's dealings with us that He deals with us not as we are, but as we are becoming.—Selected.

If life is not to be impoverished and materialized, some in every age must make the choice between the inward and the outward wealth.—James Stalker.

If chosen men could never be alone
In deep mid-silence, open-doored to God,
No greatness ever had been dreamed or done.

Let us not forget that life is brief; that time hurries; and that what we do to make our memories of earth beautiful in heaven, and heaven itself more populous than ever, must be done at once.

Consecration is not something done once for all. It is a maintained habit of the soul. A consecrated day is a framework ready prepared in which God alone has to act in us and through us.—A. Monod.

Christ is not merely a truth to be believed, but a way to be trodden; a life to be lived. We get to know Christ as fellow-travelers, fellow-workers, fellow-soldiers, get to know one another—by mingling their lives together.

Our Christian life becomes radiant with fresh significance when we conceive it as an agency of God for the accomplishment of some noble, divinely selected end, and an end, too, distinctly original and personal in the case of each of us.—Robert E. Speer.

If we would endeavor, like men of courage, to stand in the battle, surely we should feel the favorable assistance of God from heaven. For He Who giveth us occasion to fight, to the end that we may get the victory, is ready to succor those that fight manfully and do trust in His grace.—Thomas a Kempis.

We are like Him with whom there is no past and future, when we do our work in the great present, leaving both past and future to Him, to whom they are ever present, and fearing nothing because He is in our future as much as He is in our past—partakers thus of the Divine nature, resting in that perfect All-in-All.—George MacDonald.

The words and laws of Christ, which do not change, and cannot fail, must not be left in the dead print of closed and dusty Bibles or in the sermons of preachers, or the hymns of choirs and congregations. They must be faced and accepted and worked out into the warp and woof of daily life by every one of us who bears Christ's name.—Bishop Rhinelander.

Life is, it must be owned, full of disappointments; but it is so in order that we may learn gradually that we have nothing we may safely hope for but the fulfillment of that blessed will of God which has no false hopes or disappointments. We cling to all sorts of things and they snap in our hands, in order that we may learn that God alone is firm and His commandment exceeding sure.—Rev. H. H. Jeaffreson.

There, where Christ is on the throne, is the anchor of our hopes, and there is the continual warning which hangs over our individual lives and our civilization. All that will allow itself to belong to Christ, all that will admit His redemption will be, quickly or slowly, gathered under His feet, and into His body—all the real riches of humanity, "the glory and honor of all nations." The City of God is thus the assured goal of humanity. The divine purpose will surely effect itself. But how much of the redeeming purpose can be carried out in our lives and in our civilization depends upon ourselves. Our share in the great consummation, as individuals or as a nation, or as a church, depends upon our faithfulness in allegiance to Christ.—Bishop Gore.

A life need not be great to be beautiful. There may be as much beauty in a tiny flower as in a majestic tree—in a little gem as in a great mountain. . . . A beautiful life is one that fulfils its mission—that is what God made it to be, and does what God made it to do.—James R. Miller.

The Following

Extract from a letter received last Saturday was certainly gratifying.

It was written by a Scotchman who successfully manages a large concern in which we hold in trust a controlling interest,—

"I feel that a great part of our success is due to the way in which you have handled your control of our stock."

Now, listen to the closing paragraph—

"I am convinced that any one who puts his estate in your hands can be assured that it will be administered in the interest of the estate, and that you have no personal friends to reward or axes to grind."

Good Will.

The will to power, or the will to love; the will to slay for selfish gain, or the will to serve and save; the will selfishly driven by intellect without conscience, or the will and the wisdom ruled and directed by love; which is the creating power back of nature and history? Or is it mechanical force, without either will or intellect or conscience; heedless of sin and suffering, and working for no triumph of righteousness. At the center of all things, what is the great first cause? Is it force, or conscienceless will, or a God whose character is that of righteousness and love and mercy? Christianity declares that the cause is a personal being whose essential characteristic is moral and spiritual perfection, and not mere physical power; the one personal Divine Being who is Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and who works by love and sacrifice for His creatures. At the birth of Christ the spaces opened and out rolled the clear and full revelation that a good will is at the center; the good tidings which should dispel false fear, and convince men that the Almighty Hand of God is for and not against them. It was seen to be the gentle hand of a Babe, and came to be the pierced hand. The interpretation and the use of religion merely as a system to protect men from wrath were to be displaced; and religion was to be a means to bind men in loyalty to the loving God; and salvation was not to be conceived as an avoidance of punishment, but a redemption from sin, a growth in godlikeness and a unity with God.

The God who was and is above His world, and also in it, manifested His good will by humbling Himself in the Person of the Son to take upon Him the form of a servant, and by fulfilling and enduring the life of the Cross and the death on the Cross. By His power of righteousness and love He is surely lifting men upward into obedience to Himself, and towards an order where they will more and more do the works of good will towards one another, and where life will be more and more organized in active brotherhood.

Whenever and wherever men claim the God revealed in Christ, and yet do the works of selfishness and hate and tyranny and cruelty and evil will, they are using the name of Christ, but they are denying the real revelation and the real standards which He represents; they are reverting to a pagan past, and clothing with His sacred name ideas and purposes which actually belong to fabled monster deities of an unchristian age. The Teutonic assumption to-day of supernatural sanction and power is sacrilege, because the Teutonic theory and practice of war utterly contradict the principle and law of good will which Christianity demands of men and governments, and which accord with the character of the God revealed in Christ.

Though the prophecy of the angels' song is denied by the ruthless spirit which caused this world war and such distress of nations, still the standards of the one true God abide; and the evil forms of pagan deities will be buried again. Those who fight and suffer and die to defeat the scheme of evil will, and to make it possible for the world to be ordered in good will, will not contend in vain; because the stars point to Bethlehem; because those who battle for fair peace and for a

A War Hymn.

The following hymn is being sung in the American Church in Paris. It was sent to the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh, N. C., by a member of that Church in France, Lieutenant James A. Higgs, and, with the permission of Bishop Cheshire, is now being sung in that Church. It is most appropriate for this time, and is sung to the tune of No. 306 in our Hymnal, "Eternal Father, Strong to Save."

Hymn for Our Soldiers at the Front.

Tune: Melita.

O Lord of Hosts, Whose mighty arm
In safety keeps' mid war's alarm,
Protect our soldiers at the Front
Who bear of war the bitter brunt.
And in the hour of danger spread
Thy sheltering wings above each head.

In battle's harsh and dreadful hour,
Make bare Thine arm of sovereign power,
And fight for them who fight for Thee,
And give Thine own the victory.
O in the hour of danger spread
Thy sheltering wings above each head.

If by the way they wounded lie,
O listen to their plaintive cry;
And rest them on Thy loving breast,
O Thou on Whom the cross was pressed;
And in the hour of danger shed
Thy glorious radiance o'er each head.

When pestilence at noonday wastes,
And death in triumph onward hastes,
O Saviour Christ, remember Nain,
And give us our beloved again.
In every ward of sickness tread,
And lay Thine hand upon each head.

O Friend and Comforter divine,
Who makest light at midnight shine,
Give consolation to the sad
Who in the days of peace were glad.
And in the hour of sorrow spread
Thy wings above each drooping head.
Amen.

The Lord's Day: It is peculiarly regrettable that there should have come into modern usage the expression, "the Christian Sabbath," for it tends to perpetuate a confusing together of two things which in most respects differ. The Lord's Day and the Sabbath both have the obedience to the principle of one-seventh of the time for man's need; but in other respects there is contrast as striking as the resemblance. One is the seventh day, the other is the first; the seventh day commemorates God's rest in creation, the first day Christ's resurrection. On the seventh day God rested, on the first day Christ was ceaselessly active, and inspired a like activity in His disciples. "Go, tell," was His great word. The Sabbath rests upon law, the Lord's Day upon voluntary devotion and the spirit of service.—C. I. Scofield.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND AND ITS INITIAL RESERVE FUND.

The conviction is daily becoming more urgent in the Church that the Church Pension Fund should, in the present emergency, be making a more liberal provision to meet the crying wants of the aged clergy who were already her honored pensioners when the present pension system went into effect. If half of the facts in regard to the circumstances of some of these were generally known, the outcry in their behalf would become clamorous; but these are not the sort of men who expose their necessities for public commiseration. Many of these old clergymen, with their families, are in circumstances almost of destitution. Individual cases are known, one to a few friends here, another to a few there. The aggregate is not known, but it is practically the old list of beneficiaries of the former Clergy Relief Society. Meanwhile the Church generally is taking for granted that, having now a single great pension system whose wonderful success has been the subject of universal congratulation, these retired veterans are being well taken care of. The reverse is the case. The Church Pension Fund is the only agency by which the Church can minister to their relief, all the others having been put out of business in order that this Fund should have the field of pension relief to itself. Moreover, an amount of money has been entrusted by the Church to this Fund amply sufficient, as far as appears, to enable them to grant a much larger measure of relief to these just and immediate claimants upon her bounty than the formal obligation which they assumed technically compel them to bestow. These facts are self-evident. But when a suggestion to this effect is made, the answer is returned that the Initial Reserve Fund was given for a single and specific object—to meet the accrued liabilities for the clergy who would become beneficiaries of the Pension Fund after it went into operation; therefore, no part of it can be used to increase the pensions of those who had retired before it went into effect. A distinguished Churchman of Philadelphia, in a letter to our contemporary, the Living Church, states this proposition in these emphatic terms:

"If ever the terms of a trust were clearly set forth, when the money was being raised, it was this. Everybody knew, or could have known, that the fund was not intended to provide for those who have retired previous to its completion. Now, because the fund is greater than was anticipated, it is proposed to use some of it for a class who were expressly excluded from participating in it. The proposition is ethically unsound and morally vicious, to say nothing of being entirely illegal."

Which is putting it pretty strongly: more so, we venture to believe, than a full knowledge of the facts will justify. For, as a matter of fact, unless we are vastly mistaken, the Initial Reserve Fund was intended in part "to provide for those who had retired previous to its completion."

The Commission of the General Convention which devised and launched the elaborate scheme of the Pension Fund, presented to the Convention of 1913 as their first "basic principle," the following proposition: "Resolved: That the Church should work toward the adoption of one pension system, covering the entire territory of the Church and the entire scope of pension activity, and operating under definite and known rules." This was fully explained to the Convention to mean just what it said—that existing pension systems or agencies should be merged into this one new system, which would assume all their existing obligations to their beneficiaries. This was approved by that General Convention, and was incorporated into the Canon of the Pension Fund in 1916. It was further stated, however, that until these pension principles were successfully established, "the Church should continue to support the existing incorporated agencies;" the implication plainly being that after that time the new pension system would undertake to "cover" their operations as part of the "entire scope of pension activities." No one supposed that this could be done without large financial expenditure, but the Commission in their report said that these present beneficiaries "must be provided for," and spoke of the careful investigation required that this should "be accomplished with safety out of the fund for the accrued liabilities."

Before a dollar of the Initial Reserve Fund was raised, and as a condition precedent to its being raised, the Pension Fund had assumed obligations amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars in securing the merger of various diocesan relief societies and funds, being pledged to make good the annuities then paid by these funds but releasing the income from them to meet diocesan assessments for the benefit of future pensioners. How were these obligations to be met, except out of the Initial Reserve Fund? Later the Pension Fund absorbed by merger the Clergy Relief Fund and assumed the payment of the annuities granted to its beneficiaries. It has been asserted, we understand, that the Pension Fund has found the liabilities thus assumed to be greater than they had expected. We cannot imagine that these excellent financiers ever in their lives "bought a pig in a poke." The books of the Clergy Relief Fund were open to them, for if ever a society made complete reports of its financial condition and assets to the Church it was that one. They knew exactly what obligations they were assuming and made provision for meeting them. But how, except out of the Initial Reserve Fund?

It is obvious then that a part of the Initial Reserve was intended to be used in paying annuities to the veteran pensioners, and was therefore "intended to provide for those who had retired previous to its completion." So the latter class were not, to that extent, "expressly excluded from participating in it." Otherwise we would question as "ethically unsound and morally vicious," if not illegal, the setting apart of three million dollars of it as a guarantee, to enable the Pension Fund to pay the old grants of the Clergy Relief and Diocesan Funds which they assumed. To be sure, this is probably much more than will be needed, even temporarily, for that purpose; and in any event the greater part of what was segregated for meeting the obligations of the Clergy Relief Fund will eventually come back out of its present and prospective assets. But year by year for a long time payments will be made on account of Diocesan Funds which will never be returned, nor was it expected nor intended that they should. But no one on that account accuses the Pension Fund of misappropriating any part of the Reserve.

It is perfectly true that when the Reserve Fund was being raised by the Church the point was especially emphasized and laboriously explained that this Fund was necessary in order that the "accrued liabilities" for the clergy still in active service should be met. This was needful, because here was the feature of the new pension system which was unusual but upon which all the rest depended, and certainly the great bulk of the Reserve Fund would be expended for this purpose. But we do not recall, nor do we find in any official paper coming from the office of the Fund which is now at hand, the categorical statement that the whole sum of five million dollars was to be used exclusively for these accrued liabilities. How could it have been so, when there were other liabilities already undertaken which had to be met, directly or indirectly, out of the same fund.

But instead of the $5,064,000 officially declared to be a sufficient Initial Reserve Fund to enable the Pension Fund to go into operation unembarrassed by accrued obligations, the Church intrusted to it a sum greater than this by more than three and a half million dollars. What was to be done with this enormous surplus?

It would seem that the conditions of the trust would be sufficiently complicated with if the surplus should be used (a) to reduce the assessments upon the parishes or dioceses for future pensioners, or (b) to increase the minimum pensions of the active clergy who should become pensioners after March 1, 1917, or (c) to increase the annuities of the veterans who were retired before the said March 1, 1917. Only the second of these alternatives seems even to have been considered by the Trustees, as far as can be gathered from their action. When the now miserably inadequate annuities formerly pledged to the beneficiaries of the Clergy Relief and Diocesan Funds have all been paid, and these obligations have been terminated by the hastening hand of death, "the $3,000,000," says Mr. Sayre with evident satisfaction, "will then constitute a reserve in the hands of the Trustees, the income of which will enable it (sic) to extend the benefits of the pension system to the clergy and their families."

Now if we are told that no part of this surplus can be used for the old and unbenefited pensioners by increasing their annuities, because this purpose was not specified when the Reserve Fund was being raised, we answer that neither can it be used to increase out of the Reserve Fund the pension of any future pensioner to more than the fixed minimum of $600, because that purpose was not specified when the Fund was being raised. But far less was it specified or intended or desired by the Church that a permanent reserve should accumulate in the hands of the Trustees, the income of which alone is to be used in pension benefits. The accumulation of such a permanent fund is expressly provided against in the plan of the Pension Fund accepted by the Church, and the whole Initial Reserve Fund is to be used up in the life-time of the present generation of clergymen. Thereafter the benefits and the liabilities, that is, what is collected and what is paid out, must actuarially balance. See the Canon and its reference to the Journal of 1913.

Our contention therefore is that the whole of this Initial Reserve Fund, the sum originally required and also the surplus actually given, is to be used for pension benefits for clergymen, or the widows and orphans of clergymen, now living; and that the clergymen retired before March 1, 1917, or the widows and orphans of such clergymen are justly entitled, not only to the part of the $5,000,000 asked for which was necessary to pay the former annuities pledged for them, but to a proportionate and decent share of the surplus provided over and above that amount.

If we are wrong in our conception of the facts, or in our deductions from them, we think we have the right, and that the thousands of devoted Churchmen who contributed to this eight and three-quarter million dollar Fund, who think as we do, and who are grieved and disappointed and indignant at the treatment accorded the old pensioners, have the right to be told wherein we are mistaken; so that we may apologize for any unjust criticism and withdraw any incorrect statement and be ourselves satisfied in regard to this matter. On the other hand, if the Pension Fund made a mistake in their calculations, and find that five millions were not enough to meet the accrued liabilities and the insufficient annuities pledged to the old pensioners but that the whole of the eight and three-quarter millions are required for these purposes with no increase of pensions, let them inform the Church frankly of the fact so that further steps may be taken to relieve more adequately the necessities of our veteran retired clergymen. But in any case we appeal to them, as the only agency of the Church authorized to act in the premises, to "administer the pension system of this Church," as required of them by Canon, in such generous and Christian fashion that the pressing needs of our disabled clergy and their families may be relieved, either out of the means already afforded, or by letting the Church know the conditions that more sufficient means may be supplied. The names of these clergymen and widows and orphans are in the office of the Pension Fund. Their circumstances may be learned by inquiry from their Bishops. The Church looks to this Fund to save her from the shame and disgrace of allowing them to suffer, neglected and forgotten, while she supposes that she had made abundant provision for their relief.

We lay this challenge squarely before the Church Pension Fund and await their answer.

THE ATROCITIES IN WESTERN ASIA.

The Editor hesitates in inflicting upon his readers further recitals of the Turkish atrocities in Bible lands. "War is Hell," but this sort of thing is not war, and the language of civilized peoples fails of similes by which to describe it, even as their imagination fails adequately to picture it. But it is needful that we keep these tragic facts before our minds, lest we fail also in our practical sympathy for the victims of this diabolical oppression who remain alive, and lest we forget one of the issues of the righteous war in which we are engaged.

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief says, in asking that space be given for some of the copy sent:

"We feel that it is highly appropriate that consideration be given this subject at this time:

"1. Because of the desperate need and the fact that people whom we can save are starving every day.

"2. Because in many churches during the Lenten Season people are giving special thought to Bible Lands as they were during our Lord's ministry, trial and crucifixion. We feel it would be pleasing to Him that we should this year give attention to present day conditions which present an unprecedented opportunity for Christ-like ministry."

Moreover, one of the purposes of this war is that scenes such as have been enacted in those lands within the last few years shall hereafter forever be impossible on the face of this globe. European diplomacy has been largely responsible for maintaining conditions that made these massacres possible. Jealousy among the nations, each fearful that some other would reap an advantage if the Turkish Empire should be disciplined and its power curbed, and a discredited statescraft bent on preserving an imaginary "balance of power," has protected the insolent Turk in his seat and in a measure connived at his barbarous machinations, until Germany found in him a tool ready to her hand and practiced in methods quite in keeping with her own. Nor is America quite free from blame, with her traditional policy of "hands off" and "no affair of ours," except where her own prerogatives were threatened. This may have been justifiable in our non-age, but we are past that now. And the world has passed the period of a secret and selfish diplomacy by which national advantages may be acquired at the peril of other nations or at the sacrifice of honesty and justice. A new international policy, in which we have a proud part, is being inaugurated even amid the throes of this war, the principle of which is, The earth, not for the strong or the crafty, but for the people who live upon it; and to every people the right to live their own lives in peace. That principle, please God, will be established and defended from the day when Prussianism and Turkism shall have been forever wiped out as barriers in the paths of righteousness and civilization and offenses, unpardonable and unendurable, against the conscience of the human race.

Meanwhile, as we struggle against conditions which made the Armenian tragedy possible, we must hold out succor with unstinting hand to these remaining victims of oppression lest defense and liberty dawn for them too late. Many hearts have bled as they read of the little child, alone and forgotten, found by an American visitor in an almost depopulated Syrian village, stretched on the doorstep of a deserted house with only strength to wail, "I'm hungry; I'm so hungry!" She is typical of hundreds of thousands of others, the seed remaining of an ancient and worthy Christian people, whom we may reach if we will with the gifts of food and life.

Armenia.

By Henry Morgenthau, Former Ambassador to Turkey.

Few nations have suffered as much as Armenia. So terrible and continuous have been the atrocities to which it has fallen victim that the very name of Armenia has, to most of us, become synonymous with martyrdom. Its sufferings during the present catastrophe have been greater than any known in the history of the world. None of the fearful horrors perpetrated in the various zones of the war can compare with the tragic lot of the Armenians.

Though deprived of their political independence, the Armenians have never been assimilated by their conquerors, the Turks. They have tenaciously clung to their racial traditions, religion, language and ideals. Their early history, embracing periods contemporaneous with the ancient Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Parthians, is still a source of pride to them, and their religion—Christianity—is and has been the great moral force sustaining and inspiring them against the attacks of the many hordes that have emerged from Central Asia and passed through their territory on their way to Europe.

The final and worst measure used against the Armenians was the wholesale deportation of the entire population from their homes and their exile to the desert, with all the accompanying horrors of the way. No means were provided for their transportation or nourishment. The victims, which included educated men and women of standing, had to walk on foot, exposed to the attacks of bands of criminals especially organized for that purpose. Homes were literally uprooted; families were captured; men killed, women and girls violated daily on the way or taken to harems. Children were thrown into the rivers or sold to strangers by their mothers to save them from starvation. The facts contained in the reports received at the Embassy from absolutely trustworthy eyewitnesses surpass the most beastly and diabolical cruelties ever before perpetrated or imagined in the history of the world. The Turkish authorities had stopped all communication between the provinces and the capital in the naive belief that they could consummate this crime of the ages before the outside world could hear of it. But the information filtered through the Consuls, missionaries, foreign travelers and even Turks. We soon learned that orders had been issued to the governors of the provinces to send into exile the entire Armenian population in their jurisdiction, irrespective of age and sex. The local officers, with few exceptions, carried out literally these instructions. All the able-bodied men had either been drafted into the army or disarmed. The remaining people, old men, women and children, were subjected to the most cruel and outrageous treatment.

In Mamuret-ul-Aziz the people were subjected for two months to almost unbelievable torture; the families of the better class were dealt with most severely. On July 1, the first 2,000 were dispatched from Harpoot. They were soldiers, and it was rumored that they would build roads. People became frightened. Whereupon the Vali called the German missionary, Mr. ———, and begged him to quiet the people; he was so very sorry that they all had such fears, etc., etc. They had hardly been away for a day when they were all killed in a mountain pass. They were bound together, and when the Kurds and soldiers started to shoot at them, some managed to escape in the dark. The next day another 2,000 were sent in the direction of Diarbekir. Among those deported were several of our orphans (boys) who had been working for the Government all the year round. Even the wives of the Kurds came with their knives and murdered the Armenians. Some of the latter succeeded in fleeing. When the Government heard that some Armenians managed to escape, they left those who were to be deported without food for two days, in order that they would be too weak to flee.

All the high Catholic Armenians, together with their Archbishop, were murdered.

Up to now there still remained a number of tradesmen whom the Government needed and therefore had not deported; now these, too, were ordered to leave and were murdered.

As this massacre of the Armenians, judged both by the numbers involved and the methods used, was the greatest single horror ever perpetrated in the history of humanity, the questions will often be asked, how many Armenians were actually murdered or died of starvation or exposure? How many were driven into a miserable exile? Following the important collection of documents made by Viscount Bryce is a careful summary of the facts. The total Armenian population in the Turkish Empire in 1912 is here placed at between 1,600,000 and 2,000,000. Of these, 182,000 escaped into the Russian Caucasus and 4,200 into Egypt. One hundred and fifty thousand still remain in Constantinople. To this figure must be added the relatively small number of survivors who escaped death and are now living in hiding or are scattered in distant provinces. We must conclude that a million Armenians were hurried out of their homes in the peaceful villages and populous towns in Asia Minor. The murdered number from 600,000 to 800,000. The remainder, in pitiful want of the barest necessities of life, hold out their hands to the Christian fellowship of America.

Tragic Stories Without End.

William T. Ellis.

(Mr. William T. Ellis and Mr. Charles T. Beury, of Philadelphia, have just returned from the Russian Caucasus and Western Persia, where they went at their own charges to investigate and report upon the work of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief among the hundreds of thousands of homeless refugees in this area. Following are extracts from the report of Mr. Ellis as printed in the Sunday-School Times.)

The plan of orphan relief is simple. It is the rule of the Armenian Committee in Eriwan to give no money to men or women, except the latter be seriously ill; work it does provide for a few adults by its wonderful industrial establishment. For one child out of a family of orphans, it provides a stipend of six roubles monthly, increased at the time of our visit to ten roubles, owing to the depreciation of the rouble, which is now worth less than ten cents.

Each case is investigated by men trained in the mission schools of the American Board, some having been ministers or professors back in Armenia. This relief work, I found, will stand the acid test of the Associated Charities or of the Rockefeller Foundation; for there is system in it all, down to the minutest detail. Nobody need fear that Armenian relief funds are either wasted or given to the undeserving.

We sat down to hear "stories." There was no prearrangement about this. We simply took the boys and girls in line, and then a few of the most needy women. I did not have to look for stories; literally every one of these Armenian survivors has a story, a tale of tragedy. Mr. Beury and I made notes until we were numb with the awfulness and immensity of it all.

This old man, bent nearly double, is ninety years of age. His crippled condition is due to his having been shot in the back at his home near Van. Seven members of his family were killed, but his wife escaped, only to die here.

Out of a household of thirty-seven, this little girl of thirteen years and six others escaped alive, only one of the survivors being a man, who is not now in the village.

Here is an interesting family of five children, boy twins of twelve, with two younger brothers and one sister. Their father was killed at Sassoun. For an entire year these little ones lived in the mountains, subsisting on berries and roots.

Of a family of seven, one old woman and a young boy alone escaped, wounded, and lived for seven months with friendly Kurds—for some Kurds and Turks did protect Christians in the days of the great tribulation. * * *

A little woman of eight years from Bitlis draws near, holding the hand of a pathetic babe, who had been orphaned by the Kurds. This little girl is the only member left of a family of eight. Her father was killed by the Turks, and her mother died in bitter captivity. Her older sister, too, was carried off by the Moslems. Now the brave lassie is trying to care for the wee cousin, who is her only living kin.

This woman, who, like all others, is past tears, saw her husband carried off and her four children killed before her eyes, despite her frantic efforts to save them by flinging herself upon their bodies. She herself was stripped naked, made a slave, and kept in hunger and hardship amid the Kurds. The Russians rescued her.

Out of a total of fifty persons in the next household—and in the East, be it remembered, the patriarchal system of three generations dwelling beneath the same roof obtains to this day—there were four survivors, this boy of eight, his sister of five, his aunt and his cousin. The little children were witnesses to the foul murder of their parents. * * *

If the reader wants more stories of horror, let him go to any of the hundreds of Caucasus villages that hold Armenian survivors.

* * * Close to my side had been a woman of perhaps thirty years, with a little girl of four or five. She had been dignified and quiet, but resolutely importunate. When she saw that our carriage was really leaving, with nothing done for her child, a panic look came into her face, and her great dark eyes were flooded with tears, which streamed over her cheeks. She did not cry out, nor wail or scream, like most Oriental women; but she was after life for her little girl. So she picked up the child and tried to thrust her upon me. I was compelled to make provision for its needs.

Then I was stormed by others, but in vain; and as we drove away, into a peace-imparting view of Ararat, it was not of the crowd I was thinking, but of the quiet, strong mother with the wonderful eyes, and of the little girl whom I had refused to accept as a gift. There are thousands such.

Here and there, as we look across our life, we see green and happy spots where we were refreshed, renewed, restored. In our best moments we know that it was the Good Shepherd who took us there, and we might have been there far oftener had we given up our lives to His leading and guidance, for the paths upon which He leads us are not crooked, but straight.—Selected.

Training School for Chaplains Established by the War Department.

Last May, shortly after the war broke out, the Federal Council's Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains at Washington presented to the War Department a plan for a Training School for Chaplains in the Army. At that time the War Department felt unable to establish it. Since then the matter has been the subject of frequent consultation with the result that on February 15 Secretary Baker signed an order establishing such a training school.

The location chosen is Fortress Monroe, Va., in or about which nearly every form of army activity is represented and where the prospective chaplains can become thoroughly informed concerning all branches of the service. While in the school the candidates will be under complete army discipline just as are candidates for commissions in training schools for other officers' corps. The head of the school will be Chaplain Alfred A. Pruden, who has had eighteen years of successful experience in the Regular Army. With him will be associated three other chaplains whose work has been especially effective.

The course of instruction of the school includes military and international law and army regulations, military hygiene, sanitation and similar matters. Much of the instruction will be given by informal discussions and conferences designed to bring the students as rapidly as possible into such familiarity with the regulations and practices of the Army as will prevent their being at a disadvantage in dealing with more experienced officers and men. A distinct feature of the course will be the conduct of religious services in the camps and neighboring barracks and the study of practical methods of meeting the soldier's religious and social needs. The course will last a little over a month and will be repeated every five weeks. The school will open with eighty present, forty of whom will be candidates and forty newly appointed chaplains. It is expected that all newly appointed chaplains now serving will be required to take the course.

Candidates will be selected by the Federal Council's Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains and by the Roman Catholic Chaplaincy Bureau. After completing the course, the candidates will be examined and, if satisfactory, will be graded by the rating scale for officers of the line and then receive commissions. The school marks a highly significant step in the improvement of the standing and efficiency of the chaplain's service.

The War Develops Better Sailors.

A higher moral tone among sailors developed directly as a result of the war is noted by Dr. George Sidney Webster, Secretary of the American Seamen's Friend Society, which maintains a large Sailors' Home on the North River waterfront. In the past few months thousands of sailors from the merchant marine have spent many of their hours in port at the Society's building, and the authorities have had an opportunity to observe the morale of the men.

The so-called "bum" has given up the sea, says Dr. Webster, and the reason he gives is the war-time danger of sea-travel. Many of them have been induced to take jobs on shore, despite the fact that the work is heavier, and still others have been drafted or, perhaps, have enlisted. The voluntary enlistments of men of this type are said to be few.

Says Dr. Webster: "We are glad to note a high morale among the merchantmen sailors in the port of New York since the war has in recent months spread its influence more widely. Seldom in these days do we see the laggard type. He is replaced by the man who has seen service in the trenches and been invalidated or wounded, or by the young boy who sees in the merchant marine an opportunity to contribute a war service.

"Then, too, there is a quickening of the patriotic spirit among many of them, though the always reticent sailor would be the last to acknowledge it. To touch at ports piled high with war supplies and to risk the submarine danger in transporting supplies and men for the Allies' cause dignifies the able seamen in these days and the result has necessarily been a new and finer mark upon his character."

The American Seamen's Friend Society has headquarters for sailors in many of the principal ports of the country, and in New York alone has had an aggregate attendance of some 200,000 in the past year.

Our Chinese congregations at St. Stephen's Mission, Manila, are co-operating loyally with their fellow-American citizens in all matters connected with the war.

Of course they observed the Day of Prayer, set apart by proclamation of President Wilson last autumn, and at the same time made an offering to be sent to Bishop Brent, to be used by him in his ministrations to American soldiers in France.

On All Saints' Day the congregation made an offering for the relief of the destitute widows and orphans of French soldiers. Altogether their gifts amounted to over $80, which would be easily the equivalent of $800 for a similar congregation in this country.

A cable from Bishop Lloyd, received at the Church Missions House on Thursday, February 21, announces an interesting series of visitations in the Cape Palmas district of Liberia. Both the Bishop and Archdeacon Schofield, who accompanied him, are well.

Missionary Addresses.

Miss Helen Littell, of New York, is making a tour through the two Virginia Dioceses this and next week, in the interests of the general hospital of our Church at Wuchang, China. She will visit Petersburg on Thursday, February 28, and address the members of the Auxiliary of our churches there. On Friday, March 1, in the afternoon, in St. Andrew's Church, Norfolk, and at night, in St. John's Church, Portsmouth, she will address the members of the Auxiliaries and our Church people of these cities, upon the great needs of our medical missionaries in China and our duty, as well as our privilege of supplying them. On Saturday morning she will meet the Juniors and the children of our Sunday-schools in St. Luke's Parish House, Norfolk, and show them how they can assist in this noble work, and that evening there will be an informal parlor meeting at the home of the Diocesan President of the Auxiliary, Mrs. John D. Letcher, which the gentlemen are cordially invited to attend. On Sunday, March 3, she will be at the newly organized Church of the Good Shepherd, near the Country Club, of which the Rev. J. Hubbard Lloyd, is rector. On Monday she will go to Lynchburg and on Tuesday to Roanoke to meet and address the Auxiliaries and our church people of these cities.

Miss Littell is a most interesting, helpful and inspiring missionary speaker, and will be recalled with pleasure by those who had the privilege of hearing her at our annual meeting in Hampton in November last. All church people, both men and women, but especially the members of the Auxiliary, are most cordially invited to attend these meetings, and are urged to allow nothing to prevent their being present. If any previous engagements interfere, make an effort to have them postponed. There is no better Lenten work and training than securing information, first hand, about the churches Foreign Missions.

The Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., the venerable Bishop of the Diocese, is reported as being seriously ill at his residence in Norfolk.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The midday services in St. Paul's Church at one o'clock each week day, except Saturday, under the auspices of the Richmond Clericus and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, have become a regular and valuable feature of the Lenten season in Richmond. This year, although the attendance of young men has been reduced because a large number of them are already in training camp or at the front, the interest in the services is as great as ever. The speakers secured are men of power, and their messages are looked forward to with keen interest.

On Thursday and Friday after Ash Wednesday, the Rev. Robert B. Nelson, rector of Christ Church, Blacksburg, at present serving as the War Commission's volunteer chaplain at Camp Lee, was the preacher and delivered two strong sermons on the spiritual aspect of the war.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina, well known in Richmond from his rectorship of St. Mark's Church, and later of St. James Church, was the preacher during the week of February 17. He spoke of the several fundamental things which must and will endure in spite of the shock and devastation of a world war. Monday his topic was God's Written Word; Tuesday, the Church of Christ; Wednesday, the Power of Christ Himself, and on Thursday and Friday he stressed the individual obligation of Christian men and women in their daily living to radiate the light and influence of Christianity.

The annual meeting of the Local Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew was held in the Soldiers' Sailors' and Marine Club, Richmond, Friday night, February 22.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina, made an excellent address on his work among the soldiers at camp.

All the former officers were re-elected for the ensuing year.

Reports were made by Chairmen of the several committees covering the past four months.

Mr. George J. Benson, Chairman of the House Committee, gave a very interesting account of his stewardship, telling of the large number partaking of the old-time Virginia hospitality at family homes.

Colonel Henry Lee Valentine, Chairman of the Club, gave one illustration of the good work done by the club. Every Saturday afternoon three truckloads of soldiers have been brought from South Richmond to corner of Fifth and Grace Streets, thereby relieving the congested condition of street cars. This club, though conducted by the various Chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, makes no discrimination as to membership, the government uniform being the badge of admittance.

The friends of the Rev. William B. Lee, Jr., will be glad to know of his safe arrival in France. He has been assigned Y. M. C. CUBA.

Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop.

Clerical Changes.

The Missionary District of Cuba has experienced so many losses recently through deaths and removals that for some time it has been impossible to undertake any extension of the work. The deaths of the Rev. Messrs. Moreno and Snively left Bolondron and La Gloria vacant, and the retirement and subsequent death of the Rev. Mr. Sharpe followed by the retirement of Archdeacon Sturges, of Calvario Mission, in Jesus del Monte, left that important mission pastorless. These vacancies have been provided for by some shifting of the men in other parts of the island, and the employment of three ex-Roman priests who have come to us. Father Pablo Munoz has already been authorized to exercise his functions as a priest in this Church, and has taken charge of Calvario Mission; Father Juan Tomas has been licensed as lay reader with license to deliver sermons, and is in charge of the work in Sagua la Grande; and Father Angel Ferro, a most eloquent preacher, similarly licensed, is preaching a series of missions throughout the island. The Rev. William Watson, of Guantanamo, has been called to the bedside of his father in Philadelphia, and his place for the present is to be taken by the Rev. J. M. Lopez-Guillen. The Rev. C. W. Frazer, of Ensenada de Mora, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Mary's parish, Jacksonville, Fla.

A very interesting work is being carried on at the Constancia sugar plantation by Mr. R. E. Porter. In this and other sugar plantations of this company there are very many small villages, in which the workmen live with their families in houses supplied by the company. It is the business of Mr. Porter to see that there is a school in each place, and that so far as may be possible religious services be held there, usually in the school houses. It is our privilege to hold such services twice a month; the Rev. R. C. Moreno goes over from Cienfuegos, where he has a congregation and a parochial school. These colonias are united by lines of the company's railways, and the trips from one to another may be made usually in a railway automobile. When this is out of commission they must be made on horseback. The Archdeacon of Havana makes these visitations once every month, visiting Sagua and Cienfuegos as well. These services must necessarily be of a very simple character. There are no altars, no vesting rooms, and but little time for each place; therefore, the clergyman holds the services without vestments, and they consist of a few prayers and hymns and the address or sermon. As sometimes as many as seven or more places are to be visited in one day, and the distances to be covered between them are ten or more miles, but little time may be devoted to the services. True, the people get but half a loaf, but that is better than no bread.

On the Isle of Pines the churches at Santa Fe, Santa Barbara, McKinley and Columbia, and the rectory at Santa Fe, which were all greatly injured by the cyclone of last November, has been repaired and are practically in as good condition as formerly. The Rev. W. H. Decker, the priest in charge of all the work on the Isle of Pines, is obliged to make use of an automobile in order to meet his engagements at the various stations. Sometimes he must travel sixty or more miles on Sunday for this purpose. He has now a new Ford to replace the machine ruined by the storm.

On January 13 Bishop Hulse made his annual visitation to the Isle of Pines, holding services at Columbia, Santa Barbara, McKinley and Santa Fe. Patriotic addresses were made at the service in Santa Fe by the Bishop and Captain Pack.

On January 27 Mr. Decker held a similar service at Santa Barbara, addresses being made by him and Captain Pack.

Gifts and Improvements: A new parish house has been completed, dedicated and is now in use at Sueno, a suburb of Santiago. It combines a chapel with the usual rooms found in a building of that sort, and is one of the most satisfactory parish buildings in Cuba.

At Cespedes work has again begun on the church. It was interrupted by the lack of materials, and by the unsettled conditions incident to the last uprising of the people last year. This building will soon be completed and occupied.

The face, ends and top of the Cathedral altar have been covered with marble, and three white marble steps have been placed, thus finishing that part of the church with the exception of the retable of dark mahogany, which is in process of making.

A very handsome pulpit, the gift of

Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Brownson, and a choir parapet and lectern, all made of richly carved dark mahogany, have been placed in the Cathedral, and the two latter were dedicated by Bishop Hulse on Septuagesima Sunday. The parapet and lectern were given by Mrs. W. A. Merchant, in memory of her mother, Mrs. Amanda Duncan Cathcart, of Charleston, S. C.

All the chancel furniture follows the original designs of the architects of the building.

The money is now in hand for the construction of the Bishop's chair, and it is expected that work will be begun upon it at once.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Harry D. Viets, assistant at St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, has been called to St. John's Church, Carlisle.

The Rev. George T. Lascelle, assistant at the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, New York, has been called to St. Matthew's Church, Sunbury, and begins his rectorship March 1.

The Rev. Lewis H. Huber, rector of St. James Church, Bedford, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Paul's, Monongahela, in the Diocese of Pittsburgh, and will enter upon his work there in the middle of March.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial: A handsome window in three panels was dedicated on the first Sunday in Lent by the Bishop of the Diocese, at the St. Mary Memorial, Pittsburgh. At the base it bore the inscription, "In Memoriam, Edith Elizabeth Collins, June 7, 1914."

Clerical Union: The February meeting of the Pittsburgh Clerical Union took place on Monday, the eighteenth, at the Church of the Ascension, opening with a celebration of the Holy Communion, followed by a business meeting and luncheon, with a discussion later on "Vital Issues of Diocesan Convention," led by the Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, rector of the church. The attendance was remarkably good, and the subject elicited much interest on the part of all present.

The Archbishop of York's Visit to America.

It is desired that some misstatements made concerning the Archbishop of York and his visit to America, chiefly by the daily newspapers, be corrected. The Archbishop is due to arrive at once and begins his addresses in Trinity Church on March 3. He did not decline the invitation to come to America when first extended him, as has been stated, and he was never a pacifist. He is coming to America, it is stated on authority, with the full approval of the British Government. He does not come as a political representative in any sense, although he will extend to the American people the greetings of the British people in all of their relations. He is a spiritual messenger, coming in the name of Christ and the Church, and it will be a spiritual message that he will seek to give.

Washington's birthday was generally observed in New York, and in particular in the churches. The patriotic service in St. Paul's was attended by more than one hundred army nurses in uniform. The historic Washington pew was decorated with American flags, and was occupied during the services by Lord Aberdeen, William Lanier Washington, representing the Order of the Cincinnati, and Colonel Robertson Durham, of the Gordon Highlanders. The Stars and Stripes with a color guard from Governor's Island occupied a position at the side of the lectern, and the British Union Jack, with a color guard made up of sergeants from the British and Canadian Recruiting Missions, was placed at the side of the pulpit. At the head of the middle aisle were the colors of the nurses. The service included prayer for the President of the United States, prayers for King George and the British royal family, for peace, for the army and navy, the sick and wounded, and for those who minister to them, and prayers "for the dead in Christ, victims of the war." Dr. Geer made a patriotic address, in which he told of the scenes in and about St. Paul's during the Revolution, of Washington's habitual attendance at service.

Bishop Burch was celebrant at a

Brotherhood Corporate Communion held in Trinity Church on the morning of Washington's birthday. The Brotherhood attended also the noonday service in the same church on that day, in place of the usual Cathedral meeting. In the address Bishop Burch said:

"There is nothing George Washington hated worse than what ex-President Taft referred to yesterday as 'whispering traitors,'" said the Bishop. "We've too many of that ilk here in New York. They gather in corners and say, 'Now is the time for peace.' It isn't the time for peace. It is the time for a sterner war. Two or three days ago some of us, small in judgment, might have thought that Germany was going to break and that peace was near. Now we know it is impossible. Germany has Russia's stores to draw on, and she is vastly strengthened. It would be the part of poltroons, of men worse even than whispering traitors, for us to advise against America's going on with every fragment of her strength and energy. There is a tremendous struggle ahead."

Consolidation of Presbyterian Downtown Churches: What Church authorities regard as the most revolutionary move in large and famous church plants ever made in an American city, perhaps in any other, is the consolidation and possible sale of the First, University Place and Madison Square Presbyterian churches, New York, and the creation in their places of one great plant, to be located downtown. The First is the oldest Presbyterian church in New York, and is situated in lower Fifth Avenue. The University Place is at Tenth Street and the Place named, and the Madison Square is on the east side of the square mentioned. The last named is that of which the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst has been pastor for thirty-eight years. Since the zoning agreement in New York, which has been declared to be legal and is making Manhattan conditions permanent, the Madison Square site is regarded by Church authorities as one of the best locations in the world to reach numbers of people.

Involved in the transaction, land values and endowments, are $3,500,000, and the one church to be created will have a membership of about 3,000. The location of the great church to be has not been determined, but it is held to be likely that no one of the three sites will be utilized. Two of the three churches have missions in lower Manhattan, the University Place Church two of them, and it is announced that these missions will be retained and perhaps enlarged. The three pastors, all advanced in years, will be retired on substantial pensions. Already talk is heard concerning some famous Presbyterian preacher to fill what Presbyterians of New York expect to provide, one of the great preaching centers of America and the world.

WEST TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Perry Visits San Antonio.

The Rt. Rev. James De Wolf Perry, D. D., Bishop of Rhode Island, made a visitation to San Antonio, in his official capacity as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the War Commission, on the first Sunday in Lent and the Monday following.

The purpose of his visitation was to make a survey of religious conditions in the army posts, camps and cantonments in the Diocese of West Texas. On Sunday morning, he was greeted by a congregation in St. Mark's Church (the Rev. W. B. Stevens, rector), that necessitated the placing of chairs in the aisles. Even with this unusual arrangement, large numbers of men were obliged to stand throughout the service. He was introduced to this congregation by Bishop Capers, who spoke of his gratitude for the presence of Bishop Perry, because of the enormous responsibility which rests upon him in the leadership of the Church's work among the soldiers in his Diocese. Bishop Perry responded with a sermon which will live long in the memories of his auditors. He appealed for an earnest response to the imperative duty of the Church of putting Christ into the life of the army.

After the morning service, Bishop and Mrs. Perry accepted the hospitality of the women at St. Mark's Church, and took dinner with the soldiers at the Parish House. This dinner is served every Sunday to the men in uniform, who attend St. Mark's Church. It is very democratic in nature, both enlisted men and officers being present. This phase of the entertainment provided was accentuated by the presence of General John W. Ruckman, who, with Bishop Perry, Bishop Capers, Dr. Stevens, Mr. Cleveland, of the War Commission and others, addressed the men. There were about one hundred and twenty-five men in uniform around the board.

Sunday afternoon, Bishop Perry was present at the dedication of the new chapel at Kelly Fields, which was made possible through the gifts of the Woman's Auxiliary of New York and others. The chapel is located at a most strategic place where it is possible to minister through it, both to the soldiers at Kelly Flying Fields, and to the civilians employed in the large I. and G. N. shops, recently completed at South San Antonio. In the service of dedication short addresses were made by Archdeacon A. W. S. Garden; the Rev. Benjamin Bean, under whose direction the actual work of construction was carried on; the Rev. Dwight Cameron, who will make the chapel the headquarters for his work as voluntary chaplain to Kelly Fields; Bishop Capers and Bishop Perry. Despite the rain which fell at periods all through the day, the chapel was filled for the service.

In the evening, Bishop Perry addressed a mass meeting of civilians and soldiers at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium at Camp Travis. The regimental band of the Three Hundred and Sixtieth Infantry, accompanied the singing of familiar hymns. The Bishop made a ringing and powerful appeal for the highest ideals of service.

Monday morning a series of conferences were held by Bishop Perry with Bishop Capers, clergymen of the city, and voluntary chaplains working under the direction of the War Commission. At noon, Bishop Perry addressed one of the noon day services, which are being conducted under the auspices of the Church at the Majestic Theater. After the service, Bishop and Mrs. Perry were the guests of Bishop and Mrs. Capers at luncheon in their honor, where they met, informally, the commanding generals of the Department of the South and the Ninetieth Division of the National Army. Monday afternoon, the Bishop was driven to the site of the proposed chapel for the new Brooks Flying Field, which Bishop Capers, with extraordinary foresight, obtained as a gift some time ago. From there he visited Kelly Fields, and by the courtesy of officers in charge, was instructed in the elements of air flying from the vantage point of a student's seat in a plane. In the evening, Bishop and Mrs. Perry were the guests of Archdeacon and Mrs. Garden, and left a host of admiring friends behind them in the city of San Antonio, when they boarded the train for Waco at 9 o'clock.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop

The Secretary of the War Commission of the Episcopal Church, the Rt. Rev. James De Wolf Perry, came to Battle Creek to inspect the cantonment at Camp Custer, and see how the boys were getting on. He reported that he was much pleased by conditions there.

The united Lenten services of the churches of the City of Grand Rapids being held at Grace Episcopal Church this year, started off with a great deal of enthusiasm, and the church was crowded on the right of the first service. Captain the Rev. C. A. Mackintosh, an old Oxford man, now the rector of St. James Church, Guelph, Ontario, and for ten months in the front line trenches doing Red Cross duty with the rank of captain, was the speaker of the evening. He had much to say that was of deep interest. He has had a great deal of experience as a chaplain in the army, having served in that capacity during the Boer War. He would still be at the front had he not been invalided home as a result of wounds suffered in ministering to wounded soldiers out in the open.

Captain Mackintosh stated that—from a moral point of view—conditions in the army were superior to those in ordinary homes. This has been proven by the recent investigation conducted by the Canadian Government, which showed but two per cent of the soldiers afflicted with disease, while of those arriving from farm and city over thirteen per cent were afflicted with various forms of disease.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop

St. James Church, Wilmington: On the evening of the first Sunday in Lent, a great service was held in St. James Church, the Rev. William H. Milton, rector, when the Rev. R. E. Gribbin, voluntary chaplain at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C., on temporary leave of absence, told of his work and varied experiences at the camp. A large congregation heard his address with much interest, and a feature of the service was the singing by choir and congregation of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic." One of the male members of this choir was in the war for two years and was incapacitated at the battle of Vimy Ridge.

The Lenten season has begun with earnest services in the various parishes of the Diocese. On Ash Wednesday the Bishop officiated and preached at St. John's Church, Wilmington. He will be absent for the first two weeks in Lent, however, as he has engagements at noonday services at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., and at the Garlick Theater, Philadelphia, Pa.

A handsome hymnal has been given for use in the sanctuary of St. Paul's Church, Wilmington, and was dedicated by the rector, the Rev. D. L. Gwathmey, at Morning on Ash Wednesday. It is the gift of Dr. and Mrs. M. J. Carson, members of the parish.

The War Commission: Though a good response to the appeal of the Church War Commission in this Diocese was indicated at first, the returns so far have not quite reached the $2,000.00 mark. The assessment is $3,200.00.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop

The Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, of the Missionary District of Asheville, has declined an election to the rectorship of Calvary Church, Wilmington, Delaware.

The Rev. Thomas W. Wingate has accepted work as assistant at Trinity Church, Wilmington, under the Rev. Frederick M. Kirkus.

Immanuel Church, Wilmington (the Rev. W. H. Laird, D. D., rector), in an effort to raise funds to reduce the debt on the church secured for the purpose over $11,000.

The Wilmington Parishes will combine for services during Holy Week. These will be conducted in Trinity Church, Wilmington, by Bishop Kinsman.

St. Matthew's Mission for colored people has been revived under the Rev. George A. Fisher, a recent graduate of the Bishop Payne Divinity School. Services are being held in the basement of St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington.

Ordination: On the second Sunday in Lent, February 24 (St. Matthias' Day), Thomas Vail Wingate, of the Philadelphia Divinity School, was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Frederick Joseph Kinsman, D. D., LL. D., in St. John's Church, Wilmington. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Prof. R. K. Yerkes, D. D., and the candidate presented by the Rev. Alban Richey, D. D. The Rev. F. W. Tomkins, Jr., acted as Bishop's chaplain.

For the War Commission: Delaware was asked for $7,500 on Septuagesima for the Church War Commission and sent $9,200. The Bishop inaugurated a plan to secure the desired amount at a luncheon held in Wilmington on January 8, and made out an apportionment for the parishes and missions of the Diocese. The Treasurer's final report shows that out of thirty-two congregations to which the Bishop made his appeal, only one failed to respond, only six sent less than was asked of them, fifteen sent the exact apportionment, ten sent an excess. These last were: Trinity, Wilmington, apportioned $2,000, contributed $3,440.52; St. John's, Wilmington, $1,500, $1,531.97; St. Andrew's, Wilmington, $800, $1,216.30; Christ Church, Christiana Hundred, $1,200, $1,201; Immanuel, New Castle, $150, $256.50; St. Anne's, Middletown, $150, $200.50; Ascension, Claymont, $100, $133; Christ Church, Delaware City, $40, $47; Calvary, Hill Crest, $20, $20.50; St. Stephen's, Harrington, $5, $25.

February 26—Illustrated lecture (Philippines) at Trinity Parish House.
March 12—Bishop Capers at Trinity Church.
March 19—Bishop Sessums at St. Paul's Church.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Ordination Service: On the first Sunday in Lent at St. Paul's Church, Paterson, after the confirmation of sixty-five persons, presented by the rector, the Rev. D. Stuart Hammon, Bishop Lines ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Charles Steele Armstrong, curate of the parish, with charge also of the Glen Rock Mission. He was presented for ordination by his father, the Rev. George P. Armstrong, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Professor Francis B. Blodgett, of the General Seminary. Mr. Armstrong made a notable record for scholarship at St. Stephen's and at the General Seminary. He will continue in his present work. In the afternoon the Bishop addressed the Sunday-school, there being present more than seven hundred scholars. The St. Paul's service flag has one hundred and ten stars now.

The Rev. Ray O. Miller, formerly assistant at St. John's Church, Jersey City, has become rector of St. Paul's, Los Angeles.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop

Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, the Very Rev. R. K. Massie, Dean, has the distinction of being the first church to display a service flag in Lexington, its example being followed by some half dozen others since. During the service Dean Massie read the names of those represented by the thirty-two stars and commended them to the prayers of the congregation. The stars were in the form of a cross, making a very striking and beautiful design. Three more stars are to be added; five or more to follow when the hospital unit goes from this city. One star was in gift for the one member who had died in uniform.

St. Philip's, Harrodsburg, Wins Service Flag: At St. Philip's Church, Harrodsburg, the Rev. H. P. Manning in charge, Bishop Burton, on February 17, received and dedicated a beautiful satin service flag bearing two stars, won during the recent Red Cross campaign in Mercer County. Mr. J. A. Eisenberg, Chairman of the Mercer County Red Cross Committee, offered service flags to all congregations in the county, ninety per cent of whose membership contributed to the cause. St. Philip's was the only one of the eleven receiving flags whose entire membership contributed.

The Rebuilding Fund of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, the Rev. Richard Wilkinson, D. D., rector, destroyed by fire on January 20, is rapidly increasing. In addition to the insurance money, $10,000 of the $50,000 needed, has been raised. The bravery and loyalty of the congregation is manifested by its branch of the Woman's Auxiliary sending Bishop Burton $5.00 for his Discretionary Fund, when its church is in ashes. Such loyalty to the Diocese, and consciousness of duty towards others, is a mark of their faith and dependence upon God.

The Fisherman.

I owned a little boat a while ago,
And sailed a morning sea without a fear,
And whither any breeze might fairly blow
I'd steer the little craft afar or near.
Mine was the boat,
And mine the air,
And mine the sea,
Not mine a care.

My boat became my place of nightly toil;
I sailed at sunset to the fishing ground;
At morn the boat was freighted with the spoil
That my all-conquering work and and skill had found.
Mine was the boat,
And mine the net,
And mine the skill,
And power to get.

One day there passed along the silent shore,
While I my net was casting in the sea,
A man, who spoke as never man before;
I followed Him; new life began in me.
Mine was the boat,
But His the voice,
And His the call,
Yet mine the choice.

Ah! 'twas a fearful night out on the lake,
And all my skill availed not at the helm,
Till Him asleep I wakened, crying,
"Take,
Take Thou command, lest waters overwhelm!"
His was the boat,
And His the sea,
And His the peace,
O'er all and me.

Once from His boat He taught the curious throng,
Then bade me let down nets into the sea;
I murmured, but obeyed, nor was it long,
Before the catch amazed and humbled me.
His was the boat,
And His the skill,
And His the catch,
And His my will.

—Joseph Richards.

Personal Notes

The Rev. A. George, of Helper, Utah, has entered upon his duties at St. Clement's Mission, Huntington Park, Los Angeles, Calif.

The address of the Rev. O. M. Yenger is changed from Forrest City, Ark., to Camden, Ark.

The Rev. G. H. Harris, having resigned as Secretary of the Diocese of Lexington, the Bishop has appointed in his place the Assistant Secretary, the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons. Kindly send all communications for the Secretary of the Diocese to the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, "The Burton," Covington, Ky.

The Rev. C. B. Wilmer, D. D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta, Ga., has been elected president of the Evangelical Ministers' Association of Atlanta.

The Rev. W. Weir Gillis, rector of St. Thomas Church, Hancock, Md., will also have charge of the churches at Clear Spring and Indian Spring.

The Rev. Selden P. Delaney, D. D., of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, New York City, has been elected editor of the American Church Monthly, and takes up his new work about March 1.

The Rev. Henry L. Drew, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Pittsburgh, Pa., and Secretary and Treasurer of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, has been appointed by the Bishop as examining chaplain, to succeed the Rev. C. M. Young, who has taken up work in the Diocese of Washington.

The Rev. Louis C. Washburn has been elected a member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, succeeding the Rev. J. A. Harris, D. D., who recently resigned.

For the present the Rev. G. W. Cadman is in charge of All Saints Church, Austin, Texas.

The Rev. G. G. Pitblado, of Ferandina, Fla., has accepted an appointment as Missionary Canon in Southern Florida. He will have his residence in Orlando; but his work will be mostly at the various missions lying within a radius of some twenty miles around Orlando—Zellwood, Apopka, Conway, Maitland, etc.

The Rev. Charles W. Frazer will enter upon his duties as rector of St. Mary's Church, Jacksonville, Fla., on March 10, and should be addressed after that date, 2112 Laura Street, Jacksonville.

The Rev. William F. Pierce, D. D., President of Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, has been appointed by the American Red Cross as official representative to gather information at first hand about war conditions in Europe. Dr. Pierce left Gambier recently for France and expects to return in May.

For the present the Rev. T. J. Sloan is acting as locum tenens at Trinity Church, Galveston, Texas.

The address of the Rev. Robert N. Ward, who has accepted his appointment as general missionary of the Southwest Convocation, is Box 1141, Houston, Texas.

Ordination.

On Sunday, February 17, 1918, Mr. Anthony Roberts Parshley was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Charles M. Beckwith, Bishop of Alabama, acting for the Bishop of East Carolina.

The ordination service was held in the Army Y. M. C. A. building, No. 113, of which Mr. Parshley is Associate Religious Work Secretary, at Camp McClellan, Anniston, Ala. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Carlton Barnwell. Chaplain C. B. Dubell, of the One Hundred and Tenth Field Artillery, preached the sermon, and the Rev. J. R. McAllister read the Epistle. Mr. Parshley will remain in Y. M. C. A. work for the duration of the war.

Deaths.

The Rev. Henry William Winkley, rector of Calvary Church, Danvers, Mass., died at his home in that city on Monday, February 4, aged sixty years. Funeral services were held on Wednesday, February 6, in Calvary Church.

The Rev. Robert Murray, a retired clergyman of the Church, died at his home in Waltham, Mass., on Tuesday, February 5, aged eighty-one years.

The Rev. Henry Lewis Foote died at his home in Marblehead, Mass., on Thursday, January 31. The Rev. Mr. Foote was, at one time, well known throughout the West as an active worker in reform movements.

A Virginian Toast.

When Mr. Balfour and the British Commissioners visited Richmond, Va., Governor Stuart proposed a toast to the King of England in water, and this is what he said:

"In this glass I hold that which, by the sovereign will of the people of Virginia, is to-day the wine of the country; clear as the principles of liberty and justice in which we make common cause; pure as the union of heart and purpose typified by the three flags entwined before us; strong in that it supplies in this hour the most vital needs of both statesmen and soldier; distilled on the hills overlooking the noble James, on whose banks the first permanent English settlement in the Western world was established; spontaneous as the good will toward our distinguished guests which springs from our hearts and our lips—in this and by these tokens I propose the health of His Majesty the King of England."

To which Mr. Balfour, with the same limitations as to liquid, replied:

"I cannot rival the eloquence with which our host to-day has eulogized the legal wine of the country, but I can, with enthusiasm not less sincere than his own, propose a toast which has always been dear to the hearts of all Englishmen, but never so dear as now—the President of the United States."—National Advocate.

No one can be utterly selfish and hope to prosper permanently. Society, with all its faults, frowns down at length upon the man who never considers the general welfare. The moral constitution of the world runs athwart the man who worships self. In the very nature of things, selfishness cannot gain enduring satisfaction. We realize ourselves through seeking the happiness of others and so fulfilling the law of Christ.—The Christian Intelligencer.

The Key to the Future.

Our piety is preoccupied with the welfare of the troops, the care of the wounded, the succour given to depopulated provinces, etc. It is the activity of Martha. That this should be so is most natural. The deeper spiritual issues of the war are as yet imperfectly apprehended, and the churches do not seem to be aware that these matters cannot be expressed in terms of social betterment. Our churches are tuned to the old materialism, and are not yet vocal with the new war-music. The danger is lest the churches, by clinging to the phrases and formulas of the nineteenth century, lose the key to the future. . . . Unless religion discards the language of materialism, the churches may be left in darkness and despair even while the great spiritual light of the world is burning before them. . . . This great sickness of the war converts thousands daily, and one can hardly find a man who does not show signs of illumination. The young men, as of old, shine as the natural heroes of the race. Their readiness to die restores our faith in human nature. It reminds us that the sacrificial part is what counts in the spread of truth. To count the cost and dwell upon the life and property sacrificed in heroic action is to doubt the value of truth. To what better use could these young heroes and all this amassed wealth have been put? It was for this that they existed. As for the pain involved in their engulfing, as for the agony of the experience, this is a part of the regeneration. People seem to desire the power of Christ and the benevolence of Christ without the Passion. The thing cannot be done; and nothing but an age of materialism could have so softened the fibre of moralists as to lead men to think it possible.—John Jay Chapman, in the Churchman.

A Prayer in Time of War.

"He shall be our Guide unto death."

Almighty God, Thy blessing send
To those upon the sea,
Make Thou their journey ever safe—
They have no help but Thee.
Their dangers now are numberless,
And most they cannot see;
But, Lord, Thou seest all things here,
Guard those upon the sea.

Be Thou the constant Friend and Guide
Of those in foreign lands—
To help and comfort in distress,
O Lord, stretch forth Thy hand,
Naught is too hard for Thee to do,
Thou whom the Heavens command,
So this, O Lord, we ask of Thee,
Guard those in foreign lands.

Thy blessing also give to those
Who still at home remain,
Treading the same dull, weary path,
Again and yet again.
Hasten the time of joy for all,
The news of peace proclaim,
Softened the blow of those bereaved,
And with Thy strength sustain.
—F. H. in Canadian Churchman.

Two women were discussing their marital troubles, when one asked, "By the way, what is your husband doing now?" "Oh," said the other, "he's a-setting round tellin' what's going to happen next election." "Then he's a prophet?" "No, he ain't. So far as this family is concerned, he's a dead loss."—Youth's Companion.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The collapse of Russia, and the likelihood of her ignominious acceptance of German peace terms, is the supreme illustration which this war has so far afforded of the overwhelming significance of that invisible factor which men call "morale." Russia still has soldiers by the million; she still has vast potentialities. But ignorance, intrigue and unbalanced social theories have wrecked her will for gallant effort.

What will be the ultimate fate of Russia no one knows; but the immediate lesson of her downfall is plain and urgent for us. We must realize anew the awful importance of the invisible factors which enter into a nation's strength. We must spread through America such information concerning the measuring of the war and such a contagion of courageous purpose to "see it through" as will create in this nation the strength which must supply Russia's defection. No more vital service could be rendered by the Diocesan Social Service Commissions of our Church than the organization of groups of speakers who would go to the scattered parishes to carry the message of the moral and spiritual meaning of our patriotic duty now.

Because approximately 29 per cent of the men within the draft age in the United States were found physically unfit for military service, the National Security League, with headquarters in New York City, is inaugurating a nation-wide campaign to improve the health and welfare of every community. This work is being undertaken by a committee on physical reserve, of which Walter Camp, prominent sports authority, is chairman. To public officials of the country the following letter has been sent:

"The draft showed that 29 per cent of the young men of America were physically unfit to perform the manhood duty of citizen service. It is also known that there are 1,000,000 preventable deaths in this country per annum.

"The health of the men and women of America is a matter of the greatest importance to this nation in the fight for victory, and has a direct bearing upon the nation's ability to meet war and post-war economic problems. The mind of the nation is also best equipped by providing for the soundness of the bodies of its men and women.

"We know that in every community there are boards of health and organizations devoting themselves to physical fitness. The above statements of facts, however, indicate that the mass of the people are not reached by the present methods, and that it is a matter of national concern that broader measures be adopted.

"By plans which are simple the evil can be overcome. It is proposed that a committee on physical reserve be appointed in every city and town in the United States to inquire into local conditions, with the suggestion that they communicate with the undersigned committee in order that we may advise you of our plans and put into operation a simple and pleasant system of physical upbuilding which does not require any considerable time expenditure for the individual and which has proven to produce the necessary results in a remarkably short period.

"Will you be good enough to designate at least three persons to constitute your local committee? When you do so, will you kindly advise us and we will forward to you at once the details of the plan.

"As we are anxious to produce prompt results, we would appreciate your early reply."

The Playgrounds and Recreation Association of America has issued a report of its activity undertaken at the request of the War Department Commission. The chief business of the organization has been to safeguard the environs of the training camps and arouse neighborly interest for the soldiers among the people of the contiguous cities so as to give them high ideals of service.

One hundred and seven recreation secretaries are now at work, and one hundred and seventy cities and small communities have been organized for service. To link up camp and community, census cards have been made which give a man's church, fraternity, college, professional and trade affiliations, and put him in touch with the groups in the cities with which his former interests and relationships would associate him. His hobbies and recreations are also known, so that he may receive acceptable invitations.

Few men in the civilian life of the nation have borne in this time of war so helpful and constructive a part in public discussion as ex-President William H. Taft. His influence has been thrown consistently to the support of those who bear official responsibility, and his counsel has always been free from private bias, and inspired by the forward-looking vision which sees the great end, not of party, nor of the nation in any selfish aspect, but of the world.

Of much value therefore is this news note of last week:

The League to Enforce Peace, of which ex-President William H. Taft is the head, announced in a statement yesterday that the Legislatures of twelve States, in joint session, had adopted a resolution in favor of the United States entering, after the war, a league of nations to carry into effect the principles advocated by the organization. These States are Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Maryland, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee and Texas. The resolution is now pending in the Legislatures of New Jersey and Rhode Island. A statement by Mr. Taft said:

"What we are fighting for is permanent peace and to eliminate the dominating power of Germany, which, as opportunity shall arise for her expansion and the gratification of her lust of power, threatens war at any time in the future. One object that we have in this war, or one way of stating it, is whipping Germany, hitting her on the head so that it shall produce a psychological change in the minds of her people and bring about a normal view, so that they may be convinced that the policy that they have adopted and followed under Kaiser Wilhelm II, and the Prussian, or, as Dr. van Dyke calls it, 'the Potsdam gang,' is wrong; that they shall see the hideous futility of that policy, and shall realize it in a thumping defeat of their emperor and their army. When they do that, then they will be knocked into a psychological transformation that will make them amenable to decency and humanity and make them regard the obligations of treaties which must be regarded if any permanent association of nations is to be formed and is to act for the benefit of the peace of the world.

"Now, it seems to me, indeed, it seems to all our colleagues in the League to Enforce Peace, that the time to express opinion with respect to the object of the war and to define it so far as we may, is now. It is the time to discuss it now, when our sons are at the front and the casualty lists are about to begin and the sacrifices that we are to make are becoming more and more apparent."

The New Banner.

O fellow-citizens of storm-tossed Lands,
War weary! Sound the bugle-note!
Arise!

New steadfast standards wait your eager hands,

The Star of Promise orbs to meet your eyes.

Great Kings must pass, that mankind
may be free,
Beneath the banner of Democracy!

The Mighty Ruler of this mortal life
Has wisdom, not by mortals understood:

The seeds of blood, the deeds of wanton strife

Shall some day harvest unexpected good.

Great Kings shall pass and every nation
be

Ruled by the people—for the people, free.

When the mad anguish of this stricken world—

Where valiant heroes daily fight and fall—

Has passed and Freedom's banners are unfurled,

Then shall we know the reason for it all!

Then every waiting, heart-sick land shall see

The ultimate design of Destiny!

Brave men and women, laboring in toil—

Who, faithful, fight with willing sword or pen,

Who work to break the rock or till the soil—

Shall wear the high insignia of men.
All Kings must pass, that every man may be

A monarch in his manhood, strong and free!

Beyond the present, unimagined woe,
A glorious Day is breaking o'er the earth:

As Spring flowers blossom, after ice-bound snow,

The God of Gods shall bring new things to birth.

It is the dawn! Great forces are set free!

All Hail the Day! World-Wide Democracy!

Third Sunday in Lent: "So Judah was carried away captive out of his land." Thus ends the first lesson for Sunday morning. The King of Babylon, after carrying off Jehoiachin (last Sunday's lesson), made Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's uncle, king in his stead, changing his name, or perhaps sanctioning the change, to "Zedekiah," "Jehovah's Righteousness." (See Ezekiel 17:12-14.) Such a name, however, borne by such a man must have seemed to Jeremiah the very tragedy of historic irony, and may have suggested to him the wonderful prophecy of the time to come when a true king should really reign and execute judgment and justice in the earth and whose name should deservedly be "Jehovah our Righteousness." (Jer. 23:6.) The actual destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple took place in the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, and was brought about by his rebellion, against the advice of Jeremiah. The purpose of giving these two lessons on successive Sundays was to introduce on intervening week days the teachings of Jeremiah during Zedekiah's reign: the "two baskets of figs"; the letter written to those already in Babylon; rebuke of Zedekiah for re-enslaving the emancipated bondmen; captivity inevitable; Pharaoh's army marching to their assistance would return into their own land; putting Jeremiah into a dungeon was not going to do any good, and the only chance of escape for the shallow and vacillating monarch was surrender. (Lessons for last week.)

For a corresponding New Testament lesson we have given our Lords' prophecy of another destruction of Jerusalem, fulfilled under the Roman General Titus A. D. 70. The Old Testament alternate is a confession of national sin and a prayer for deliverance, "that all the earth may know that Thou art the Lord our God."

For the first Sunday evening lesson, we have taken Dan. 9, a bit out of its regular order, for its appositeness. Whatever interpretation be put upon a confessedly difficult chapter, it is a noble example of confession and answer to prayer and a wonderful prophecy of the time when God should "finish transgression, make an end of sins, make reconciliation for iniquity, bring in everlasting righteousness, seal up vision and prophecy and anoint the most Holy." The second lesson records the fulfillment of the covenant made with God which caused the Old Testament sacrifices to cease. (Vide Evidential Value Holy Eucharist.)

It is hardly necessary to point out the general appropriateness of these selections to the season of Lent, or to the Collect, in which we beseech Almighty God "to be our defense against all our enemies." Jeremiah and Ezekiel are generally recognized as fit reading in Lent, but these selections are much more numerous and certainly more intelligible for being brought into connection with the historical situation. Note also that Lamentations falls into its rightful place just after Jerusalem's capture, followed by a message from Ezekiel written after he had heard the sad news.

"Religious Education in War Times."

A question put to me in one of our military camps was this: "What has religion to do with the war? Don't you know that science and military strategy are the forces which will win the war?" Such a man sees the grim necessity for the use of physical force in this present crisis, but does he also realize that this is but preparatory for the constructive conquering forces to follow? When you knock a man down who has mistreated a woman, he is not thereby conquered. You have conquered his body, not the man. Not until the quality of good-will enters the heart of a man, creating right relationship with you and the person he has injured, is he conquered. Good-will is the product of religious influences.

Our young men are not laying down their lives upon the altar of science or physical force, but that through their sacrifice the great moral and spiritual forces, may become permanent.

In this sense religious education is a war measure, the essential training of those who in the next generation must be leaders in the reconstruction of our civilization upon a sure foundation, the guarantee that the democracy for which we fight may be a democracy interpreted and kept true to Christian standards.

schools and homes. It is a short-sighted patriotism which sees only the training camp and neglects the training of the reserve force at the home base. The man in the camp summons the Church to help him do his duty as he prepares for his service 'over there.' Then, as he goes forth to take his place on the firing line, he asks the Church to see to it that those who follow after him be so trained in Christian truth that they will 'carry on' that for which he is fighting and giving his life. We cannot be true patriots and neglect Christian education."

—Bishop T. I. Reese.

Your Motto.

In a Western college there were three literary societies. One society adopted as its motto the words, "Per Aspera ad Astra"—through difficulties to the stars. Another used the ambitious sentence, "Though men may come and men may go, we labor on forever." The third society was content with the undignified but rugged rally cry, "Get down and dig!" It is on record that for several years a majority of inter-society oratorical and debating contests were won by the third society. Perhaps society mottoes do not always lead to such striking results; but certainly a motto has a real effect upon those who adopt it. Slogans and goals have been markedly efficacious, especially in Christian work. Definite and practical aims lead to results. A purpose, definite and easily understood, and a ringing summons to victory, are great assets in Christian living. What is the motto of your life?—Selected.

It is when prayer to our Father becomes the habit of our lives that we realize our immortality. The spiritual logic is unanswerable. If God is our Father, we are His children, and if children, then heirs—heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ. Further, we have entered into union with the Source of life, for this is life eternal, to know God and Jesus Christ, whom He hath sent. That union, once formed, will never be severed by Him. He has gone to His Father and our Father, and in the Father's house are many abiding places. If it were not so, He would have told us. Of course He would, for He has called us friends, for all things that He has heard of His Father, He has made known to us. He has gone to prepare a place for us, and will come again to receive us unto Himself, that where He is, we may be also. These truths are all comprehended in the urgent command of Jesus: "Pray to thy Father."—Episcopal Recorder.

THE FEAST.

The Lenten road, for greatest as for least,
No highway is, to souls divinely led,
To pace dull-ey'd with melancholy tread,

Like weary slave or over-burden'd beast,
With meat from heaven, minished or increased,

As gauged by wills obedient, they are fed;

Celestial viands by the way are spread,

And chief, the holy Eucharistic Feast!

The Father watches as the pilgrims fare,
The man of Sorrows looks with smile benign,

The Spirit guards, when troublous thoughts annoy;

Thus cheer'd, the labors of the Cross they share,

Through Him who turn'd the water into wine,

And come, true-hearted, to their Easter joy!

What Children Shall Do Sunday Afternoon.

This is not my problem—I wish it were. But with one son a medical missionary in China, another a mining engineer in South America, and my only daughter asleep on the hill beside her father, my child problems are all vicarious.

Last Sunday afternoon as I returned on the interurban from the service at the county almshouse, two mothers in the seat behind me discussed this problem.

"Well, I would be better satisfied if Sunday came but once a month," sighed one as she dropped wearily into the seat.

"That's the way I feel," agreed her companion. "It was a real treat when Bob said he would take care of the children this afternoon."

The fields slid by in silence for a time, then the first speaker said reminiscently, "Sunday used to be our best day. When Will and I were first married the day was all too short for the things we wanted to do together. But the babies came, and they took all our time—they do yet, for that matter, though they are no longer babies. Will and I never have a moment alone; the children are always fussing to go somewhere or to do something they cannot do."

"My children do the same," agreed her friend. "I wish I knew what to do with them. It's hard enough to get them ready for Sunday school and church in the morning without having them fret all afternoon."

At this point they left the car, and in the quiet that followed, my thoughts drifted back more than half a century. Again, I was the only child of a physician in a mill town. Dressed in my best white dress, I sat on the front porch Sunday afternoon watching with my mother for father's return from his round of professional calls. There were always bad cases whom he saw for the second time that day while I took my after-dinner nap. Usually mother and I were ready for him before he returned; but the wait was never tedious, for at this time mother always untangled the theological perplexities Sunday school and church presented to a child not yet old enough for the problems of day school.

When father appeared at the end of the long street, theology was forgotten and I went dancing to meet him. His greeting invariably was, "Well, Sunny Girl, what shall we do this afternoon?" And my answer was always ready, "Oh, father, let's walk; a long, long walk."

In the winter, when it was too stormy to walk, we sang, my mother seated at the Estey organ, while father's big bass boomed out and drowned mother's sweet soprano and my shrill, tuneless treble.

No Sunday afternoon problem was there.

So my thoughts traveled on to the long, hot, dreamy Sunday afternoons on grandfather's farm, where all my summers from ten years of age to eighteen were passed. But Sunday afternoon; that was worth waiting for all the week, for it held three long, beautiful, undisturbed hours.

Grandmother was through the dinner work by 2 o'clock. Then hand in hand we slipped away to the "young orchard." After we had paid each tree a friendly visit, calling it by name and noting the changes in its appearance since our last visit, we stretched ourselves in luxurious ease on the grass and told stories. Grandmother's were always Bible stories, mine the fairy tales in which my heart delighted—and which, I do believe, grandmother loved as much as I. Turn and turn about was the rule, and our supply was inexhaustible. All too soon the lengthening shadows warned us it was time to prepare supper for the men—the insatiable men, whose appetites demanded food even Sunday evening.

No Sunday afternoon problem was there.

The farm faded, and I was in boarding school, where the week's desert of work was freshened by one oasis of idleness—Sunday afternoon. Sunday morning attendance at one of the churches in town was obligatory, and Sunday evening we must go to service in the chapel, but Sunday afternoon was our own. In the spring and fall we gathered in groups in the grove or on the campus and read aloud or visited. In the winter we gathered in larger groups in the big living room and sang our favorite hymns or sat about the blazing fire and toasted chestnuts and marshmallows.

Again, I was a young wife whose husband, a traveling salesman, had each week but this one day at home—a full, happy day. Our little family grew. Did the babies bring the problem?

The street car rumbled on, but to each of my hands clung a tiny boy, his feet stumbling sleepily up the stairs for the after-dinner nap. Little sister followed in father's arms, her head drooping on his shoulder, her eyes already closed. When they awakened the best part of the day came. Morning was good with its activity, the orderly bustle of getting ready for Sunday school at 9:30, the quiet hour in the pew and the friendly greetings after church; but this time was our very own, when, the world shut out, we visited with each other.

For an hour, sometimes two, we read, while each child played with his own special toy, a toy never seen except Sunday afternoon. When interest in this began to flag, father and I laid our plans, and the story hour began. Each child had his favorite; even two-year-old Jane begged for one of the poems she loved. This became "surprise time," and the custom then begun lived for years. Father was the one surprised, for at this time he heard the poems learned during his absence, saw the drawings, the clay models, the wonderful paintings, listened to the new songs and heard the progress made on violin and piano.

As the children grew older a long walk was added to the already full Sunday afternoon. Summer and winter found us on the open road. When the weather was cold or stormy a guessing contest sometimes added zest. Each guessed how many steps it was from where we stood to some object ahead, then we counted in unison as we walked toward the goal.

On these walks all the year round father kept score for each child, of the birds and trees and flowers he identified. In the winter flower friends were difficult to find, but the trees could be easily recognized, and there were many "little brothers of the air," all known and loved.

Memory shifted the scene a few years. The oldest boy was twelve, and a staid old horse and a big, roomy surrey took the family farther afield Sunday afternoon. When we left for Sunday school and church in the morning a big lunch, books and magazines were tucked away under the seats. Directly from church we drove to one of our favorite country haunts. After dinner each did as he pleased for an hour or two—read, slept or explored the woods; but we always had at least an hour together for reading aloud before we ate supper. In the cool calm of evening we drove home, even little Jan's hushed into tune with the divine quiet that brooded over the countryside. God was very near to all of us at the close of His day.

Again, they were all in high school. Their friends came to ask them to go out, but stayed to read aloud with us. There was no dearth of reading matter, for each of the family saved the best he found during the week for Sunday afternoon, and the variety was infinite. Serious articles, fiction and poetry from the current magazines vied for attention. And Dickens filled all gaps with his inimitable books.

This Sunday afternoon gathering began in high school days continued through college life. We were never alone, summer or winter. But it kept the boys and girls whose homes were in the city from the street, and it gave the college boys and girls from a distance a home to go to. They showed their appreciation by coming by twos, threes, even by the half dozen, until from twelve to seventeen were with us. From 3 o'clock until time for the church in the evening they read aloud, made candy, popped corn and sang. Singing was the real joy of the afternoon. They began with college songs, drifted into hymns and always ended by attempting the great oratorio choruses. Even though the rendition was imperfect, the feeling of oneness with each other and with the Father was surely strengthened by singing together, "I Waited for the Lord," "Sanctus," "The Heavens Are Telling," and the matchless "Hallelujah Chorus."

Together the boys and girls got ready the simple evening meal. Some made sandwiches, others salad, others cocoa, and still others set the table. Tea over, we went to church. I recalled one

Sunday evening when Jane and I sat at the end of a row of eight boys.

The car reached the terminal, and the memory pictures faded. But as I walked to my room I had a vision—a vision of a church whose doors were open every Sunday afternoon to all the young people for a good time. Open, not primarily for its own sheltered, cared-for young people, but open for the boys and girls away from home, for those others to whom home is but a name. I saw open church parlors with gracious hostesses who welcomed all who came; I saw groups reading, telling stories, playing quiet games, making candy in the kitchen, standing about the piano singing; yes, and I saw these same young people, later in the evening, after eating the lunch they themselves had prepared, gather again to sing, to pray, to read from the Book, to falter words of hope and courage to each other. And I knew that the church in welcoming the homeless had solved not only the Sunday afternoon problem, but that of the lifeless young people's meeting as well.

He Beat Me Home.

When for a little walk we went,
On errand or on pleasure bent,
As we drew near our vine-clad gate,
My always-present walking mate
Would slip his chubby hand from mine
And, toddling on past shrub and vine,
Would turn and say, with baby wit,
"I beat 'oo home, a 'ittle bit!"

God was so good to him and me
As to permit our lives to be Like those of two frank, boyhood chums
Together solving life's hard sums.
I, as the elder, sometimes knew
Where in his path lay bog or slough
So I might point it out in time
To save him from the fall and grime.

Today some kind friends came and spoke Gently to me. And then awoke
A slumbering memory of Then:
I dreamed he was a babe again;
That before my feet had sped
To reach our door a step ahead—
Through trembling lips I whisper it.
"He beat me home—a little bit."

Third Line of Defense Remains in America.

Do you realize how our battle line runs?

Our first line of defense is in Europe, under the fire of the German guns. At present it is held for us by the English and the French.

Behind that line, in a country so torn with war that its food production has fallen far below the danger line, is the second line—our men, who must be supplied with the concentrated energy which good food gives if they are ever to fight in the first-line trenches.

We here in America form the third line of defense. Our base of supplies is here. Are we adding to them by saving the foods needed by our first and second lines in Europe—or depleting them by refusing to save?

Our third line of defense is as important as the first line. It is formed, for the most part, by the women of America—the housekeepers. Shall our line waver, while the first and second lines are holding fast?

If we starve the men in the first line who are fighting for us and our own men in the second line who are training and preparing to fight for us, the war is lost, and the movement of our troops will be toward Washington instead of toward Berlin.

Does any woman in the third line of defense hesitate as to her duty in this matter?

Back Your Brain With Health.

I once heard a noted surgeon say, as he stood at the operating table ready to perform an operation, that he feared the outcome because of the patient's past life. His manner and dissipated habits had so depleted his vitality that he might not have sufficient reserve disease-resisting power to carry him over the crisis. Although only fifty years of age, the patient had so exhausted his reserves that the surgeon feared that he would not have sufficient force to meet the call upon him and enable him to rally from the shock of the operation. The surgeon's fear proved justified, for in a few days the patient succumbed. Although the operation itself was not a serious one, the man's death was immediately caused by his depleted vitality.

Think of it! A man, naturally of strong physique, and who should have been in the prime of life, regarding so little the precious, priceless boon of health that he not only took little pains to preserve it, but even recklessly used up all his reserve, his disease-resisting power, so that when misfortune came to him he was a physical bankrupt. Could anything be so short-sighted, foolish or wicked?

We all know how dependent we are upon our physical strength and our reserve power in overcoming obstacles. It is these physical reserves that back up our brain. Difficulties which we could easily overcome when we are perfectly robust we do not dare attack when our vitality is low or depleted. Everything depends upon our initiative and our courage, and their foundation is physical.

A large percentage of the failures in life were physical bankrupts first. They did not have sufficient health to back up their brain, to give them reserve power for emergencies, for the great crises of life. Physical reserves are to the health what life insurance is to our families.

Optimism and self-confidence, so necessary to success, are half physical. Pessimism, low vitality, doubt and failure all go together. When we are normal physically we are naturally optimists; when we are physically depleted we are pessimists. "I can" means physical vigor; "I can't!" means physical debility.

There is no other way of backing up the brain, of multiplying one's ability, half so effective as improving the health. This is the surest way to increase your efficiency by leaps and bounds, my friends.

Health means courage, it means hope, it means confidence, faith in oneself, and faith in one's fellows.

Health means virility, masterfulness; it means greater opportunity; it means courage and initiative to make opportunities. It means happiness and achievement.

"Give me health and the day," says Emerson, "and I shall make the pomp of emperors look ridiculous."

Napoleon used to say: "I have only one counsel to you, 'Be master.'" No one can be master, be virile, forceful, without health. Vigor of body means vigor of mind, masterfulness, creativeness.—The New Success Magazine.

For the Southern Churchman.

What Is Character?

Margaret Frampton Harper.

Character is that which we are, though it is very often mistaken for reputation, or that which we appear to be. A good character is a combination of high qualities, with great strength, the more one has the more they are capable of having; it is that which makes a man rich though he be penniless; it shines out in his countenance, and is like a letter of credit written on his face; it cannot be hidden; its influence will be felt long after he is dead.

Take, for instance, such men as Milton, Shakespeare and Plato. We know their character and are made to feel its influence through their works. We show our character by our words and deeds.

Character is not something wrought in a day. We add a little here, and a little there, for as Michael Angelo says, "Trifles make perfection, but perfection is no trifle."

We work upon marble and it crumbles; upon iron and it will rust; we rear temples and they are destroyed; but let us work upon our character and make it strong and noble, and we have something that ages cannot destroy.

We should be very careful of the material we select for this grandest of all structures. See that our environments are the very best. Nathaniel Hawthorne in his narrative, "The Great Stone Face," illustrates very plainly how we unconsciously become like the things we see and habitually admire, so if we would have our character anything like what it should be, we must have a deep reverential love for all that is good and beautiful, pure and noble.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," so let us never ruthlessly destroy that which is dearer than life.

"He who steals my purse steals trash, but he who robs me of my good name robs me of that which not enriches him and makes me poor indeed."

Not Lost, But Given.

It is said of a returned English soldier that, when he was being commiserated on the loss of his arm in the trenches, he replied, proudly: "I didn't lose it; I gave it." Glorious reply. What a transformation of our stewardship if we could think of our tithe not as the payment of a debt, but as the offering of a gift! What a transfiguration of our service if we could list it as a heart impulse instead of a conscience pull! What an ennoblement of life if we could live it as a gift to the world! When a man gives his health or his time or his money—or his life—you cannot talk to him about being robbed. He has forestalled the comment. Jesus said: "No man taketh my life from me; I lay it down." Such ought to be the spirit of His disciples. It is very hard to defeat a man with such a spirit.—George Clarke Peck.

The man of faith is the man who shapes his course by the stars rather than by the current, and who looks at the stars oftenest when the current runs swiftest. Small-minded men regard faith as a theory; large-minded men use it as a practical working power to get things not only done, but done right.—Arthur Hadley.

For the Young Folks

A Child Song.

I am God's little lamb;

Where His green pastures lie,
He leads me, He feeds me:
And when, by and by,
O'er life's rugged mountains
My footsteps shall stray,
His hand shall still hold me,
And show me the way.

I am God's little dove;

Ah, how downy my nest!
How blithe is my waking,
How sweet is my rest!
And, when, on my strong wings,
Some day I shall rove,
My home shall be still
In the arms of His love.

I am God's little bud;

What with sunshine and dew,
And the breath of His mouth,
I am glad through and through!
I hope I shall blossom
As sweet as the rose,
Because of the lovely,
Good gifts He bestows.

I am God's little child;

That is better than all!
He bids me obey Him;
I'd follow His call;
My love and my service
I'll gratefully give,
And praise Him and bless Him
As long as I live.

Keeping the Commandments.

Ash-Wednesday was drawing near, and Miss Whiting was facing the fact that her Sunday-school class was losing its interest.

Lessons were not learned. The children came to the class with their minds full of anything and everything, except what she had taken pains to tell them the week before. They were late; utterly disregarding the short service which preceded the lesson hour. They missed many Sundays altogether, and marks seemed to have ceased to make any impression upon their sensibilities.

Miss Whiting was thoroughly discouraged. What could she do during the Lenten season to arouse greater interest?

She took this question to the rector, but he refused to look too darkly on the matter.

"The children are just the age when other things have more novelty than these that they have known all their lives. I do not believe they have really lost interest. That interest is just diverted. See if you cannot show them some of the old things in a new light. Next Sunday I will visit the class and see how you are getting on."

The rector was always optimistic, no matter how badly things were going; but how much he did expect!

The matter settled itself, however, on Quinquagesima Sunday; or, rather, was settled by one of the younger children, and that before the rector found time for his promised visit.

"How can we keep the commandments, Miss Whiting? We wouldn't think of making graven images, or doing lots of things they tell us not to do. Why do we have to learn them?"

Here was Miss Whiting's opportunity!

One child was actually thinking for herself; and what a world of help and inspiration in that fact, to say nothing of the possibilities it held out to her teacher!

"I am very glad you asked me that question, Louise," she said, turning to the pupil, "and that shall be our Lenten task; to learn—not why—but how we are to keep God's commandments. What you say is, in one respect, very true; but you will all find there are more ways than one of breaking these great rules. We will begin right away, and take one Commandment a week. I will read it to you, and then I will try to put it in a little different form of expression, that perhaps will make it clearer to you."

Just at this moment the rector came walking by; but, seeing the look of intense interest on all the faces upturned to Miss Whiting's, he carefully looked the other way, feeling that in this particular portion of the Sunday school his assistance was not needed just now.

"This week we will take the First Commandment," continued Miss Whiting. "Thou shalt have none other gods but me"; and all try to think of it as though it read: 'Thou shalt not let anything wrong or evil take the place of the good that God would have you do in your daily lives.'

"Think of this during the week, and let me know next Sunday if you do not understand the words better."

Miss Whiting's class numbered about fourteen members, and of course we cannot follow them all through that week or the ones that followed; but we can see how one child, at least, learned the truth of why it was for the best in every way that the rule of the First Commandment be followed.

After reaching home that Sunday Louise thought a great deal about what her teacher had said; but she herself said nothing about it, for she was a very quiet little girl and liked to work things out by herself.

This "working out" was to come very quickly.

No sooner had she finished her dinner than she heard steps on the front piazza, and in came Elsie and Mary to ask her to take a walk with them.

"We're going 'way out across those fields back of the mill, to see if the pussy willows are out. There must be some by this time, even though it is early in the year, and it will be such a glorious walk."

"Oh, may I go, mother?" begged Louise.

"Yes, indeed. Only keep in the meadows and come back the same way you go. Please do not go on the State road, for the automobiles rush up and down so fast there. Coming back, I would like you to stop at Mrs. Garvey's and get her library book and card, so I can return the book to-morrow and get another one for her. Reading is her only pastime; and she is so unhappy if she does not have something new on hand all the time."

The girls listened, promised, and then started off full of school gossip and fun, sliding on the little frozen pools in the meadows, and stopping here and there to search for pussy willows.

"Here they are!" cried Louise, and sure enough, there were the first few little streaks of silver on the brown stems of the willows.

Eagerly the children picked them, planning to put them in water when they reached home, and thus hasten the blossoming.

"They're just beginning to come out here," said Elsie, "but, oh, do you remember that place in the woods across the road where the witch-hazel stays the latest, and where the pussy willows are always out first?"

"Yes, I do," cried Mary. "Let's go over there quick and see."

The three girls involuntarily broke into a run over the bare fields regardless of Sunday clothes. When they reached the fence there were the brown woods beyond, already beginning to show signs of life in the reddish branches.

There were sure to be big, silvery pussy willows there.

"Come along," cried Elsie, starting to climb the fence, while Mary followed her example.

But Louise held back.

"Mother said not to cross the State road," she said, "and to come back the same way we went."

"Oh, that will be all right," said Elsie, eager to get into the woods and scanning the State road both ways, up and down.

"There isn't an automobile in sight, and we can skip across like a flash, go into the woods, and then come back, just the same way. Then we can go home across the fields, stop at Mrs. Garvey's, and get the book and everything. Your mother wouldn't mind. No one loves the first pussy willows better than she does. Come along, Louise."

"Mother would love some big pussy willows," thought the little girl. "And she wouldn't really mind our crossing the road when there are no cars in sight." So over the fence she went with the others, and into the woods beyond.

It was a wonderful expedition, such as children love; with the anticipation and excitement of finding the object of their search at every turn; but nevertheless Louise had a very uncomfortable feeling inside, which grew stronger as the afternoon wore on.

"The pussy willows are no further out on this side of the road than they are on the other," sighed Elsie at last.

This was very true, and that disappointment, coupled with the fact that the three girls had walked about twice as far as they had intended, resulted in a very downcast set of children. In fact, Mary was almost crying with weariness.

Elsie, always the boldest of the three, trudged on, and Louise tried to make a brave second in the march, but she was growing more and more uncomfortable every moment. There was that long, long tramp home. It would be getting dark and cold when she reached there, and beneath it all was the knowledge that she had disobeyed her mother in crossing the State road.

"Oh, I wish we were home," sighed Elsie; and this sign of weakening on the part of their leader sent the hearts of the other little girls down into their very shoes.

"So do I!" wailed Mary, beginning to cry; while Louise, the most miserable of the three, stood trying to keep back the tears.

"Well," cried Elsie, bracing up again. "we never can get home if we don't start. So come on, girls!"

Off they started, and reached the fence bordering the State road just as the sun sank down behind the hills.

Away down the road they heard an automobile coming and waited for it to pass; but as it reached them it stopped and a cheerful voice called:

"Want a ride, girls?"

"Oh, yes, we do!" and with one accord they all scrambled into the back seat, while the driver, who was a friend of Elsie's father, tucked them in with a robe.

"Want to take a little spin before dark?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, yes! What fun!" cried two of the girls, their weariness all forgotten. But Louise sank back in her seat.

"Tired?" asked Elsie.

"A little," answered she.

It was not weariness that made the little girl so quiet.

It was long past supper time when the three children reached their several homes.

"Louise, where have you been?" asked her mother in an anxious tone, turning from the window where she had been eagerly watching the gate.

And with a shamed look Louise told the story.

"It is seven o'clock now," said her mother. "And I have been watching since five. The book and the card from Mrs. Garvey—did you get those? They are so particular at the library now, I cannot possibly get another book for her without returning the one she has had and presenting her card."

"I forgot all about that," said Louise slowly.

"So Mrs. Garvey will have to go without her one pleasure for two days, for I cannot possibly get over to see her to-morrow myself."

There was no way of undoing the mischief, for the library would not be open till Wednesday.

"Oh, I am so sorry."

Louise was a very tender-hearted little girl, and her mother knew she had had a severe punishment in knowing she had caused her anxiety, and deprived a poor sick woman of pleasure; but she did not know how thoroughly Louise had learned her Sunday-school lesson:

"Thou shalt not let anything wrong or evil take the place of the good God would have you do in your daily lives."

The Perfect Mark.

Grandmother told the children a story about the time when she was a little girl, and had just started to school.

Teacher promised a prize that year to any child who would come all term without a tardy mark. Little grandmother wanted that prize very much, for it was a big red book full of fine stories. Most of the children had been tardy at least once, but she had not. Then came Thanksgiving, and then Christmas, and still she was not tardy. Then one morning she could not find her red mittens, and she was a few minutes late starting. She thought she could run, but it had rained in the night, and the rain was frozen, so that the ground was covered with ice. But away she went as fast as she could, across the meadow, sliding, and sometimes falling.

She was going to be in time, for the bell had not rung when she reached the steep little hillock before the school. She started up, but when she had gone a little way she came sliding back, quite to the bottom. She tried again, in another place, but when she got a third of the way up she came sliding down again to the bottom. Again she tried, but the hill was like a sheet of glass. Even though she crept on her hands and knees, she could not get all the way to the top.

Then she stood at the bottom of the hill and wept. It was dreadful to miss the prize when she had tried so hard, and really this was not her fault at all. She was in plenty of time if only she could get up the hill.

"Hullo, there; what's the trouble?"

Little grandmother looked up through her tears. At the top of the hill stood one of the big boys. She was rather afraid of him, and called him a horrid boy in her mind.

"I can't get up the hill," she cried, "and I shall be late."

"And then you'd miss the prize. And that would be too bad, when you've tried so hard. Let me see. We've only about two minutes to do anything. I can't come and get you. I couldn't get up that smooth ice myself. I came around the other way, but it's too late for you to do that. Oh, I know, just wait a minute. You'll get up in time, and don't cry any more."

He ran away, and she stood, trembling and hoping, but also fearing the bell would ring any minute. He was back very soon, and he held a coil of rope in his hand.

"Now, then, I'm going to throw you the two ends," he said, "and I've put loops in them. You put your hands through the loops, and hold on tight, and I'll pull you up."

Down came the rope. She found the loops, and held on tight, and then she was being drawn up the hill. It would have been fun if she had not been in such anxiety. All she needed to do was to stand firm, and the big boy helped her to skate up hill. She was at the top at length. There came a cheer from the schoolroom window, where teacher and schoolmates had been watching. They were all glad that the youngest scholar, who had tried so hard, was on time.

"Oh, thank you! Thank you!" she cried to the big boy. "If I should get the prize it will be half yours. You're the nicest boy I know."

Then she ran in, and just as she got to her seat the bell rang.

And at the end of the term she was the only one who had not been late; so she got the prize.—Z. M. Walters.

The Little Patriot.

Little boy in white,
With eyes of blue,
And lips of coral red,

To our God in light,
In heaven's vast height,
Lift up your head.

'Neath His skies so blue
He sets for you
A path your feet must tread.

Keep your soul all bright,
For God you fight
A battle ages long.

As the flag you hold
Inspired of old
A nation's patriot song,

Let it stand to you—
Its every hue—
For right and never wrong.

Little man, be brave,
Your flag wide wave,
Bright red, pure white, true blue.

The Message of Duty.

Long years ago in Judah there was a little boy named Josiah who became king of his country when he was only eight years old. Although his father was dead, he still had his dear mother and many good people around him to show him how to rule wisely and well over his kingdom.

His reign lasted for thirty-one years, and the Bible tells us that during all that time he did not turn aside to the right hand nor to the left. That means, of course, that he was straight and true.

He knew that he could not be a good king, like David, who was one of his ancestors, unless he was careful to do what God wanted him to do. So all the time when he was growing up I think he must have been careful to say his prayers, and to listen to God's voice speaking to him in the silence of his heart.

He loved God so much that he wanted all his subjects to love and serve Him, too. But there were many people in Judah who seemed to have forgotten all about the one true God and were worshipping idols, which, you know, are images made of wood and stone and metal.

Josiah knew that this was very wrong. So he had the idols destroyed. Then he began to think about the beautiful Temple which Solomon had built. This had been neglected for many years and was falling into ruins. Josiah said that it must be repaired and made fit for God's service.

What a busy scene it must have been. The masons built up the crumbling walls and the carpenters repaired the woodwork. In the midst of it Hilkiah, the high priest, found something better than gold or silver or precious stones. This was the Book of the Law which God had given to Moses long years before. It was the only part of the Bible which the people had then, and it is included in the first five books of our Old Testament.

There were only a few books in the world then. And instead of being printed as our books are, they were written by hand. This made them very costly. One of the laws in this book told the people that they ought to go to church on every seventh day of the week. That was the Israelites' Sunday, but they had forgotten this law and they never went to church.

Think how glad King Josiah must have been to hear of good news! Of course he wanted to know what it said. But after it had been read to him he was very sad. He knew how very few of the wise laws which God commanded had been kept by the people, and how very many they had broken. He was sure God would punish the people for disobeying Him. He wanted to know just what would happen.

So he sent Hilkiah and some of the others to Huldah, who was a prophetess, or a very wise woman. She said that God would punish the people, but because Josiah had loved God and tried to do what was right he would be spared.—Shepherd's Arms.

To be a disciple of Christ does not simply mean to accept His ideal, but to accept Christ Himself, to admit Him into our lives, to walk with Him, to trust Him, obey Him, to grow up in Him to fullness of life and character. No one need be long unaware of what is required of him. The apostle tells us to put off the old things that have marred and obscured what was Divine within us, to seek that which is above, "forbearing one another, and forgiving one another," and above all to "put on charity which is the bond of perfectness."—J. F. Newton.

THRIFT

Pays The Bills

This world is full of bills. The grocer sends them, the butcher, the baker, the coal man, the ice man and the tailor.

To some people bills mean worry and unhappiness. To others who practice Thrift, who spend less than they earn and regularly save a stated sum, bills have no terror.

Is it not better to have dollar bills in the bank than bills in the mail-box?

Greenlaw: Died at his home, Oak Grove, Va., on February 14, 1918, S. B. GREENLAW; age, seventy-five years.

Harrison: Died at her home, in Williamsburg, Va., February 11, 1918, MRS. RANDOLPH HARRISON, widow of Colonel Randolph Harrison, of Elk Hill, and daughter of Captain Gabriel Williams, of the old United States Navy, and his wife, in the eighty-fourth year of her age.

Hubard: On Friday morning, February 15, 1918, at the home of his mother, Mrs. Henry Castle, in Norfolk, Va., the soul of TAZEVELL TAYLOR HUBARD, son of Sallie Taylor and Rev. James R. Hubard, peacefully entered into life eternal.

Pegram: Entered into rest from the home of her brother in Pemopolis, Ala., on February 14, 1918, SARAH FLETCHER, daughter of Edward Strange and Sarah Raincock Pegram.

"Peace, perfect peace."

Simes: On the 21st of February, 1918, at her residence, "Hamilton Court," Philadelphia, ELEANOR R. SIMES, widow of Rev. Snyder E. Simes, late rector of Gloria Dei (Old Swedes) Church, Philadelphia.

Together Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Simes had spent the forty-six years of their married life in devoted service to that historic parish, and now after a short separation are united again in the Church Triumphant. Their bodies will rest together in the graveyard of the church "till the morning."

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; yea, saith the Spirit for they rest from their labors, and their works follow them."

IN MEMORIAM.

Tazewell Taylor Hubard.

Memorial adopted at a meeting of the Norfolk and Portsmouth Bar Association:

"Mr. Hubard obtained his education in letters at the Virginia Military Institute. He graduated there with high honors and the degree of Civil Engineer, in his twentieth year, and served the institute for two years as an assistant professor; from thence he went to the University of Virginia, where he studied law.

"He began practice in this city in 1890, in partnership with his brother, Leighton, and so continued until his death—an honored member of this bar.

"By nature, industrious and painstaking, it can be safely said of him that no Court Commissioner of Accounts— which position he held for more than twenty years—was ever more conscientious, diligent and thorough in his work.

"He was a modest and unassuming man. With a just respect for himself and the knowledge that he deserved and had the respect of others, he was content to pursue the 'cool, sequestered paths of life.' He had no taste that made him like to read his name in the public print, or to become the center of public notice. Earnest and intent upon doing well that which his hand found to do, he left to others the ambition that courts attention.

"His religious convictions were deep-seated, and they were his rule of conduct in all the relations of life. An affectionate son, a loving and devoted husband and father, a Christian gentleman in the truest and fullest sense, he has passed to the other and his existence which awaits a life like his.

"We bemoan the death of such a lawyer, the community the loss of such a citizen.

"R. W. TOMLIN, Chairman."

MRS. RANDOLPH HARRISON.

Another shining angel joined the heavenly throng when her pure spirit winged its flight from this earth.

Married in early youth, her husband took her to his ancestral home, Elk Hill, in Goochland County. She presided over this beautiful, hospitable home with conspicuous dignity and grace for many years, always with a welcoming smile to her numerous guests.

When "the War Between the States" came on, Colonel Harrison was necessarily away from home with the army. Thus much responsibility devolved upon her, but gentle, patient, faithful in every relation of life, she kept the home, cared for her children, and with the assistance of her manager, took charge of this valuable large plantation, besides giving tender care to her aged grandfather, who made his home with her.

After the close of the war, Colonel Harrison moved his family to Williamsburg, the girlhood home of his wife.

"I thank my God for every remembrance of you."

ONE WHO LOVED HER.

IN MEMORIAM.

Mrs. Virginia Magdalene Robinson.

Mrs. Virginia Magdalene Robinson, of Danville, Va., passed peacefully from earth to heaven, February 8, 1918.

Mrs. Robinson was born in Henry County, Va., June 21, 1839. Her parents, Peter and Magdalene Watkins Shelton, are survived by Mrs. Joseph Penn and Peter Shelton, of Roanoke; James Shelton, of Atlanta, and Mrs. J. H. Matthews and Miss Mary Shelton, of Martinsville.

Mrs. Robinson's husband, Dr. Robert R. Robinson, died in 1879, leaving her to rear the young children. Her son, Dr. Robert W. Robinson, the efficient and beloved health officer of her native city, died in 1908. In the death of this son, the prop of her declining years, she was bereft indeed.

Her surviving daughters are Mrs. E. K. Jones and Miss Kate Robinson. Mrs. Jones, a daughter of her father's former marriage, knowing no mother but the one who reared her, has ever been thoughtful, faithful and affectionate, and her husband and children join her in doing all possible to console the stricken daughter, Kate, bereft of father, mother and brother.

Mrs. Robinson retained her beauty of feature even in death, and even more beautiful was her trusting faith in her Lord and Saviour.

Devotion to family ties was possibly her chief characteristic. Her tender heart grieved for those gone before, and unceasing was her affectionate solicitude for those left behind.

After a touching service at the residence, conducted by the rector of Epiphany Church, of which for many years she had been a communicant, her body was placed beside that of her husband, her son and a beloved brother, Thomas Shelton, in Greenhill cemetery, and the four mounds were strewn with blossoms, the tribute of scores of bereaved friends.

IN MEMORIAM.

Lucy Ambler Mason.

The vestry of Grace Episcopal Church, mourning with their beloved rector emeritus in the sudden passing of his precious wife from his loving family circle on January 17, 1918, extend to the Rev. Landon R. Mason, D. D., their sympathies most tender in this hour of deepest bereavement; and for each of those sobbing for mother, sister, friend, we invoke the blessings of our Heavenly Father and the consolations of mercy and peace.

For more than twenty-five years Lucy Ambler Mason has made her home in Richmond happy for its inmates and beautiful in the eyes of all who came to her in sickness, suffering or need; and those in want, unable to seek her, have been visited, cheered and relieved by her gentle ministrations. She has moved among us as an angel of light and love, and, untrammelled by the trappings of life, has shed along her pathway the glory of another world. And now, through the portals of the grave, which had no terrors for her, we behold her pure spirit among those who "have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

On earth, gentle birth, refined training, sacred traditions, bright intelligence, firm faith in all things high and noble, and religion undefiled, combined to make her adorable and strong. A priceless heritage, an inspiring memory, has she left for her husband, children, relatives and friends. This mortal has put on immortality, and above the hosannas resounding around the throne of God, she hears the tender words of her Saviour: "Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was hungry, and ye gave Me to eat; I was thirsty, and ye gave Me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took Me in; naked, and ye clothed Me; I was sick, and ye visited Me; I was in prison, and ye came unto Me."

IN MEMORIAM.

Fell asleep in Jesus at her home in White Post, Clarke County, Va., after a short illness, on Tuesday, January 29, 1918, MARTHA CARTER GRYMES, the beloved wife of George Carter Meade, and daughter of the late Custis Grymes and Ann Roy Stuart, his second wife, of Liberty, King George County, Va. The interment took place on Friday, February 1, in the family lot in the churchyard of Meade Memorial Church, White Post, Va. "Looking for the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Titus 2:13.

Entered into life eternal at her home White Post, Clarke County, Va., on Friday, February 15, 1918, Rosalie Grymes, beloved wife of Wilton Stuart, M. D., and daughter of the late Custis Grymes and his first wife, Martha Grymes, of King George County, Va. The interment took place from Meade Memorial Church on the first Sunday in Lent, and all that is mortal of her reposes in the same churchyard as her beloved sister, whom she followed so soon, until the day break and the shadows flee away.

"Thus did they press their hands and part,
The dearly loved, the fondly loving,
But now they commune heart with heart,
The undivided, unremoving."

Where none shall beckon them away,
Nor bid their festival be done;
Their meeting time the eternal day,
Their meeting place the eternal throne."

Entered into the rest of the people of God at her home in King George County, Va., on Tuesday, January 29, 1918, Amelia Washington, widow of the late John Hill Stuart, of Liberty, King George County, Va., in sure and certain hope of the Resurrection to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."
"Her children rise up and call her blessed."

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

William Jett Carey.

Whereas, our Heavenly Father has taken unto Himself His faithful servant, our senior warden and friend, William Jett Carey; therefore be it Resolved by the vestry of Cople Parish, That we recognize in his death the loss of a loved friend, a devoted Churchman and a true Christian. As superintendent and teacher at Yeomico Sunday-school and the Sunday-school at the Hague for over twenty years, as a warden and vestryman of this parish for as long a time, he has shown a faithfulness and devotion to his Master's cause that leave us thankful for his blessed example, and inspired by his devotion.

As a citizen of this community, in which he was born and lived his whole life, Mr. Carey, by his stainless honor and noble character, won for himself the universal respect of all men. No man among us was better loved by those who knew him.

Be it further resolved, That we extend to his bereaved family the assurance of our deep and lasting sympathy in this hour of our common loss.

Be it further resolved, That these resolutions be entered upon the minutes of the vestry, a copy of the same be sent to Mr. Carey's family, and that they be published in the Northern Neck News and the Southern Churchman.

A Woman's Secret of Happiness.

On the walls of an old lady's home hangs the photograph of a womanly face of rare sweetness, strength and serenity. The key to her life is found in the following set of rules, tastefully printed and enclosed in the same frame with the photograph:

"You sometimes see a woman whose old age is as exquisite as were the perfect bloom of her youth. She seems condensed sweetness and grace. You wonder how this has come about, you wonder how it is that her life has been a long and happy one. Here are some of the reasons:

"She knew how to forget disagreeable things.

"She kept her nerves well in hand, and inflicted them on no one.

"She believed in the goodness of her own daughters, and in that of her neighbors.

"She cultivated a good digestion."

"She mastered the art of saying pleasant words.

"She did not expect too much from her friends.

"She made whatever work came to her congenial.

"She retained her illusions, and did not believe that all the world was wicked and unkind.

"She relieved the miserable and sympathized with the sorrowful.

"She did whatever came to her cheerfully and well.

"She never forgot that kind words and a smile cost nothing, but are priceless treasures to the discouraged.

"She did unto others as she would be done by; and now that old age has come to her, and there is a halo of white hair about her head, she is loved and considered.

"This is the secret of a long life and a happy one."

PREACHING.

It is a question whether we are giving Preaching anything like its proper importance in the work of the ministry of this Church. There was a time when the pulpit was set up in front of and in a position to practically obscure the Holy Table. In the Church's strong reaction from that condition, "we have"—(I am quoting now so staunch a sacramentarian as Canon Newbold of S. Paul's London) "we have thought that we might show our great appreciation of Sacraments by offering indignity to Sermons."

The Nation-Wide Preaching Movement endorsed and authorized by the last General Convention, and enthusiastically and prayerfully participated in by our clergy and people almost everywhere during the past year, whatever else it may signify, is the Church's practical acknowledgment that the preaching office has been too long and too much neglected and despised; and the Church has suffered the result of such neglect and would do her utmost now at length to remedy the fault. The Nation-Wide Preaching Mission endorsed and emphasized and authorized by the General Convention is the Church's way of proclaiming that she puts a high valuation not only on sacraments, but on sermons, too.

Strange it is that the Church should ever permit herself to relegate preaching of an inferior place in her system. For, in the case of every child brought to the font to be grafted into the Body of Christ by Baptism, in the exhortation addressed to the sponsors is the charge, "Ye shall call upon this child to hear sermons." And how shall sermons be heard if the preaching function be neglected?

Let us, then, look more carefully to our sermons. Whether we "shoot without a rest" or not is a question that we shall determine from time to time, according to circumstances. But before we shoot at all, let us remember that it is a law of physics that a gun must be one hundred times heavier than the shot it carries! Which, being interpreted, is let us fortify ourselves to give a message! Let us not be willing that our people should look up and not be fed! Let us study to prepare ourselves to show them the brook in the way, that they may drink of it and lift up their heads!

Let us prepare ourselves, I say. Is it fair to God to go into the pulpit and say, "In the name of the Father and of the Son of the Holy Ghost" and then just twaddle, and dawdle and drible; and by the invocation with which we have begun our sermon, practically unload on God the responsibility of our twaddle and our dawdle and our drible! Is it fair to God?

Smartness, profanity, irreverence, piled on and on and heaped up and up, are not what is needed to fill an empty church. The comic sermon, the popular sermon, the sermon on the topics of the day—"Courtship," "Wives," "Best Books," and as I once saw it advertised with my own eyes, "Best Cooks"—this sort of thing is not what is needed to fill an empty church. What is needed is that each one of us as he prepares his sermon (and unless he be driven to it let no man of us dare to preach who has not first tried to prepare)—what is needed is that each should ask himself the question: "Is this that I am going to say something that will steady these people for the battles they are fighting? Will it help that man whose weaknesses I know to 'Move upward, working out the beast And let the ape and tiger die'?"

Will it help that other man who flounders in the bog? Will it put leverage under him to lift him up out of the horrible pit, out of the mire and the clay, to set his feet upon a rock and order his goings? Will it help that fallen woman to rebuild again the citadel of her womanhood which is broken down, and put a new song in her mouth, even a thanksgiving unto her God?

Let us look more to our preaching! Let us be done with thinking that He who calls us and commissions us wishes us to exalt sacraments by belittling sermons! Nothing of the kind! "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God and to minister the Holy Sacraments," is to be said to each man who comes to be ordained to-day. "Be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His Holy Sacraments," is to be said to each. Twice over, in one moment of time, you who shall be ordained to-day are charged that the preaching of the Word and the ministering of the Sacraments are complementary and not mutually exclusive acts. Preach Christ to the people! "God may have other words for other worlds, but for this world the Word of God is Christ." Preach earnestly! "Why is it," said a half-discouraged preacher to a celebrated actor once—"why is it that I cannot in my pulpit hold the people twenty minutes, and you on the stage hold them for two hours?" "Because," said the actor, "because I on the stage act a lie as if it were the truth; and you in your pulpit preach a truth as if it were a lie!"—Bishop F. F. Johnson.

"Surely the Captain may depend on me" may not be the best thing to say before others, but, rightly meant, it is a noble self-commitment. Dependable people!—their price is above rubies. The world would be a dreary place if there were not some Christians who need no prodding or watching, who can be told and then trusted.—Selected.

Order Fertilizers Now or You May Have to Do Without Them This Season

The freight congestion is serious. You will help yourself, us, the railroads, and the Government by giving your order for Fertilizers NOW to your dealer. If all the farmers do this, the dealer can then "bunch" his orders, and be able to order his cars of fertilizers loaded to full capacity. The Government urges that all cars be so loaded.

When the goods arrive haul them home, and put them into your barn until you are ready to use them. If the movement of railroad cars becomes any more serious you may not get a pound of fertilizer at any price.

Our 50 factories, and distributing points are so well located geographically as to enable us to get fertilizers to you with minimum amount of hauling.

Supposed to be without.

—Browning.

Great faith is not simply to trust God to do great and apparently impos-sible things. But it is also to trust God in the very little things, as not beneath notice. Some are straining to trust God in great things who do not trust Him in the ordinary affairs of life.—Anon

Never fancy you could be something if only you had a different lot and sphere assigned you. The very things that you most deprecate, as fatal limi-tations or obstructions, are probably what you most need. What you call hindrances, obstacles, discouragements, are probably God's opportunities.—Horace Bushnell.

Watching practically means that we so live that when He comes He will be pleased that, through His wondrous grace so freely given, we have been faithful; maybe not skilled nor reck-oned successful, but faithful. And this faithfulness, in heart and purpose and life, to Him, hastens the day of His return.—S. D. Gordon.

"There is a place where thou canst touch the eyes
Of blinded men to instant, perfect sight;
There is a place where thou canst say 'Arise'
To dying captives bound in chains of night;
There is a place where thou canst reach the store

Of hoarded gold and free it for the Lord;
There is a place upon some distant shore
Where thou canst send the worker or the Word.
There is a place where heaven's resist-less power
Responsive moves to thine insistent plea;
There is a place—a silent, trusting hour—
Where God Himself descends and fights for thee.
Where is that blessed place? Dost thou ask 'Where'?
O soul, it is the secret place of prayer!"

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Give thanks with your hands.

Only sorrow gives the tender touch.

"Go gravely forth, ye chosen souls—to bleed."

Impatience is energy: discontent is immortality.

There is no place this side of heaven when it will be safe for the Christian not to watch and pray

If you are poor it may be that the Lord wants to show you how rich He can make you without money.

Wherever there is a sin, it is sure to be followed by a sorrow, unless it is at once taken to Christ and given up.

God is not worshiped in spirit and in truth in the church that has to go into the show business to raise money to pay its honest debts.

The reason some people do not believe in Foreign Missions, is that they are heathen themselves: they worship other gods.—E. J. Brown.

People gazed at Paul when they found he was a Christian, and they always will gaze at a sure enough Christian, trying to be kind and thought-ful.—Dr. J. H. Eccleston.

Love's Choice.

He chose this path for thee!

No feeble chance, nor hard, relentless fate,

But love—His love—hath placed thy footsteps here;

He knew the way was rough and desolate—

Knew how thy heart would often sink with fear;

Yet tenderly He whispered, "Child, I see

This path is best for thee."

He chose this path for thee!

Though well He knew sharp thorns would tear thy feet,

And well He knew that thou must tread alone

Its gloomy vales, and ford each flowing stream,

Knew how thy bleeding heart would sob and moan.

Love scanned it all, and yet could say, "I see

This path is best for thee."

Prayer is asking God to supply our need. Now, when all need is supplied, the necessity for prayer is, of course, taken away. Prayer is not consistent with a perfect state of being. It is the cry of infancy. In heaven you will be men. Prayer is the call of helplessness and the wail of sorrow. But in "that day" Christ will open Himself to you as a fountain of good, and then ye shall ask nothing. Meekness for that place consists in the spirit of praise, and not in the spirit of prayer.—S. Martin.

A Prayer for the Airmen.

Winds are Thy messengers, O God,
Clouds are the chariot of Thy path,
The tempest rages at Thy nod,
The lightnings gleam, when Thou art
wroth;
And if to scale the heavens above,
Trusting in Thee, Thy creatures dare,
Shield them with Thy protecting love
Who ride upon the viewless air.

Fearless they cleave the misty shroud,
They scorn the danger, scorn the foe;
Fearless thwart the thunder cloud
They go where duty bids them go;
Yet while, amid the heav'n's above,
The instant face of death they dare,
Shield them with Thy protecting love
Who ride upon the viewless air.

Through crash of war, through storm and fire,
With stiffening limbs and vision strained.

Onward and upward, higher and higher,
They work untired the work ordained;
At risk of life through heav'n's above,
While to their brethren life they bear,
Shield them with Thy protecting love
Who ride upon the viewless air.

Methodist Reunion.

The Methodist commissioners who are trying to bring Northern and Southern Methodists together in organic union, announce they will hereafter take the public into their confidence, and at once make public the results of their conferences. In spite of secrecy observed at the session just held at Savannah the newspapers were quite accurately informed, their statements being confirmed by later publicity in the Methodist weeklies. The great point of the negotiations is that the negro, long in the way of union, is disposed of. He is to have a conference of his own, with powers sufficient for him, and is to stay in American Methodism. Now it is believed to be possible to proceed, although actual unity will require some few years to bring in all of its parts.

A slight difference from the report first published concerning agreements reached at Savannah is that there may be six or more regional conferences instead of four, and some additional conferences to take care of missionary and related work. These are matters of detail, and may be changed. A fourth meeting of the commissioners is called for St. Louis on April 10, and it is expected there will be ready a definite statement to be reported to the General Conference of the Church South, meeting in Atlanta on May 2. As stated in the earlier report, everything is as yet tentative. However, commissioners on both sides are now more hopeful than they have been of ultimate success.

Zakkai. The building itself is a thousand years old, may be older, for nobody seems to know, and it seats about one thousand persons. It was named after the rabbi, famous in his ancient day, who founded the university city of Yebneh.

The new and larger synagogue, and the better located, is Temple Hurway, which means ruins. It dates back three hundred years, quite young for Jerusalem, and seats fully three thousand persons. It is said to be in better repair than Synagogue Ben-Zakkai, and so appointed that it can be identified with the proposed University of Jerusalem. Thus there will be saved to the Jews the time and the expense of erecting a synagogue worthy of their cause in the future, and worthy the history of their race in Jerusalem.

The false ideal of a state whose might makes right, of a state not bound to respect weaker states, of a state whose end of self-aggrandizement justifies any means of duplicity, treachery, cruelty and diabolism—this ideal got its domination over a people most of whose applauded scholars have for a century been striving to prove the Gospel story a bundle of myths or legends of fabrications or misconceptions. "Made in Germany" is the stamp on the majority of these critical theories which would take off the divine halo from the head of Jesus Christ. It is not so much to be marvelled at that in choosing an ideal leader the people of that land said "Not this Man; but Barabbas," not He who bears the cross, but he who draws the sword.—Bishop Mann.

Light.

Let light so shine,
Dear God of mine,
In this earth's darkest hour,
That as I trod
Its blood-soaked sod,
I stride with power.

Let Faith's bright light

In which He trod,
My Saviour, God,
In mercy mild.

No mocking dream,
No fitful gleam,
Will be that guidance given;
But sent by Thee,
Th'will set me free
To enter heaven.

—Archdeacon Wicks.

The Virtue of a Great Struggle.

We need great struggles because they go to make life worth living. When we hear of noble deeds that are being done by men over the seas, we envy the fellows there, even though they be called upon to "go over the top." I heard an English captain say that he enjoyed more real friendship three months in the trenches than he had all his life in conventional society. Sacrifice, consecration to a sacred cause, is opening the windows of our souls. We are losing much of prudery in speech and customs; we are finding it easier to serve and love one another. It is quite difficult to shirk our duties when we hear of so many noble deeds. We find ourselves often on our knees invoking divine aid in our endeavor to be less ignoble and to do something to put in this side of the scales in order that our side may be kept down. If vice is contagious, so is virtue, and the brotherhood the men are enjoying across the sea is a great inspiration to us. One Saturday night in Chicago I had to go from one end of the city to the other in a terrible blizzard to meet an engagement. I had to conduct an early service next morning. My friend said to me, "Frank, you are foolish to go out tonight." I thought so too. After a little I said, "Old fellow, think what the fellows are doing across the seas. Should I not do so little for my Master?" My friend at once sprang to his feet and said: "By all means you should go. How ignoble we fellows are at home." Two things are wonderful as means whereby we are made to love one another—Acquaintance and Service.

Where life is open, candid and natural, we feel free, and intimate friendship springs up. Then are we more willing to serve one another, and nothing do we appreciate that does not cost us something. The more willing we are to serve the more able we are to love. Jesus' life was so joyful because His life was one of service. When we

Christian people can learn to serve each other more we will love one another more, and life will become full of joys. Our boys in the trenches are teaching us here at home another lesson: sacrifice gives us magnanimity. He who is willing to suffer is able to forgive. Were we willing to suffer more we would find it less easy to be at variance. "No man hath greater love than this, to lay down his life for his friends." "Forgive them, Father, for they know not what they do." If ever a nation has suffered it has been Belgium. Because of his nobleness, willingness to suffer for his people, for a principle, many beautiful and noble stories are told about their king. I read a story the other day that has a lesson for all who happen to read these words. Two little Belgian children, left without parents, shelter, food and clothing, were slowly dragging their little weary bodies through the city, till finally too fatigued to go any further, they sought shelter where they might pray. Both began to pray the Lords' Prayer together. When they reached the sentence "give us this day our daily bread," the smaller one lost her childish faith and stopped. The older sister prayed on alone till she reached the sentence "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Here she stopped, a lump came in her little throat, and she could go no further. A sentinel who was standing behind the little girls took up the prayer where they left off and carried it on to its conclusion. The girls lifted up their eyes and were much surprised to find their king, standing over them, praying with them, but praying also for his enemy. —From a sermon by the Rev. L. B. Franck.

"NEW HEAVENS AND A NEW EARTH."

Long time ago God promised it through the oracle of an ancient prophet, and centuries later one Christian Apostle claimed the promise as part of the heritage of the believer's faith, and another saw its fulfilment in his vision of the consummation of God's purposes. Thousands have read the words with longing wonder, but few have tried to realize what they might mean, thrusting them forward, according to the fashion of an unspiritual age, to some future aeon beyond our ken or comprehension and in regard to which we have nothing to do.

Let us grant that we cannot fathom the fulness of meaning veiled under these words, we may still, perhaps, know in part. We get a hint at least when we notice that the new earth is never promised apart from the new heavens. Which leads that most helpful writer, Bishop W. Boyd Carpenter, to remark:

"They come hand in hand. There is no new earth without a new heaven; and every new heaven brings a new earth. It is when the new sun is risen in the heavens that earth smiles in new beauty. . . . The same principle works in religious history. The law, if we may call it so, holds good in the religious consciousness of men. . . . As was the heaven, so was the earth. As was their conception of God, so was their attitude to their fellowmen. The new heaven made the new earth. When they thought rightly and worthily of the Creator, they thought fitly and worthily of the creature of His hand.

" . . . We cannot separate the new earth from the new heaven. Christ never divorced the two ideas. He never came preaching vague and baseless hopes of a golden age, and of a good time coming. He never spoke of earth apart from heaven, nor of man apart from God. He could assure men of the new earth, because He opened to them the kingdom of heaven. Foremost in His teaching, and made the source of every hope which might arise in the hearts of men, was His teaching about God."

If such an interpretation of the ancient promise is correct, it brings it nearer to us, and makes us realize that it pertains to the world that now is and that we ourselves have something to do in bringing about its fulfilment. It falls in with the thoughts that are seething in the minds of the world's best thinkers and most vigorous fighters today. Why is this war, and what are we fighting for? The answer to that question seems to be growing bigger day by day as we try to grasp its full significance.

There is no question what Germany is fighting for—a greater, wealthier, more imperious, more dominant Germany, the ruling nation of the earth, to be built up at the cost of other nations and peoples. A new world Germanized is her ideal; and she has conceived a new heaven to fit it, with a God of force and efficiency smiling down through the smoke of victorious battle upon this favorite son of his—the Prussian superman. Only it is not a new heaven, but the old pagan heaven and a pagan God which she has newly created.

The other nations, or those who are not cowed by her brute strength, have been forced to do battle against her. Taking up arms at first and suddenly in self-defense, they have come to see more and more clearly as the struggle has gone on the full meaning of that opposite principle for which they are contending. It was the dawning realization of this principle as the great issue at stake that brought America into the war. When she began to understand nothing could keep her out of it. And with each sacrifice she makes or is preparing to make the vision grows clearer and better defined. With each new consecration of national resources, with each new welding of international forces, with each reverse and trying delay that calls for new determination and a firmer resolve, men are saying with a new sense of responsibility, We must make such a war impossible on earth again; conditions must never again be what they were; the causes of this thing must be wiped out. Today, with Europe almost exhausted by the long struggle and America beginning to realize the untold cost of what she has undertaken, and with the final victory seemingly further off than at any time in the past three years, if peace were offered on terms of the status quo ante bellum, everything restored as it stood in June, 1914, it would be refused. We are fighting for something greater than local interests or national protection or old treaty obligations. Men are thinking now of a better world to live in, a new earth wherein dwelleth peace and equity and brotherliness. Many old things are to pass away with this war, they declare; and many things are going to become new.

God grant it! But the old order standeth in this, there must be a new heaven first. There can be no brotherhood without Fatherhood, no love to man that will stand its testing which does not grow out of the love of God, no kingdom of the world that can long or successfully masquerade in the livery of the kingdom of heaven. Think the thing through, and why haven't we had a better world all this time? Not because men have not dreamed of it and schemed for it and been ready to fight for it. But the world they have made has been just as good as could come under the heavens they have conceived and believed in. The God whom a man worships must be just before he is just, true and righteous and merciful before he exercises these qualities. The earth is the resultant of men's character, and that, in the long run, is shaped upon their thought of God, or of that something which they set up in the place of God.

The lesson is plain; and as we cherish our hopes and nourish our patriotism and make our sacrifices and say our prayers may the God of holiness and truth and love look down upon us out of a heaven new to our dull minds and hearts, and give us a right vision of the new earth for which He bids us strive, and of how it shall be created!

CHURCH GOVERNMENT BY BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS.

The level-headed Bishop of Vermont, in his late Convention address, had this to say on a subject of practical importance to which the attention of the Church, especially in the smaller and more "remote" dioceses, needs to be directed:

"As you know, I have always favored Provincial action, and I believe that the development of the Provincial Synods may be of great service. I hope it may tend to free us from the multiplication, which I view with considerable suspicion, of General Boards and Commissions, to which a Church nominally Episcopal is in danger of being given over for government. Committees and commissions to prepare plans for action by a legislative body are of course necessary. But I distrust commissions for executive purposes. The General Board of Missions may be necessary—for the present. But the General Board of Religious Education and the General Commission on Social Service are to my mind of doubtful value. They can exercise no real authority, and I don't think they should have any. I am ready to co-operate with neighboring Dioceses, and I believe Diocesan peculiarities may be helpfully checked, as well as work stimulated, by such joint deliberation and action. But direction from a Board or Commission supposed to represent in its membership the whole Church, but owing to vast distances practically coming to be confined in its action to a small group round headquarters, is an entirely different thing. Apart from questions of ecclesiastical order, the circumstances, needs and possibilities of small and rural Dioceses are likely to be overlooked. We are in constant receipt of prescriptions dictated from the point of view of large cities."

Any one familiar with the methods of legislation in the General Convention, and, indeed, in any large legislative body, knows how easily such Boards or Commissions as Bishop Hall refers to have their rise. A new subject for legislation, or a new or neglected field for Church activities, is brought to the attention of the Convention. It commends itself to that body, which is, however, utterly unprepared to deal with it. Only one thing can be done—to refer the matter to a Joint Commission to work out a plan and report a course of action to the next General Convention. The Commission is composed usually of a few active friends of the proposed measure, a few scattered members of the Convention from the West and South, and a number of favorite committee-men, including the busiest metropolitan Bishops, residing in or near the great Eastern cities. At the next Convention an elaborate report is presented, admirably written, with a ready-made canon or series of resolutions prepared for immediate adoption. If the report is long enough few deputies have time to read it. If it is handsomely gotten up it is apt to be accepted on its merits as a printer's job. With the best will in the world on the part both of the Commission and the Convention, legislation is adopted creating a General Board or a permanent Commission, necessarily with vaguely defined duties and powers, to put into operation and conduct the newly conceived scheme or to direct the new activities. The Board or Commission, with the quasi authority of the General Convention behind it, feels bound to justify its existence and is more than apt to magnify its office. An elaborate organization, a metropolitan headquarters, a full staff of secretaries and clerks and an expensive stock of office stationery must not go to waste. And when all these have been provided, however carefully the personnel of the Board or Commission was selected with a view to general representation, the concern becomes more or less centralized, with an invariable tendency to force the work of the Church in its particular line into one mould and according to one plan, and that the one drawn from or adapted to its local environment. For the great body of the Church remote from the great centers of population and wealth, its methods are apt to be far more expensive and embarrassing than they are useful.

The remedy for all this is in the hands of the dioceses. The General Convention is much given to opportunism, to assuming authority which does not belong to it and writing into its canons prescriptions which are tending to an undue centralization of power. The Diocesan Council or Convention is the legislative body closest to the actual operations of the working Church and is alone cognizant of her conditions, requirements and capacities in its local field. It should not surrender the right to regulate its own affairs in its own way and to work on its own approved lines, nor be too much impressed by advices and directions coming down to it from New York. A farmer will not wisely attempt to run his plow in just the way a banker runs his automobile, nor a Southern or Southwestern diocese conform too closely to the methods of the thickly populated and well-manned parishes and dioceses of the East.

BISHOP ANDERSON ON UNITY.

With apologies to the preacher, the publishers and the printers, we are giving to our readers extracts from the recent Hale Memorial Sermon, entitled:

The Work of the Church on Behalf of Unity.—By the Right Rev. C. P. Anderson, D. D., Bishop of Chicago. Published for the Western Theological Seminary by the Young Churchman Company.

The whole sermon is a notable contribution to the thought of the Church at this time, and is worthy of the most careful study.

Church Unity: A Venture of Faith.

"Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for My sake shall find it."—St. Matt. 16:25.

* * * Things cannot go on as they are. All is not well in Zion. All is not well with the world. One trembles to think how much of the guilt of this world convulsion may rightly be charged up against a divided and inefficient Church. Let that pass, however. The immediate fact is that nothing less than a world revolution is taking place. Just as serfdom gave way to feudalism, and feudalism yielded somewhat to altruism, so the present order is giving way to some form of collectivism. Greek civilization had its day of glory and gave way to Rome. Rome fell and gave way to the Christian civilization of mediaeval Europe. This civilization, through reformation and revolution and reaction, and through an over emphasis on the doctrine of individual rights, gave way to what is proudly called modern civilization. Its gods are individualism, intellectualism and materialism. It cannot survive. It is breaking down as "a world in arms hammers out its unknown future on bloody anvils."

Can the churches remain unmoved, like St. Simeon Stylites on his pillar, as a staggering civilization passes on? Can the churches remain static while the whole fabric of society is undergoing structural changes? Can a fossilized traditionalism supply the spiritual dynamic to the new age? "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever." That means that He is eternally young, the Redeemer of the twentieth century. Dare the churches go on preaching a disintegrated Christ to this newborn era which is hailing internationalism and the progressive solidarity of brotherhood as its new Saviours? Must not the churches expect to undergo something as revolutionary as what is going on around them?

There will be a difference, of course, for the Kingdom of Christ "is not of this world." The revolution in the churches will be a recovery and not a discovery. They will discover no new faith, but the recovery of the lost charter of the Church's unity is surely the revolutionary challenge of the hour. Only through a resurgent faith in the power of Christianity to reassert its corporate strength can we look beyond the social revolution of to-day to the spiritual regeneration of to-morrow. Revolutions are frequently a compound of two ingredients, evolution and recovery. They return to the past to take a fresh grip on eternal verities, from which base alone can the human soul confidently leap forward into the future. The Renaissance and the Reformation were recoveries as well as evolutions. They returned to the past to find hope for the future. The Renaissance revolted against scholasticism and returned to the intellectual atmosphere of Greece for the development of the intellect. The Reformation revolted against ecclesiasticism and returned to the conscience of primitive Christianity for the development of the soul. So the new revolution in the churches may be confidently welcomed as an evolution and a recovery. It will be a recovery of a lost conscience on the unity of the Body of Christ. It will be an evolution from chaos to cosmos.

There was a time when the Church was visibly one; when the churches of Jerusalem and Rome and Corinth and Ephesus and Phillippi and Colosse were Asia, with their varied and multitudinous membership, were one. That was the most productive period of the Church's life. That early Church was constructive, dynamic, evolutionary and revolutionary. It did not try to save its own life. It made daring ventures for God. It was not self-conscious. It was self-forgetful. It had a sublime consciousness of a mission from God. It had an overwhelming conviction that God so loved the world that He sent His only begotten Son that the world through Him might be saved; that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself; that the Church was the Body of Christ, the executive agency for bringing in the Kingdom of righteousness and peace and joy; that Christ crucified was to be preached as the power and wisdom of God, even though it were a stumblingblock to some and foolishness to others. This was the Church's message. She could proclaim no other. She proclaimed it, not for her own sake, but for Christ's sake and the world's sake. What matter what happened, if she fulfilled her mission? What mattered it if there were political persecution and social ostracism, and perils by land and sea, and imprisonments and martyrdoms—what mattered all these things if the Kingdom of God were being set up?

The Church was concerned with only one thing. That one thing was not her own life. She risked it every day in preaching her Gospel. As the Gospel was proclaimed the world began to be changed and turned "upside down." The cornerstones of our highest civilizations began to be laid. Liberty, fraternity and equality began to be born. Beneficent ideals began to find their way into the statute-books of the nations. Guilds and crafts and brotherhoods and sisterhoods for mutual help and protection began to spring into being. A new kind of art and architecture was born. Woman began to occupy her proper place in the world. Slavery began to be abolished. War itself started out on its long, long journey towards extinction. Men acquired a new conscience in regard to the sinfulness of sin and the dignity of service. They arrived at new ideals about home and wife and child and mother, and the most hopeless of men found a new power to lift them from the mire and stand them up among the princes of God's people. These things did not happen in a day. They have not all fully happened yet. The Kingdom of God is in process of becoming. But all that we mean by a Christian civilization made continental strides forward, as a self-forgetful Church staked its very life on God in a hostile world.

Come down several centuries. The Church had then acquired great power, political and social, but with it she became self-conscious; conscious of the greatness of the institution itself, conscious of her power and pomp and glory. With the dawn of self-consciousness she lost that self-forgetfulness which had been the secret of her earlier strength. Then followed spiritual decay. Then followed revolt and schism as a righteous protest against the loss of spiritual vision. Then followed in turn the substitution of many churches for the one Church of the New Testament and folios of theology for the simple symbols of primitive Christianity. Then followed later the same self-consciousness on the part of the separate churches as they, themselves, had protested against on the day of their birth. Is not that the situation today? The churches are self-conscious. They have a meticulous dread that something may happen to the outward fabric, to the traditions, to the sect structure of the organization. What does it matter what becomes of the churches, if the Church remains as God's vice-gerent, the witness for Christ and the conscience of the nations? They were the spiritually dull ages of the Church that invented such a title as "defender of the Faith," and conferred it on such a licentious Christian as King Henry VIII. The Faith has never needed such defenders. It needs propagators. It carries the evidence of its truth along with it. The Church needs no protectors to-day. It needs liberators. The churches need to be liberated from sectarianism, from conventionalism, from the tyranny of inherited pride, prejudice and ignorance, and from bondage to mere idiosyncracies. They need to lose their sect-consciousness and to recover the Kingdom-of-God-consciousness of an earlier day. They need to go back to the rock from whence they were hewn, in order that they may go forward to new conquests of the waste places.

What is Church unity? In many minds it appears to be synonymous with undenominationalism. That would be an unspeakable calamity. The elimination of differences would leave nothing behind but an irreducible minimum which is infinitely less than the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Nor is Church unity the same thing as interdenominationalism or federationism, although these may squint in the right direction. Church unity cannot be manufactured. A new Body of Christ cannot be constructed by any human ingenuity. As Father Kelly says in his "Church and Religious Unity," "a living unity cannot be constructed, but it already exists in the Christianity we are trying to apprehend." Even the coming together of the churches would not constitute a brand-new Church of Christ. On the other hand the churches cannot realize or apprehend or show forth the power or the unity of the Body while they are in a state of organized schism. Unity is that condition of life under which the Body functions normally as a single living organism. It is that condition under which the churches lose themselves in the Church. It is that condition under which all the parts work in harmony with and under the direction of the whole. It is that condition under which Christians of every race can make their communion at the one altar of Christ, under circumstances, however variable, which have the sanction of the whole Church.

There are two ways of approaching the realization of unity—the way of mutual concession and the way of mutual contribution. Those bodies which are nearest akin might consolidate through mutual surrender of their differences. A similar process might then be repeated with the resultant bodies. And so on. Such initial steps would appear to be entirely practicable and would be a consummation devoutly to be wished. Ultimately they might lead to the final goal. This method of approach, however, is open to criticism. It is the way of compromise rather than comprehension. It demands concessions in an enterprise that calls for contributions. Each concession may mean the forfeiture of some spiritual value. Concessions in one direction would probably have to be followed by concessions in another. Honest convictions touching fundamental orthodoxy might soon become involved. And at the end of a series of cautious concessions a union might be reached at the expense of life and truth. In this case the resultant Church would not be worth dying for nor be able to produce saints and martyrs.

The other way of approaching the subject is the way of faith. Faith in God, loyalty to Christ, obedience to His will, a readiness to lose our churches for His sake—is not this Christ's way? It is along no highway of man's building that the answer to Christ's prayer will come. It is through no mechanical process. It is by no ecclesiastical bargaining. It will come through a venture of faith in Christ and through trust in the brethren. When Christ instituted the great sacrament of unity He required no preliminary agreement reaching out into the sphere of philosophy and metaphysics. "Take, eat," He said. "This is My Body. Do this." It was an act of faith that was required, not a full understanding; an act in which the learned and the unlearned could participate with equal affection and adoration. So with the unity of the Body. It cannot be materialized through an intellectual agreement covering a wide range of thought, but it can be realized through an act of faith in a Person and through the oblation of the will. It was religious decay whereby Christ was wounded in the house of His friends; and only the restoration of a sacrificial devotion to the Person of Christ can heal the wounds. Christlikeness, within the household of faith, if raised to a sufficiently high level, will, in itself and by itself, restore the wholeness of the Church. Christlikeness, and that alone, will envelop within the unity those principles of order and liberty that are essential to the solidarity of the Christian society. Is not this the meaning of Christ's prayer, that the visible oneness of His people will convert the world, by convincing it that such inseparability is the evidential embodiment of a common Christlikeness at its base?

These are the two methods of approach—the way of caution and the way of venture. The one takes one trembling step at a time, the other stakes everything on God. The one has been repeatedly tried and has been uniformly abortive. I do not mean that they have not been productive of good results, but that they have not reached any definite form and shape. The other has never been tried. And, after all, is not the larger plan more practicable and more hopeful than the piecemeal plan? Many a man would gladly lose his life for a great cause who would reluctantly yield a mere privilege to some hazardous half-measure.

* * * But why talk of risks, when the great Head of the Church said that he that would lose his life shall find it; and that the gates of hell could not prevail against the Church? Why talk of risks, when the only risk is that of making the grand discovery that things which men thought were contradictory are really complementary?

One does not like to quote Nietzsche much in these days, but he says some things that stir our sluggish souls. "Live dangerously," he says. Live courageously. Courage is the keen desire for life which takes the form of a challenge to death. God give the churches the faith and the courage to stake everything on Him!

The substance of it all is this: The world is groaning in pain. Vital principles are coming to the birth. A new age is dawning. That new age is to be indelibly stamped with internationalism, with a new social order and a wider ideal of brotherhood. These things are the outgrowth of Christianity. They must not be cut off from the Church. They must be housed within it. Can our chaotic Christianity preach and practise the gospel of brotherhood in Jesus Christ to a world that is beginning to dream of a universal Kingdom of God? Shall the churches lag behind the times? Will they learn to think and speak and act in terms of the whole? Will they abandon their self-consciousness and enter upon a self-forgetful adventure for the visible unity of the people of God? Will they discern the signs of the times?

DEMOCRACY AND THE CHURCH.

From an Address by Dr. James H. Dillard.

What is charity—charity as St. Paul understood the word? Charity is good will to our fellows, which is essentially both the democratic and the Christian ideal. It means that we shall have no desire to take advantage of our fellow-men. It means that we shall wish nothing for ourselves or for our family that we do not wish for all other and all other families. It means that we wish for ourselves no special privileges. It means that we do not wish to be cultured above our brothers, but with them; that what we have for ourselves we wish for all. This, it seems to me, is Christianity. We cannot conceive of Christianity as consistent with the idea of wishing in any way to get the better of our fellow-men, for our best must essentially mean the best for all. This is Christianity, this is charity.

What I have said, it would seem, is the spirit to which the Church must be committed, if she would be the Church of the people, if she would have her social work count, if she wishes her giving to have no cause to complain of the ingratitude of the poor. Giving and doing, no matter how honest and sincere, if they be in the spirit of condescension, are Pharisaism and not charity. True philanthropy is true fraternity. If the Church shall understand and sympathize with democracy, in the highest sense of that word, then will she see that all privileges and castes are unfraternal and unchristian.

The great cathedrals of the Middle Ages were more democratic than our modern pews. The Church seems to have been, then, certainly in some ways, more the Church of the people than she is to-day. We all know that the Church to-day is not the Church of the people. It has been often stated that not more than two per cent of our working men ever go inside a church. There has been much written and said as to the cause of this. Back of external manifestations there, of course, lies a cause, and that cause depends upon some inherent spirit or idea. In the relation of the Church to the industrial problem, and in her divorce from the masses of the people, I believe the trouble lies in the fact that the Church has not yet sympathized with, and absorbed as she should, the new democratic spirit which is growing in the world. This spirit, which is new and yet centuries old, is, in the process of human development, inevitable; inevitable because it is founded in the truth of human fraternity, which Jesus so clearly taught and manifested to the world.

The point is that Christianity manifests itself emphatically and entirely in good will; this is the whole gist of the matter; this is the law and the prophets—this Golden Rule of good will. Without good will one may perhaps be a Methodist, or a Unitarian, or an Episcopalian, but without good will one cannot be a Christian. In other words, genuine good will towards our fellow-men is the very essence of the Christianity of Jesus. Furthermore, this good will necessarily leads to our regarding our fellow-men as brothers, and, therefore, as those whom we would wish to have equal rights and duties with ourselves. In other words, it is the spirit not of privilege, not of condescension, not of superiority, not of caste, not of aristocracy—it is the spirit of democracy, it is the spirit of Christianity.

When we have this spirit we shall have the true social order.

RELIGIOUS WORK IN THE CANTONMENTS.

The Rev. Karl Reiland, rector of St. George's Church, New York, spent a month last fall as a representative of the Y. M. C. A. at Camp McClellan near Anniston, Ala.; and gives some of his impressions in the St. George's Magnet.

First, and all through, the basis of every interest is friendship, and friendship rests upon acquaintance. The best thing one can do to help the men (and I am now speaking as a religious worker) is to become acquainted with them and be their friend. A man who does not love men should keep away from camp and no one should attempt the religious work, whether chaplain or civilian, who is not a man's man and who has not the spirit of affection for them.

I used to start out daily visiting the Delaware section, then the Fourth New Jersey and its cavalry division, the District of Columbia, the Virginia Field Battery where I had many friends, the Richmond Blues, and then past the huge bakery and the warehouses, across to the New Jersey Engineers to the Signal Corps, the Division Headquarters, in which I knew one general under whom many a soldier is both honored and fortunate to serve, General Charles Gayer, of Baltimore, then on to the Second and Fourth Virginia Regiments, the Maryland and Delaware Infantry, the Field Hospital, the Base Hospital, visiting the civilian workmen, and the Second New Jersey Infantry.

In their leisure moments the soldiers would go to town or walk, or indulge in some form of sport, gather around the canteens and refresh themselves with simple luxuries and sooner or later drop into the "Y." The environment was singularly clean. One heard little of vice or danger from vice. The officers and the soldiers were most friendly to the Association and many of them declared that they would not know how to be contented without its presence in their midst.

I feel that a chaplain's work is seriously limited. From the soldier's point of view he is an officer. That constitutes for most men an impassable gulf. He has charge of the officers' mess, he handles the mail, and these things might far better be done by some other appointee. This is really not a chaplain's business and it takes a very large man, an unusual person, to be a real chaplain among the men and overcome the hindrances which these official relations constitute. I would much rather be a Y. M. C. A. worker in a cantonment than take any office within the gift of any other agency working among our boys. So great do I believe the Association's power for good to be, that, except for the Knights of Columbus, I do not think any other organization should be permitted to work in a cantonment except through the medium of the Association. It has shown a remarkable breadth in using men of any creed and in giving them large liberty in all questions of administration. Some complaint has been made that a minister of our Church must lay aside his priestly office if he accepts work with the Y. M. C. A. This is an unjust accusation to bring against that generous institution and I might say that if any one has felt that he had to lay aside something in working for the Association, it is likely to be the case that whatever it was, it should have been laid aside under any circumstances. I have never known more receptive throngs or more appreciative hearts than there were at camp. There is religion without saying too much about it. Isolation in a strange place, far from loved ones, and the future unknown and mysterious, is enough to make one feel the reality of spiritual and serious things. There is a hesitancy upon the part of the men with some workers to express themselves on the subject of religion. They do not wish to appear afraid or to manifest that characteristic softness which in the judgment of many of them is associated with the religious emotions, but deep down in their courageous hearts they have a profound reverence.

They love to receive letters. In the left hand pocket of their soldiers' shirts they frequently carry a bulky packet of them, which, if you know them well, is sometimes drawn out and they may show you a photograph of some family group or a kodak of some dear one of whom they think and often love to speak. I can think of no way in which your efforts can be better employed, in addition to arranging for their physical comfort, than by writing messages to as many of them as you can, through hearsay or acquaintance, contrive to reach.

On the subject of the war there is but one mind. They want peace through victory. They have no hatred, as such, for any one but only for a set of principles which they, with us, believe to be absolutely wrong and to be the damnation of all free institutions of the world. To establish the heritage of our fathers in the principles of free government for all mankind is the spirit of their determination. For that they are willing to live and fight that we may all live the better and freer, and for that they are also willing to die.

TEACHERS WANTED FOR CHINA.

Mr. Editor:

The Church's educational work in China and Japan is facing a serious situation resulting from the enactment by the United States of the Selective Conscription Law. This made it impossible last summer to send to St. John's University, Shanghai, and St. Paul's College, Tokyo, three young men who had volunteered for service as lay teachers. They were eminently qualified for the work, but were within the draft age, and consequently could not leave the country without giving the impression that they were desirous of escaping the draft, or running the risk of being called back to this country at any moment.

The difficulties caused these great institutions are further emphasized by the fact that some of the younger men now in the field are asking whether they ought not to come back to this country to enlist in the naval or military service. Lay members of the faculty of these institutions returning to this country for furlough might find it difficult to go back to the field.

Under these circumstances, Dr. Pott, of St. John's University, has asked us to find if possible at least three men who are not subject to the draft, either by reason of age or for some minor physical disability, such as slightly impaired vision. In any case, men beyond the draft age should not be older than thirty-five. They should be unmarried, college graduates, and with some teaching experience.

If any of your readers know of men who might be available for such service as this, will they send us the names and addresses, in order that further particulars may be supplied?

THE BISHOP JONES CASE.

There is one aspect of the Bishop Jones case that seems to have been, but which should not be, overlooked. Nearly every one, I think, is prepared to admit that Socialism is right in principle, and that as a world-wide movement it is destined to continue and to grow. What it lacks now, what it has lacked in the past, is capable leadership. Its followers and promoters have been, for the most part, more zealous than prudent. It is a movement, mostly, of the common people—the toilers, whose various occupations have taught them to obey rather than to command, to follow rather than to lead. In other words, it is a body without a competent head, unstable, incapable of accomplishing much good, capable of doing much evil. Such being so, what a world of opportunity is afforded, what an undoubted duty is here presented, for the Church to see and act upon! How could men like Bishop Jones, educated, refined, good and true, be better employed than in associating themselves with such an organization or undertaking, to aid, advise and control its adherents in their deliberations and various activities, which concern so much the public welfare?

Bishop Jones is for the common people. We need—the Church needs—more of him! This world war, as has been frequently declared, is one of autocracy against democracy. Democracy will win—it is bound to win! for as the venerated John Bright once aptly said, "You cannot kill the people." Rivers of blood have been and will be shed; thrones and dominations will decay and become extinct; but the people will still live. Autocracy, whether in the civil government or in the Church, is doomed!

The Great Commission

JAPAN.

Deaconess Knapp writes from Tokyo, January 21, 1918:

"We are having the coldest winter for twenty years, and coal 33 yen a ton!

"The work comes on slowly and steadily. With the educated Japanese many different Christian influences contribute toward the work of conversion. Others have labored, and we are entering into their labors.

"One doctor has asked me to prepare him for Baptism; another came to make an appointment when he might ask the questions which especially perplex him and prevent him from becoming a Christian. Another—a good Christian and a very busy physician—came and read three chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel aloud to me, just for the love of it. I interrupted just now and then when I could clear the meaning a bit for him.

"The nurses are very attractive and affectionate, although they must of necessity be irregular. They love the eight-cent size Perry pictures. The other evening I had a group with me of those who speak very little English, and we discussed two or three of the pictures. I sent them home with a copy of Hoffman's Good Shepherd for each, to pin up over their mats. When they left I said, "I shall bring over many more pictures," and they said, "Please," very eagerly.

"Miss Tsuda's girls also have learned to come to see me. They sit before my nice grate fire and tell me their doubts and perplexities. One was baptized a week ago; another is waiting for the consent of her non-Christian parents; another tells me she wants to believe, but cannot—but I am sure she can soon.

"The Red Cross is great. The head, a Jewess, and I are becoming fast friends. It seems to me the Tokyo Branch has done remarkable work this winter.

"In March Miss Saito is to go to St. Agnes', Kyoto. I have had to give her up because of the need there."

ALASKA.

Miss Eleanor J. Ridgway, missionary in charge of St. John's-in-the-Wilderness, Allakaket, Alaska, writing shortly after the new year, says:

"We have had such a very happy Christmas here. Our village was full to overflowing—165 natives in all. Every one was here from South Fork except two old native women for whom trail work is too hard. Then we had about twenty up from Hughes. Our festivities lasted for just two weeks, and now all our Konucks and many of our Koyukuks are off to their traps.

"You have seen the cabins here, so I think that you may be interested to know just how many 'stopped' in a cabin. Chief Moses' cabin, which has two rooms, had twenty-five people staying in it—that was the largest number in one cabin. Then the next largest number was seventeen in a one-room cabin. How they find room to eat and sleep I cannot see. Every one appeared happy and contented while they were here."

Notice of Change of Place for the Special Session of the House of Bishops.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 28, 1918.

Notice is hereby given that the already announced Special Session of the House of Bishops will, in accordance with the invitation of the Bishop of New York, convene in the City of New York in the Hall of new Synod House, Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Amsterdam Avenue and 110th Street, at the time designated in the former notice of January 4, viz., Wednesday morning, April 10, 1918, at 10 o'clock, instead of in the Church Missions House, as it is found that the accommodations at the latter place are not adequate for so large a meeting.

Conference on Education in Mill Villages.

The Hon. P. P. Claxton, U. S. Commissioner of Education, issues the following circular:

The progress of education in the South, the rapid development of manufacturing and especially of the spinning and weaving of cotton, the passage of the Federal Child Labor Law, and conditions arising out of the war, make it very important that special consideration be given to the educational interests of mill towns and villages in the Southern States. For the purpose of giving an opportunity for the discussion of this problem, I am inviting those most directly interested in the subject to meet me for conference at the Selwyn Hotel, Charlotte, N. C., on Friday and Saturday, March 22 and 23. This invitation is extended specially to presidents and managers of mills, State superintendents of public instruction, county superintendents of public instruction in those counties in which mills are located, supervisors and principals of mill schools and welfare workers. The conference will convene at 10 o'clock Friday, March 22, and will continue until in the afternoon of Saturday. The program and discussions will be made as practical as possible.

P. P. CLAXTON,
Commissioner.

Unity Among the Churches the Need of the Hour.

"We are dealing with the life and blood issues of the Church of today," said Dr. Robert E. Speer, Chairman of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, in his opening address before the all-day meeting of the Commission on Washington's Birthday in New York City. This Commission, which was appointed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, correlates the work of more than twenty denominational war-time commissions. The dominant note of the meeting was the plea for a united Christian church which would sink factional differences and present a solid front for action in the present crisis.

Dr. Speer reviewed the favorable and unfavorable elements in the present situation as they affected the interests of the Church. He declared that the Church in America might well congratulate itself that the nation had been led into the war with the highest motives and that public sentiment and army practice concerning social vice and the use of liquor were at such a high level. The attitude of the soldiers toward religion and the increasing co-operation between denominations were hopeful signs. Among the unfavorable elements Dr. Speer mentioned the sterilization of men's minds under military discipline, the cost and hindrance of Church division, the existing moral torpor and the consequent danger to religion and the Christian Church.

Other speakers at the morning session were Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Dr. J. Ross Stevenson and Dr. Frank Mason North. President of the Federal Council. Bishop Wilson emphasized the dangers and temptations surrounding our men on the other side where social customs differ from our own. He called attention to the fact that public accusations regarding the morality of our troops are particularly unfortunate because of the resentfulness thus produced in the minds of the men. Dr. Stevenson reported that as a whole the soldiers were receiving more adequate religious opportunities than had been the case in their civilian life. The religious work in the camps is making the greatest progress where the forces at work are most in harmony. There was no room, he said, for a sectarian divisive spirit in the camps.

In opening the discussion of the fundamental issues which the Church is facing. Dr. North declared that the Church today had not yet fully caught the significance of the present social movement. Recent events in Russia and the undercurrents of thought in other lands showed that there was a tremendous movement going on in the minds and hearts of men who are seeking to attain the rights which they feel are given to them by their very nature as sons of God. The Church must no longer sidestep a problem which it has considered chiefly in theory and without a full sense of the sacrifice which following the whole program of Jesus demands. Above all it must not lose sight of the fact that its faith was not in a system of truth or a mode of practice or a type of organization but in a Lord living and present. Dr. North added that the time had come for each denomination within the Church to consider about its own hearthstone how far the things which it had deemed its peculiar possession were really essential and whether in the new fires of the time the barriers that separate denomination from denomination might not be burned away.

Discussion centered in the afternoon about the future of the camp pastors and the distinctive program of the Church. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin presented a statement on "Christianity and Hate" and Dr. Arthur J. Brown on "Christianity and Super-Nationalism." The concluding address by Dr. William Adams Brown, Secretary of the Commission, set forth "The Way Out." After asserting the principles for which the Church stands and the need of their application to the social and international world, Dr. Brown urged that the Church first of all test herself by these principles. "Clearly, if we are to meet the issues of the new world we must meet them together. A united world requires a united Church. The repentance which we preach to others we must practice ourselves. We are moving toward Passion Week with its reminder of the cost, but above all of the triumph of love. In the weeks to come we shall be much in prayer. Let us try to make our prayer definite. As we ask God for victory of the cause to which we are committed, let us ask Him first of all that this cause be triumphant within ourselves. Confessing with shame the sins of our past, our narrow vision, our unhappy divisions, let us pray Him to make us one in His spirit, an instrument which he can use for the redemption of the world."

The Assyrian and Armenian Relief Committee, which works in co-operation with the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, issues the following appeal, which is signed by twenty-one Bishops and a number of prominent clergymen and laymen of our Church.

"The undersigned appeal for an immediate and generous response for the people living in Bible Lands. They have shed their blood as martyrs. The remnant is experiencing a need more than we of the West can possibly conceive. The President of the United States appeals for these people. The Red Cross assists them, even, generously. But all is not sufficient to stay hunger. Our own Government cannot undertake official relief. The appeal comes to us as Americans, as Christians and as Churchmen, and it should be given generous consideration at this time."

The Treasurer of this Committee is Mr. Woodbury G. Langdon, 59 East Fifty-ninth Street, New York. Mr. Paul Shimmon, Representative in this country of Mar Shimun, Patriarch of the Assyrian Church, in whose special mission this Committee is interested, writes us that it makes little difference to which Treasurer contributions go, as theirs are also reported, unless otherwise designated, to Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, Treasurer of the American Committee, at 1 Madison Avenue, New York.

Work Among the Deaf: The Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf, gave a lecture in the parish house of St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, Va., on the evening of February 8, taking as his subject the causes, principal events, objects, etc., of the war, the lecture being well received by the audience. On the following Sunday, February 10, he officiated at a celebration of the Holy Communion in the chapel of the church.

Mr. Merrill's work was hindered by the severe weather in January, but he has again resumed his travels, having visited and held services in a number of places in Virginia and West Virginia during February.

St. Faith's School, Saratoga Springs, New York, Rev. H. C. Plum, Principal, founded as a school where girls of moderate means could secure a thorough secondary education with the advantages of a Christian home, is appealing for the sum of $6,000 to erect an additional building which is imperatively needed in its work. The school has been in operation twenty-seven years. The appeal has the endorsement of Bishop Nelson, of Albany.

Notice: Religious papers having stated that Dr. W. C. Minifie, formerly pastor of the Clarendon Street Church, Boston, but now "an honorary chaplain in the British Expeditionary Force in France, is in America and is prepared to speak on the War and Welfare Work for Soldiers, the Rev. Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas writes to say on the highest official British authority "that Dr. Minifie is not and never has been a chaplain, either in the British or in the Canadian Army, and, therefore, has no right to be called "Captain," as he is sometimes termed, or to wear the khaki, as he frequently does. It need hardly be said that there is no such post as "honorary chaplain."

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Navy Yard: With palms, a profusion of Easter lilies, and a very crowded church as a setting, the rector, the Rev. David Ransom Covell, presented a class of fifty-one for confirmation by Bishop Harding.

Christ Church is at present very active in its war service, entertaining each week the seamen gunners of the Navy Yard, which is within the parish.

Another interesting and new feature in the church is the Christ Church choir fellowship, which consists at present of seventy-two boys and girls who sing at every service and who visit other boys and girls in the parish.

Seminary Notes.

Professor Bell Returns from France: The professors and students of the Seminary were delighted to welcome Professor Bell back from "somewhere in France," although they regretted that he had to return on account of his health, because his great desire was to remain as chaplain with the troops abroad until the end of the war. He looks remarkably well. He remained at the Seminary for two days, when Mrs. Bell and himself went to Palm Beach, Fla., for a period of rest before he takes up his duties at the Seminary at the beginning of the last term on March 19.

Dr. Van Kirk, who, as acting professor of Theology and Apologetics, has filled Professor Bell's place with much satisfaction to the class under him since the opening of the session, will complete his work at the end of next week, and return to his parochial duties at Darian, Conn. He has formed many friendships on the Hill and will carry with him the best wishes of all at the Seminary.

The Weekly Lenten Services are held at the Seminary on Tuesdays and Fridays of each week at 5 o'clock in the evening. During Holy Week there will be services every morning.

Service for Men of Hospital Unit: St. Paul's Church, Richmond, was crowded, as it has been only on a few occasions in its long history, on Thursday afternoon, February 28, when a special service was held for the men of Base Hospital No. 45, known as the Medical College of Virginia Base Hospital Unit, who left on the following day for Camp Lee for training before going overseas. The sermon was preached by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Bowie, who is also chaplain of the unit, and he gave an inspiring message on "Strength" to the young men with whom he will be so closely associated in the months to come. Dr. Bowie was assisted in the service by Rabbi E. N. Calisch, of Beth Ahabah Synagogue, who read the lessons, while the very large congregation joined enthusiastically in the responses and in the singing of several militant hymns.

The speaker at the Mid-day Lenten services in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, during the week of February 25 was the Rev. D. G. MacKinnon, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Newbern, N. C. On Monday Dr. MacKinnon, preaching from 1 Samuel 19:20, spoke of the power of personality for good or evil, the exaltation of moral influence, both conscious and unconscious, which might be called "preserved mortality." On Tuesday he traced the spiritual history of St. Paul and the influence which was turned into the channel of righteousness by his conversion. The topic of the sermon on Wednesday was the whole armor of God as set forth by the Apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians, which it is so needful that we have during this time of world upheaval. A contrast between man's judgment and estimate of character and God's standards of judgment was the subject of the sermon on Thursday. Friday the series was brought to a close by a sermon on the need for and the means of obtaining our spiritual food.

Missionary Addresses: Miss Helen Littell, of the Church General Hospital, Wuchang, China, made two inspiring missionary addresses in Richmond last Wednesday, one at 4 o'clock in the afternoon in St. Paul's Sunday-school room, and one at a drawing-room meeting in the home of Mrs. Thomas L. Moore in the evening. Miss Littell is one of the best missionary speakers of the Church, and it is felt that her addresses, which were enjoyed by a large number of Richmond people, have aroused a great deal of interest in the Church's missions in China.

Another interesting and inspiring missionary address was made to a large congregation in St. James' Church, Richmond, on Friday afternoon, by the Rev. W. Roy Mason, who spoke of the needs and promise of the large group of mountain missions in Greene County, of which he is rector.

The Rev. A. Stuart Gibson, rector of St. Thomas' Church, Windsor, N. C., has been called to Dettingen Parish, Manassas, Va.

The Rev. Frank Page, D. D., rector of Zion Church, Fairfax, who has been ill with pneumonia, is reported as improving.

Christ Church, Norfolk: During Lent week-day services are being conducted every day at Christ Church, including a celebration of the Holy Communion, Morning and Evening Prayer, and on Tuesdays an organ recital at 8 P. M. A Quiet Day for the women of the parish will be conducted on Tuesday, March 12, by the Rev. Dr. Floyd Tomkins, of Philadelphia. In addition to the regular services held in the church, the rector, the Rev. Francis C. Steinmetz, S. T. D., the Rev. Albert C. Head, curate, and the Rev. John E. Wales, assistant minister, are giving frequent addresses at the military camps near the city.

Under the direction of Christ Church Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, mid-day Lenten services for business people are being conducted at the American Theatre.

The Rev. Thomas Howell, in addition to Emmanuel, Madison Heights and Trinity, Boonsboro, has taken charge of the churches at Waynesboro and Basic.

Church Progress.

The Survey Committee of the Kanawha Convocation recently made the following report to the Convocation:

In Bishop Peterkin's address to the Diocesan Council in 1905, when he urged the relinquishment of all aid from the Board of Missions, he said: "At the time of the formation of the Diocese, there were two gentlemen connected with our Church than whom none in West Virginia were more prominent, or apparently likely to be better informed as to prevalent conditions. One of them wrote to warn Bishop-elect, though the warning never reached him, and I think I may safely say would not have been effectual if it had, and say that he ought by no means to regard the call of the Church in West Virginia, because he, knowing whereof he spoke, felt constrained in all fairness to say that the Church people in this new Diocese had pledged themselves all together beyond their ability, and that there was no future for the movement save that of disastrous failure. I need hardly say to you who are here today that by the good hand of our God upon us, and by the constant and cordial co-operation of an intelligent and faithful people, clerical and lay, that the Diocese has lived down that gloomy prediction. The other one of the gentlemen took an entirely different view of the situation. Looking at the whole enterprise from a broader outlook, and with a more hopeful spirit, he pledged himself to make up such deficiency in the financial resources of the Diocese as seemed to some so inevitable, as effectually to block the way of advance. But as he himself informed me several years ago, he has never been called upon to make good his pledge. The Diocese has promptly and fully met all its obligations, and I may add that today, although these obligations have more than doubled since my consecration, twenty-seven years ago, the Diocese still meets them promptly and fully. Might not this be taken as a good illustration of what Bishop Coleridge Patteson said, that education consisted in teaching people to bear responsibilities, and in putting those responsibilities upon them as they could bear them."

The Council adopted Bishop Peterkin's suggestion, and in doing so, as in all other matters involving his sound judgment, the Diocese has had abundant cause to be thankful. From its formation the Diocese had received help from the Board of Missions, and in September, 1905, gave up the last appropriation of $1,450. In giving up the appropriation of $1,450 the Diocese did not ask for a reduction of the apportionment placed upon it by the Board of Missions, and has never asked for it since.

In addition to this, it has never failed to overpay its apportionment. The Diocese, by assuming the responsibility for its own Church extension, and by continuing to bear its full share in the work of the General Church, has developed the true missionary spirit, and the Church in the Diocese has grown very rapidly. In a recent survey of the Diocese two country churches, in a distinctly missionary field, not to mention others with a wonderfully fine record for giving to missions, contributed for Diocesan Missions $6.92 and $5.91 per capita, for General Missions $4.71 and $2.20 per capita, and not a single wealthy person in the missions.

In the Eastern Convocation, where the Church has been long established, the growth has been much more rapid than in the General Church, for while the ratio of the Church in the United States is 1-99, the ratio for the Eastern Convocation is 1-69. In this same Convocation the ratio of Sunday-school scholars to children from six to fourteen years of age within its bounds is 1-22. This shows the rapid development where the Church has had the chance of standing the test of dwelling long in the land.

The only help the Diocese has received, and is receiving at the present time, is $400 for the colored work.

The Diocese during the last eleven years gained: Four clergy, 23 churches, 5 parish houses, 13 Sunday schools, 777 scholars, 1,819 communicants and $26,267.80 in contributions.

In six years the Diocese has gained eleven points in ratio of communicants to population, for in 1910 the ratio was 1-214 and in 1916 it was 1-203.

The Sheltering Arms Hospital was founded in January, 1886, by Bishop Peterkin. It was opened in July, 1888, with six beds. Thirty-three patients were treated during the first year. Today it is one of the best equipped hospitals in the State, and treated during the past year 3,055 patients.

Although the Diocese had just completed a drive to increase its Permanent Fund from $40,000 to $100,000, it did not in any way fail to do its part in the Pension Fund, as was shown in the amount given.

Not to go into a more detailed report of the varied Diocesan activities, we feel that sufficient has been given to show the remarkable growth of the Diocese, and with the sustained co-operation of all our forces, the Diocese will be prepared to take advantage of the great opportunities which are being presented.

The Rev. Jacob Brittingham, D. D., completed his twenty-ninth year as rector of St. Luke's Church, Wheeling, on Sunday, February 10. A local paper has this to say of Dr. Brittingham:

"Dr. Brittingham's pastorate has been remarkable, not alone for its longevity, but also for the good works of one of the most beloved of clergymen, and for the twenty-nine years of good will that have existed between rector and congregation.

No minister in the history of Wheeling has held deeper affection of all the people. He has been the minister of all, regardless of denomination, nestor of the ministers, respected, loved and admired by every man, woman and child in Wheeling."

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan

Archbishop of York Reaches New York.

The Archbishop of York, the first in a line of prelates of the name reaching back more than twelve hundred years to visit America, landed in New York on March 1, and at once stated that he came to cement still more closely if possible the fraternal relations of the two great English speaking nations, and to "acquire and carry back to England for England's encouragement some of the exhilaration incident to a great people entering a great cause. He had purposed to visit Washington at once and pay his respects to President Wilson, but delay in arriving caused him to forego the trip until later. During his stay he is the guest of Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, a Trinity vestryman.

On the Sunday following his arrival the Archbishop preached in St. John's Cathedral in the morning, and in Trinity Church in the afternoon. At the latter service a number of Clergy of the city were in the line, and later met the Archbishop. It is stated the Archbishop will visit most principal cities as far West as St. Louis, and will attend the special meeting of the House of Bishops in New York on April 10. One paper quoted him as saying he opposes prohibition, but that he did not speak of American conditions or campaigns on the subject. The appearance of the Archbishop is striking in that he is of commanding figure, with white hair, that at a distance gives the impression of extreme age. At close range, however, he looks no more than his years, which are not far past fifty.

The Rev. Dr. W. Montague Geer celebrated on the third Sunday in Lent his thirtieth anniversary as vicar of St. Paul's chapel, the historic structure in lower Broadway. Coming to the work in 1898, he found the down town conditions from which most rectors and vestries run away—move up town. In 1895 Dr. Geer took his first step toward solving the down town church problem. He started a Friday noon day service. It succeeded. As years went by, always carefully feeling out his plans, and following the wishes of the Trinity rectors, he inaugurated noon day services on all week days, and then duplicated them, having services at 12:05 and at 1:05, on some days the same services, or nearly the same, repeated.

Later there came to be a business women's lunch club in the parish building, and still later great musical services. Patriotic services are held on great days. A year ago on Washington's birthday, only a little preceding America's entrance into the war, the Rev. Dr. Manning preached a sermon in St. Paul's that rang with fervent patriotism and almost compelled applause, so great was the feeling. The meeting was only a sample of the splendid use that the chapel, a landmark of America, has been put to under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. Geer. On an average St. Paul's contains every day in the year, unless it be on Sundays, nearly one thousand persons, or far in excess of the parish church that is located in what are regarded as normal conditions. Nor is this all. Standing in the heart of busy down town New York, where millions pass it and see it, the venerable edifice preaches sermons in numbers almost beyond any other church in America, unless it be Trinity itself, a few blocks below.

Dr. Manning to Remain at Camp Upton Indefinitely: At the request of the officers at Camp Upton and of the War Commission of the Episcopal Church, and with the full approval of the vestry of Trinity Church, the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning will continue his work as chaplain at Camp Upton for an indefinite period.

According to the first arrangement, Dr. Manning's term of service was to end March 1st.

The Rev. Mr. Ackley Goes to Cuba: The War Commission of the Church has sent the Rev. Charles B. Ackley to Cuba to work among soldiers and sailors there, and St. Bartholomew's parish has granted him a six months' leave as vicar of its parish house. He sailed for Cuba on the last day of February. He has seen service in Cuba under Bishop Knight.

A Congregation Finds Itself.

Sunday afternoon, February 24th, an "Every Name Campaign" took place at the Chapel of the Intercession, Trinity Parish. The title of this, as well as the manner of its conduct, will be recognized as somewhat different from the now familiar "Every Member Canvass."

The Intercession is a great free church in the upper part of New York City. To it come numbers of people, and as in most free churches, it has many adherents and attendants who will hardly be willing to be counted as members, or who even perhaps desire to become members. They have, however, a very real attachment to the church. The name used was designed to be so general as to make these persons willing to be visited. While they would hardly be willing to call themselves members, most of them were perfectly willing to be called "names."

Two motives especially led to the undertaking. In the first place, the vicar did not believe in the pessimistic complaints, now so common, that because of their absorbing interest in the war, and the great charities carried on and called for by the war, vital church work and church support was of less real interest to people. He did not believe that the average American desired to rob Peter to pay Paul. He felt that if the church's interests were properly set forth at this time, and joined to the great motives of patriotism, such a campaign would succeed.

Furthermore, it seemed to him that certain of the great church organizations had pursued a blindly stupid course in attempting to continue their work and set forth their appeals as though no war was going on at all, and that some of them would have been better advised if they had been awake to the great opportunities offered to them just because of the war.

Dr. Harding, Secretary of the Second Province, was of the greatest assistance with his addresses and advice; but chiefly the preparation for the work was done entirely by the Clergy of the church. Also the method usually adopted in the "Every Member Canvass" was reversed. Instead of gradually working up to a great final inspirational service, that service was held at the very beginning. As a result of the vicar's first sermon on the first Sunday, three hundred and twenty-one campaigners volunteered, and twenty-five others volunteered to assist at the Parish House during the Sunday afternoon.

The first Sunday was called Inauguration Sunday; the second was Consecration Sunday; the third was called Acceleration Sunday; the fourth was Campaign Sunday. Meantime on two Friday nights all the campaigners had met for devotional services and practical instructions, and in the week between the two Fridays the leaders of all the districts gathered their teams and arranged the work for each.

The congregation was divided into twenty-four districts, comprising in all 6,118 names at 2,135 addresses. At the close of the brief luncheon, promptly at two o'clock three hundred and eighty-four campaigners went out in two hundred and ten teams. It was planned that the campaign should last exactly four hours, and the accuracy with which every detail of the plan had been arranged by the Executive Committee was shown by the astonishing fact that at six o'clock every single team had returned and reported in every district.

The vicar had shown the need of $7,000 additional to be pledged for the needs of the war work, missionary apportionment and parochial charities. The results of the campaign were as follows: For the work of the intercession at home, which includes charities, education and industrial work and war work, $13,950.75 was pledged. For the work of the intercession abroad, which includes missions, religious education, social service, etc., $4,573.42 was pledged. This makes a total pledged through the envelope system of $18,524.17. Last year the pledges for these purposes under the weekly envelope system amounted to $6,527.85, the percentage of increase being 184 per cent.

So far as known this is the largest canvass ever made in a single congregation, a larger number of persons having been called on by a larger number of visitors. While, of course, in wealthier congregations the sum total of increase has been larger, it is doubtful whether any percentage of increase has ever been so large as this.

Better than this increase has been the deepening of the spiritual life of the congregation. The best effects really have been upon those who volunteered to the service. They have come to a new understanding of the duties laid upon their Clergy. They have discovered within themselves hitherto unknown abilities and capabilities, and in the sermon on Sunday night when the results of the campaign were announced to a great and enthusiastic congregation, the vicar said that he felt that the "congregation had found itself." This seemed a true expression of the most blessed of the results.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Percy L. Donaghay has completed ten years as rector of St. Anne's Church, Middletown, Del. At a special service held on the evening of February 24 Bishop Kinsman preached the sermon. Mr. Donaghay and his wife were presented with a sum of money from parishioners and Presbyterian friends, with other gifts.

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. Clarence P. Parker, former rector of Christ Church, Little Rock, has accepted a call to St. John's Church, Ft. Smith.

The Rev. Arthur E. Woodward, rector of Holy Cross Church, Poplar Bluff, Mo., has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Van Buren.

The Rev. Orville M. Yerger has resigned the Church of the Good Shepherd, Forrest City, and entered upon his duties at St. John's Church, Camden, on Sunday, March 3.

A Service Flag of thirty stars was presented to Christ Church, Little Rock, by the Ladies' Aid Society of that parish on Sunday, February 24, and was dedicated by the Bishop.

NORTH TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Norman F. Marshall, rector of Emmanuel Church, San Angelo, Tex., has resigned the charge of that parish, and will return to Virginia, his native State, having accepted a call to Meherrin Parish, Emporia, Va.

Mr. Marshall came to San Angelo six and a half years ago and his ministry there has been a faithful and devoted one. He has endeared himself not only to members of his own congregation, but to the people of San Angelo generally, and great regret has been expressed at his leaving. He takes with him the kindest wishes of the entire city. He expects to enter upon his new work about the middle of March.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Patriotic Service: A rather unique service was held at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, on Sunday morning, February 24, when a gold star was placed on the Service Flag of the church, in memory of Philip Benney, a member of the congregation, who joined the Lafayette Escadrille in 1916, and was killed in action in France about two months ago. Mr. Benney was the first of the seventy young men from this parish who have gone into the service of their country to give up his life in its behalf. Patriotic hymns were sung, and a troop of twenty-six Boy Scouts belonging to the church carried the flag up the aisle to the chancel. The prayer of dedication was read by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, and Colonel S. H. Church, a friend of the lamented young man, made a short address of dedication.

Later the Rev. Dr. Brown delivered a sermon on "Immortality."

The Twenty-ninth Anniversary of the Laymen's Missionary League took place on St. Matthias' Day. The Corporate Communion in its behalf was celebrated by the Bishop of the Diocese at 8 o'clock in St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh, followed by a breakfast for the clergy, members of the league, and invited guests.

The anniversary service was held at 11 o'clock at Calvary Church, when Bishop Whitehead publicly licensed the twelve Lay Evangelists and nineteen Lay Readers engaged in the work of the league, and the sermon was preached by the rector of the church, the Rev. E. J. van Etten. The chaplain, the Rev. J. R. Wightman, presented an encouraging report of work for the year.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

St. Andrew's Church, Birmingham.

The Rev. Wilmer S. Poynor came to St. Andrew's, Birmingham, a little over two years ago, and since that time has been deeply interested in the work of his own parish, and in the general progress of the Church in the Diocese.

The beautiful new stone church had just recently been completed when Mr. Poynor came, and he found the congregation with a heavy debt to carry, and it is to be said with a great deal of credit to the St. Andrew's Guild that this debt has been very considerably reduced. Many improvements have been made in and around the church and rectory. The interior of the church has been beautifully decorated; kneeling rests have been added, the chancel enlarged, a beautiful prayer desk given and a memorial Prayer Book and Hymnal. All of the improvements have been paid for.

Subscriptions to Diocesan missions have been more than trebled during Mr. Poynor's rectorship at St. Andrew's.

During the year just passed members of the congregation contributed very liberally to St. Mark's Industrial School for colored children. More than one hundred names have been added to the communicant list by confirmation and transfers.

Mr. Poynor has recently resigned as rector of St. Andrew's and accepted a call to St. John's, Florence, S. C., and expects to begin his work there on March 17. St. John's is an important parish in the Diocese of South Carolina, numbering between four and five hundred communicants.

At Mr. Poynor's last Sunday morning service at St. Andrew's, February 24, he and Mrs. Poynor were presented with a very handsome silver tea service, and a resolution expressing the appreciation of the congregation for the services which they had rendered in the parish.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. John Hewitt, rector of St. Mark's, Coldwater, Mich., died suddenly on Tuesday, February 19, at the rectory.

Dr. Hewitt's life reads like a romance. He was the tenth father and son in the family to take up the work of ministry. He built ten churches. He placed ten men in the ministry, and had he lived to attend the next Convention it would have been the tenth

General Convention to which he had been a delegate.

During his rectorate in Coldwater Dr. Hewitt saw built one of the most commodious and convenient parish houses ever erected in a town the size of Coldwater. Mr. Hewitt had passed his three score and ten, and yet he did the work of a young man while in Coldwater, leaving the parish in better shape after three years' labor than it had been for years previous to his coming. Mr. Hewitt was beloved by all who knew him.

He was a Mason of the thirty-third degree, and at one time was Grand Prelate of the Grand Commandery in Pennsylvania. The funeral services were impressive, as the Masons, Elks and Knights Templar took part and went to the cemetery as well. All the ministers in town were there. Rich and poor, Jew and Gentile, black and white, religious and irreligious paid their respects to the much loved rector of St. Mark's. In the morning there was celebration of the Holy Eucharist, and at 2:30 P. M. the services took place in the church, the Rev. Lewis P. Franklin, of Newark, O., and the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, of Grand Rapids, officiating.

The work of Dr. Hewitt at his advanced age was a constant rebuke and rebuttal of the current idea that a clergyman has passed his time of fruitfulness because he is beyond the meridian of life.

The Archbishop Germanos of the Syrian Orthodox Church held services in Grace Church, Grand Rapids, for the Christian Syrians in the city. He is the head of the Syrian Orthodox Church in the United States.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

A "Mission of the Incarnate Life."

A new method for parochial missions, devised by the Rev. Paul B. James, of Torrington, Wyo., has been tried out with marked success in a mission in St. Luke's Church, Buffalo, Wyo., conducted by the Rev. Mr. James, assisted by the Rev. Rowland F. Philbrook, of Glenrock, and by the vicar of St. Luke's, the Rev. Samuel E. West. Twelve scenes from the life of Christ formed the basis of both instructions and sermons, each of these scenes supplying the topic of one complete service of the mission. The description of the scene and of its function in our Lord's life and teaching, with brief comment suggesting the thoughts the event might have produced in His own human consciousness or in that of one or more participants or witnesses, formed a separate "exercise" each evening, the missionary who was to read the lesson having this portion of the work assigned to him.

The following list of the scenes described, together with topics of instructions and sermons developed therefrom, will help to explain the method:

The Birth at Bethlehem, The New Birth (Baptism), "The Infant Christ in Our Hearts."

The Baptism in Jordan, Confirmation, "Vocation."

The Wilderness Temptation, The Three Notable Duties, "Temptation."

Peter's Confession and the Transfiguration, The Incarnation, "What Manner of Men Are We?"

The Cleansing of the Temple, Repentance, "Cleansing the Body of Christ and the Temple of the Holy Ghost."

The Last Supper, Holy Communion, "The Bread of Life."

The Betrayal of Our Lord, Sin, "Judas and Ourselves."

The Trial of Our Lord, The Christ and the World, "Christianity and the World."

The Crucifixion, The Atonement, "The Captain of Our Salvation."

The Great Sabbath, After Death, What? "The Communion of Saints."

The Resurrection (Sermon only).

Ascension and Pentecost, Priesthood and Sacrifice, "The Holy Catholic Church."

From the foregoing it will be seen that, in its descriptive portions, the "Mission of the Incarnate Life" employs a principle known to every one who has learned how to make a Meditation, i. e., the objective delineation of a scene; that its general method is but an extension of that of the "Three Hours" service for Good Friday to other events in our Lord's life; and that, in effect, it is a condensed presentation of the Christian Year. The events chosen for treatment, of course, admit a great deal of variation.

The advantages of the method appear to be: (a) Definite instruction in the life of Christ; (b) the linking of Christian doctrine and practice to their source in His life and teaching; (c) emphasis on the motives which produce conversion more than on conversion itself as a subjective experience; (d) dependence upon the silent preaching of Jesus Christ Himself in the hearts of the hearers, rather than upon the personal gifts of the missionary; (e) general harmony of the method with the Church's system of teaching, eliminating the usual hiatus between a parochial mission and the "follow-up" work of the parish priest when the mission is over. It is too early for more than a general summary of results from the mission at Buffalo. These, however, may be noted: (1) Increasing interest and attendance, especially of men; (2) an unusual number of resolution cards signed and returned, most of them indicating serious thought, self-examination and prayer; (3) the clearing away of much misunderstanding about the Church and the Christian religion; (4) the awakening of several "lapsed" communicants; (5) the breaking down, especially among business men, of cynical indifference to the claims of Christ and the Church; (6) the discovery of several candidates for confirmation; (7) 20 per cent. increase in regular subscriptions for the support of the parish; (8) promises secured from fourteen business men to make an "Every-Member Canvass."

There is no easy road to self-mastery. The body must be subdued, the flesh mortified, the passions crucified, the cross taken, the race run, the battle fought. Every temptation, whether gradual or sudden, must be watched against; every impediment, whether slight or serious, must be thrown aside. We are naturally proud, discontented, selfish; that higher nature, which makes men humble, sweet, self-sacrificing, does not achieve the victory without a struggle. We are naturally prone to the indulgence which makes us the slave of our lower impulses; it is only by strenuous and long-continued effort that we can ever secure over ourselves a serene and tranquil mastery.—Dr. Farrar.

Small kindnesses, small courtesies, small considerations, habitually practiced in our social intercourse, give a greater charm to the character than the display of great talent and accomplishments.—Kelty.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The editorial page of the New York Times has been babbling of late with a vociferous tempest-in-a-teapot of letters condemning a recent speech of Dr. Robert E. Speer delivered at a student Y. M. C. A. conference in New York. The writers of these letters are much agitated because Dr. Speer (who is the eminent Secretary of Missions of the Presbyterian Church) took occasion in his address to point out that America and England had not always been flawless in their conduct toward weaker peoples, and that in the prosecution of this war we must be as earnest to banish evil impulses from our own hearts as we are to conquer the iniquities of our enemies.

We did not hear that address of Dr. Speer's, but in that limitation we are no worse off than many who have written letters about it; and we venture to say that what he was aiming to emphasize was exactly what is written in the noble words of the old psalm: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

It is perfectly true that in order to win this war the people of America must gird themselves to unflinching effort in the great cause to which we have consecrated the utmost we possess; but it is equally true—and far more apt to be forgotten—that to win it truly we need that fellowship with the holy purposes of God which can only come to those who are brave enough to face their own shortcomings and in contriteness and humility to confess them in order that they may be overcome.

In accord with the increasing recognition of the acute importance of food conservation (and its vital relation, through its bearing on the outcome of the war, to the success or defeat of the ideals for which the war is waged) the Federal Food Administration is appealing anew to the churches to arouse the opinion and enlist the help of all the people.

Every State (territory and dependency) of the United States now has a Federal Food Administrator appointed by the President, and each administrator has been directed to urge every church and synagogue to designate a food committee of one or more, to keep in close touch with the Food Administrator on the constantly developing aspects in the food situation. Such committee in each church and synagogue will act as a bureau of information for the members of its organization and as a stimulus to increased activities along the conservation lines hereinafter suggested, or along any other lines that local conditions may justify.

Activities suggested:

(1) Eliminating unnecessary col-lations from all social functions.

(2) At all banquets or occasions where the serving of food is necessary, presenting conservation menus, emphasizing the three-course meal, the use of local foods, and the substitution of other foods for those which we wish to save for export.

(3) At meetings of church societies and gatherings of that nature, giving some time to consideration of food problems, as, for example:

(a) To teach conservation as a matter of self-sacrifice and to impress upon the public the first duty of feeding our soldiers and our associates in the war.

(b) To announce and explain the constantly developing program of the food administration.

(c) To discuss substitutions, desirable recipes, methods of canning and dehydrating, and the relative nutritive values of various foods.

(d) To demonstrate cooking or use of war kitchens.

(e) To give instruction as to the most practical products to raise in home war gardens; to stimulate the raising of pigs, poultry, etc.

(f) To encourage consumption of local products to relieve the transportation problem. The development of home gardens and the local consumption propaganda during 1917 saved the country from great suffering.

(4) Delivering an occasional inspirational message from the pulpit and in the Sunday-school.

(5) Checking the membership to ascertain if all families are enrolled as members of the Food Administration.

(6) Ascertaining, by periodical reports or otherwise, the actual saving in the essentials by the families in the church, and reporting same to the administrator.

(7) Urging the patronizing of those retail dealers in food, and public eating places which observe the Food Administration regulations.

(8) Encouraging the reporting of violations of the food regulations to the administrator.

A responsibility to which all forward-looking men and women may well be alert on behalf of the nation is that which is outlined by two recent reports submitted to Congress by the Federal Board of Vocational Education.

The news summary of that report says:

"Both reports urge an immediate appropriation for the training of teachers for the work and for establishing great schools near hospitals in all parts of the country. They point out that while Congress has made full plans for fighting the war, it has neglected to furnish money for the reclamation of the wounded men so that they may become not only self-supporting, but be an asset to the nation by turning back into civilian life a flood of well-trained and disciplined men who will be highly valuable in industry.

"Unless the work of training the men for new occupations or for better places in their old occupations is undertaken while the soldiers are in the hospitals or in the convalescent camps, C. A. Prosser, the director of the survey, asserts that the men will lose their will power and discipline, become morbid and indolent, and finally become perpetual wards of the government. It is expected that the exercises training the wounded for new occupations or for better places in their old occupations will develop the muscles that remain inactive through the hospital period.

"Director Prosser says that the training is one of the cures in the treatment of the war's wounded, because it will buoy up their spirits and hopes. It will demonstrate to them that they are not public burdens, and that 'after they have played the man's part in the supreme moment of history they may take up a man's job again in civilian life at wages higher than they received before they entered the army. In some cases where men are bedridden for months he suggests that the training be undertaken at the bedside. He calls all these workshops 'curative workshops.'

"In pointing out the need for the training of the disabled the reports quote the assertion that the German system is 'to make every man self-supporting, no matter how little of him may be left.' They say:

"If the war should finally end in economic exhaustion, that nation may ultimately triumph which is best able to use her men over again. It is claimed that Germany uses 85 to 90 per cent of her disabled back of the lines, and that the majority of the remaining 10 to 15 per cent are entirely self-supporting.

"Belgium, whose depletion has been the greatest, was the first nation successfully to use her men over again. Not only has the large Belgian re-education center of Port Villez been self-supporting, but it has paid back to the Belgian government the entire capital cost of installation. The men meantime have not only received forty-three centimes per day, the regular pay of the Belgian soldier, but also five to twenty centimes an hour, according to their work. In addition, surplus profits are funded for the men. Belgium before the war, was one of the most highly trained countries in Europe. Forty-three trades are taught at Port Villez under the most competent instructors. A large part of the output, material, equipment and tools made are for the Belgian Army.

"Economic necessity has made possible the results achieved in Belgium. For the other nations not so hard pressed the rehabilitation of the disabled and the strengthening of the vitality of the civil population may be an important and perhaps a determining point in their economic future.

"If this problem is handled with good ordinary business judgment, if the soldier is treated in a straightforward, manly fashion, without sentimentality or patriotic hysteria, he will find that his disability will turn out to be really a staff instead of a millstone.

"To what extent this nation will be forced to use over again her men cannot be determined. It is certain, however, that our economic future depends to a large extent upon the rehabilitation of those disabled both in war and industry. The services of the men disabled at the front are needed back of the lines and in the great task of reconstruction after the war.

"The channels of immigration are closed, and the drain on our own labor market is tremendous. The time has passed when the supply of skilled labor was as inexhaustible as our natural resources were thought to be. We can no longer afford to continue our former wasteful methods and we must conserve every vestige of labor as an economic asset."

Fourth Sunday in Lent: Judah is now in captivity. There could be no doubt about it. Moreover, the foolish optimism that even after the first captives had been carried away persisted in hopes of an early return must have given way to an appreciation of the stern realities of the situation and of the wisdom of the advice of Jeremiah to settle down and make the best of the situation, looking only for deliverance after a couple of generations. The leaders of the people must have been ready to listen, at any rate, to what Jehovah would have to reveal to them through His prophet. We have selected for the first lesson on Sunday morning that chapter in which Ezekiel points out the causes of the collapse of the Hebrew state and the reasons therefor—God's gracious purposes to be accomplished thereby. Ezekiel's object is first of all to bring about a conviction of sin, and so he divides their history from Egypt on into five periods, each marked by flagrant disobedience to the Laws of God. He would have them "loathe themselves in their own sight." But this is the dark background against which shines all the brighter the story of God's grace. For His Name's sake He had brought them out of Egypt and refused to destroy them in the wilderness and would now restore them to their native land, after they had been through a period of judgment and discipline, as a result of which they would "know Jehovah," in His righteousness and His gracious forgiveness (cf. Ex. 34:6, 7). This chapter seems to carry out the thought of the collect, that we who deserve to be punished may by God's grace be mercifully relieved, or "refreshed," and attention is called to the fact that by this selection, the experience of Israel in Egypt, used for Lent one year ago, and the experience of Judah in Exile for Lent this year, are both brought before us in one view; just as the two redemptions are on Easter day. As regards the New Testament lesson, the present scribe would make the confession that Matt. 20:17—end is an error, being parallel with the evening lesson for next Sunday and anyway inappropriate as a correlative for Ezekiel 20, some such chapter as John 8, Rom. 3, 7 or 8, or Ephesians 2 being apparently more suitable. In the evening the New Testament selection was made to give our Lord's discourse based on the feeding of the five thousand, which is gospel for the day, bringing out that He is Himself the true Bread of Life; while the first lesson is the chapter of Isaiah from which the epistle quotes, "More are the children of the desolate than of the married wife, saith the Lord"; and "their righteousness is of men." In other words, more and better goodness results from the covenant of grace than from legalism.

For week day lessons there are given in the morning the experiences of Jeremiah and of the remnant after the destruction of Jerusalem; continuation of course reading of St. Luke; working out of the Christian covenant in Romans; and Ezekiel's messages to the captives, bringing home to them their sins and at the same time bringing the comfort of God's promised mercy in the restoration.

The Charioteer.

By Amos R. Wells.

O God, take the reins of my life!
I have driven it blindly, to left and to right.

In mock of the rock, in the chasm's despite,

Where the brambles were rife,
In the blaze of the sun, and the deadliest black of the night.

O God, take the reins of my life!

For I am so weary and weak.
My hands are a-quiver and so is my heart,
And my eyes are too tired for the tear-drops to start,
And the worn horses reek
With the anguishing pull and the hot, heavy harness' smart,
While I am all weary and weak.

But Thou wilt be peace, wilt be power,
Thy hands on the reins and Thine eye on the way
Shall be wisdom to guide and controlling to stay,
And my life, in that hour,
Shall be led into leading, and rest when it comes to obey,
For Thou wilt be peace and all power.

Now, Lord, without tarrying, now!
While eyes can look up and while reason remains,
And my hand yet has strength to surrender the reins,
Ere death stamp my brow
And pour coldness and stillness through all the mad course of my veins—
Come, Lord, without tarrying, now!

I yield Thee my place, which is Thine.
Appoint me to lie on the chariot floor;
Yea, appoint me to lie at Thy feet, and no more,
While the glad axles shine,
And the happy wheels run on their course to the heavenly door—
Now Thou hast my place, which is Thine.

Family Department

Self-Examination.

Did I this morn devoutly pray
For God's assistance through the day?
And did I read His sacred word
To make my life therewith accord?
Did I for any purpose try
To hide the truth to tell a lie?
Was I obedient, humble, mild
To prove myself a Christian child?
Did I my Thought with prudence guide?
Checking ill-humor, anger, pride?
Did I my lips from aught refrain
That might my fellow-creature pain?
Did I with cheerful patience bear
The little ills we all must share?
To all my duties through the day
Did I a due attention pay?
And did I, when the day was o'er
God's watchful care again implore?
Did I this day do aught to bring Discredit on my Lord and King?
Did I by my example prove Myself a loving child of God?

Where Mary Ellen's Tulips Grew.

Eugenie du Maurier.

When May Leith came out of the little cottage where old Mrs. Powell lived, her lips were set in serious lines. There was a look of impatience on her face; both were caused by the sight of a tulip blooming in the cottage window.

"Isn't it beautiful?" Mrs. Powell had asked, when May had remarked about its beautiful red shade. "That darling little Mary Ellen Monroe brought it to me yesterday. It makes a bit of color in the room and gives me pleasant thoughts, I can't get out much, and I am usually alone, so I need cheerful things around to keep me from getting lonesome."

"It is very beautiful," May had agreed. But her unspoken thought was, "How can Mary Ellen afford to give people flowers like that at this time of the year?"

Miss Ophelia had started a club among her girls to which both May and Mary Ellen belonged. She had called it The Cheer Carriers, a very unusual name, perhaps, but the members tried to live up to the name by carrying cheer to shut-ins and other persons whose lives had few of the good things that come to many. This was the fourth pot of tulips that May had seen during her Saturday afternoon round of calls, and she resolved to speak to Mary Ellen about what she considered her extravagance. The opportunity came soon; the next morning she met Mary Ellen on her way to Sunday school; and Mary Ellen had another pot of tulips with her—great golden ones this time.

"I am taking this to Nannie Jones. You know today is her birthday. She told me once that she never did have a flower given to her, so I wanted her to have one. She will enjoy this bit of sunshine in her dreary room after her day's work is over. I'm sure I'd like a flower or two to keep me company if I had to wash some one's else clothes six days of the week as she does."

"I saw four pots of different colored tulips yesterday that you had given, Mary Ellen. And this is the fifth. You will make the rest of us 'Cheer Carriers' feel that we are doing very little, if you keep on this way," said May. "You know tulips at this cold winter time are very expensive."

Mary Ellen laughed softly.

"I would not want you girls to feel that way about it, May. The tulips cost so very little they do not amount to much."

"Why, Mary Ellen Monroe! They cost one dollar apiece. I priced them myself at Pierce's flower-shop only last week."

Something in May's tone caused Mary Ellen to look at her quickly. She suddenly understood what the trouble was. She laughed again.

"Why, May, I do believe that you think I am extravagant."

"Well, I know I cannot afford to give away as many potted plants as you seem to be doing." May's tone invited an explanation.

"Oh, you dear thing!" exclaimed Mary Ellen, laughing. "These sweet flowers of mine did not grow in any pampered florist's shop. I assure you they did not."

May only looked the more mystified.

"Now, May, don't you dare accuse me of being extravagant," Mary Ellen said playfully. "I am not so at all. I will tell you how I can afford to give these potted lovelinesses when the bleak winter winds are blowing, and the places where they ought to be blooming are covered deep with mantles of snow. I bought the bulbs at the five-and-ten-cent store for five cents apiece. I planted them out at grandma's, in her basement, in a number of unused flower-pots, and kept them near the steam heat pipes. I have gone out there several times a week so as to save grandma the trouble of attending to them. She keeps her own flower-pots there, too. You see, grandma's cellar has lovely big south and east windows. And south and east sun and light are just what tulip babies need to force them out of season. I bought a dollar's worth of bulbs. In some of my flower-pots I have put three different colored bulbs. Those have all bloomed so gayly. They are so pretty, too. And I am hoping they will give a lot of pleasure to at least fifteen people."

May was so surprised that she could not speak for some moments. "Forgive me, Mary Ellen. I did think you were extravagant," she frankly confessed. "I might have known you better than that, however. I reckon if I would use my brains as you have done, I could do some things for people that would give pleasure, and would not be extravagant either. And I intend to try. This shows me, too, exactly what Miss Ophelia told me—that I am too hasty in judging the actions of others, and that it is best to suspend judgment until I know the facts."

Wheat Exports Now All Come Out of Savings.

The Food Administration says: The Allies need from 75,000,000 to 90,000,000 bushels more American wheat. We have already exported the theoretical surplus of the last harvest over our normal consumption.

Meanwhile, the American people have saved a considerable amount, estimated from 25,000,000 to 50,000,000 bushels during the past five months, and we are exporting this saving.

We cannot and will not export more than our savings, for our own people must also be fed. The Allies have reduced the bread ration to their people sharply during the last few days, and if this lowered ration is to be maintained we must save more than hitherto.

Every grain of wheat and every ounce of flour and bread saved now is exactly that amount supplied to some man, woman and child among the Allies.

The Allies are asking if we can double our meat and pork product exports. If we cannot—or rather, if we will not—then England, France and Italy must reduce their meat and fat rations still further—and they are now almost at the point of starvation.

We have replied, says the Food Administration, that we will ask our people to save more; for we can only export what we save.

We are going to ask the millions of devoted women in this country to see that we do save more, that by saving we may be able to ship to Europe all that we save. It is the only way.

A few weeks ago the Food Administration sent a commission of six men to France, England and Italy to study food conditions in these countries, to find out the needs of our expeditionary forces, and to hold conferences with General Pershing and his staff of officers.

This commission is due to return home this week and will immediately start out on a speaking tour throughout the country to tell the people the exact conditions existing on the other side.

One of the members of the commission wrote recently: "We arrived in England December 4, were officially met at the dock and received instructions to proceed out into the country to inspect one of the training camps where women get intensive farm training in eight weeks."

"The girls come from any walk in life and from any occupation, sign on as a soldier enlists—learn to do dairying, plowing (with sturdy little tractors), seeding, planting; in fact, everything about a farm, by practical experience. After such a training they go by order to any farm where a man can be released for military duty. We have read of the women of France. The women of England are just as remarkable, and their spirit to aid the country is just as superb."

To Belgium.

Crowned With Thorns.

Thou that a brave, brief space didst keep the gate
Against the German, saving all the West
By the subjection of thy shielding breast
To the brute blows and utmost shames of Fate;
Thou that in bonds of iron dost expiate
Thy nobleness as crime! Even thus oppressed,
Is not thy spirit mystically blest,
O little Belgium, marvelously great?

Thou that hast prized the soul above the flesh,
Dost thou not, starving, eat of angels' bread?
With every sunrise crucified afresh,
Has not this guerdon for all time sufficed—
That thou shouldst wear upon thy haggard head
The awful honor of the Crown of Christ?
—Helen Gray Cone.

The Loneliest Continent.

To have made Australia more isolated than she is, the world would have had to be made bigger. She is the farthest removed from earthly happenings of any inhabited continent. Her only civilized neighbor of any size in Java, and a thousand miles of water separate the two. Japan is a little matter of 3,000 miles away; while it takes a voyage due east of 7,000 miles to reach South America, and about the same distance west to Africa.

If an Australian wished to visit London he would have to sail 12,700 miles, if he goes by way of the Panama Canal. A trip to San Francisco would mean going a quarter of the way around the earth.

So one can readily see that Australia does not have to bother about other nations playing in her back yard. It is a big country, about the size of the United States, and not very unlike it in shape. There is nothing crowded about it; each one and forty-seven-one-hundredths of a person living in Australia has a square mile to turn around in. Elbow room is not one of the things lacking.

Though it is an agricultural and stock-raising land, less than one acre in every hundred is under cultivation. The bulk of Australia's population is concentrated in the cities and towns.

It is a singular fact that so large a body of land should have remained so long undiscovered. The first inkling the rest of the world had of the existence of such a continent was in 1770 when Captain Cook landed at Botany Bay, and added a new world to the crown of England. We cannot imagine what the Columboes, the Cabots, the Vasco de Gamas and the Sir Walter Raleighs were doing all that time to have overlooked so valuable a region.

It was near the beginning of the American Revolution that Australia became known. The first settlement in the newly acquired territory was one of the indirect results of the Revolution. It came about in this way: The British wanted a home for the Loyalists or Tories who, at the close of the war, found life in the Colonies anything but a bed of roses, so it was planned to send them to Australia. But for some reason or other the project fell through. Still they were compelled to find some place for the army of undesirables which heretofore had been shipped to the Colonies at the rate of about a thousand a year, so New South Wales was made the dumping-ground; and in 1788 more than a thousand convicts, under military guard, were landed at Sydney Cove, and from that date the history of Australia began to be written.

Australia is the home of more strange types of vegetation, animals, birds and reptiles than any one spot on the globe. There are in Australia about 10,000 species of plant life that are found nowhere else. The forests are unlike any other forests of the present day; such forms as the ferns, the lily, the tulip and the honeysuckle are no longer plants for the garden, but take on the size and growth of enormous trees. Vegetation is that of a by-gone age, which in other parts of the world is found only as fossil pictures in the rocks. Many of the animal forms hark back to prehistoric times.

The great waste of waters that has surrounded the continent for so many ages shuts out all animal migrations, and the types that the world knew at the beginning still have their representatives in Australia. We have all read of the platypus, the strange quadruped that lays eggs and has the bill of a duck, the spiny anteater, the kangaroo, the Tasmanian devil, and many more that have their prototype nowhere else. There are great lizards that grow to be six feet long, and a hundred species of snakes, three-quarters of them poisonous. These are only a small part of the strange reptile life of the country.

Australia is the home of the lyrebird, the cassowary and the emu, the last two being the only living representatives of types that have forever disappeared from other parts of the world.

It seems that nature has purposely isolated this continent so as to preserve intact ancient forms of vegetable and animal life to prove the genuineness of the imprints we find in the rocks. Like the fauna and the flora, the original inhabitants bear the mark of their isolated home, and are but a modern replica of the man of the later stone age.

In Australia the term "native" is applied to the whites born there, and "aborigine" to the original black inhabitants. The great antiquity of the race is attested by the fact that stone hatchets are found embedded in peat under deposits of marine clay fifteen feet below sea level. The people of Australia are not only white, but are intensely British, glorifying in all the achievements of their race, and always ready to stand up for the mother country.—Wellspring.

A Mother's Memories.

A mother sat in her nursery one Sunday evening over twenty years ago. A beloved baby son was on her lap, one of the many who have now laid down their young lives in this awful war. Her heart was grieved, for in the opposite corner two other little sons were fighting hard with one another. She had often separated them before, but this time she felt it best that experience should teach them the misery of quarreling. She turned her back on them, but her ears were listening and her heart was aching. Presently they cried out simultaneously: "Oh, mother, you don't care at all that we're fighting and hurting each other; do come and stop us, for we can't stop ourselves." With what joy the mother heard that bitter cry, and rose and hastened to her little sons. She told them how her heart had ached to hear the blows they had dealt each other, and at her coming the fight ended. That mother did not know which little boy began the fight.

In this awful war we know but too well on which nation lies the burden of this guilt. Oh! women, we whose hearts are sorely wounded and bereft of dear ones, what are we doing to help stop the war? Our Father hears our intercession, our prayers of faith. We cannot "wrestle against flesh and blood," but we can wrestle in praying against "spiritual wickedness in high places." The spirits of evil, of greed for power, for possessions to be won by unlawful war; all, in fact, that is antagonistic to the law of love which worketh no ill to his neighbor, began this war.

Let us plead with strong crying and faith that God will put forth His mighty power and make Germany see with horror the iniquity she has wrought against a God of love and against humanity. Let us approach this work of intercession after praying first for ourselves that the Holy Spirit may cleanse our hearts from ill will and want of love. And then, while seeing Germany's sin, let us desire beyond all else that God's name may be glorified in her repentance. So shall our God help us to stop the war.—A. S. K., in The Christian.

President Wilson.

Much tried, but patient, calm, upon the bridge
The Captain stands and bids the helmsman steer
Into the heart of such a storm as none
Has faced before, and in a sea all strewn
With perils on, beneath, above the waves.
The ship is filled with clamor and debate,
But he, long tossed on mountain-waves,
Has kept
His way and passed a hundred perils safe,
And now, his vision sharpened piercingly,
He sees his path. That gleam is in his eyes
Which comes to those who into darkness peer
For long, and master it, the super-sight.
The stars and compass have been questioned well:
The course is mapped. The Captain's word's gone forth.
Let us in quiet watch upon the deck.

The Legend of a Flower.

There is a beautiful legend that long ago, when Nature's great loom had ceased its spinning and the flowers blossomed, each one was assigned by the Creator its place to live and grow. Bands of buttercups trooped in yellow waves to the meadows, the silent lily's pallid cheek was pressed close to the heaving breast of the water. Everywhere bright-winged flowers took up their stations on the waiting earth—everywhere except on the lonely hills. Then He who named their places asked softly, "Who will be content to dwell in these barren spots?" A shy, unheeded blossom answered, "Where'er Thou sendest me I will abide." Then said the Creator: "Thy race shall be forever blessed, because thou art content with a lowly place." And still on the tiny, coral-tinted flower that blessing abides. Every spring many people eagerly search the hillsides for the fragrant blossoms of the humble little trailing arbutus.—Selected.

A minister was praying at the bedside of a dying woman. "Wait a moment," she said, as he started to rise from his knees. "I want to pray for you." And very tenderly she prayed, with her hand upon his head. "For ten years, ever since you became my pastor, I have offered up that prayer for you every morning and every night," she told him.

The minister went away with tears in his eyes and a strange warmth in his heart. He had known that this woman was sweet-spirited and true, but he had never guessed that he had a place in her prayers. "I wonder how many of my six hundred church members pray for me?" he asked himself. Not all of them, certainly; yet, doubtless, more of them prayed for him than he had dreamed. The thought was sweet and helpful to him.—Youth's Companion.

I used to think that God's gifts were on shelves one above the other, and that the taller we grew in Christian character the easier we should reach them. I find now that God's gifts are on shelves one beneath the other, and that it is not a question of growing taller, but of stooping lower, and that we have to go down, always down, to get His best gifts.—F. D. Meyer.

For the Young Folks

God Wants the Children.

God wants the merry, merry boys,
The noisy boys,
The funny boys,
The thoughtless boys—
God wants the boys, with all their joys.

That He as gold may make them pure,
And teach them hardness to endure;
His heroes brave He'll have them be,
Fighting for truth and purity.
God wants the boys.

God wants the merry, merry girls,
The happy girls,
The lovely girls,
The laughing girls—
God wants the girls to be His pearls.

He wants the girls to always be Gentle and kind and pure; that He May know they'll love Him every day,
And follow truth and right alway.
God wants the girls.

The Little Girl Who Played All the Time.

The Visitor and Sue Frances sat on the pleasant, shady piazza, eating cookies. Between bites they took long, straggly stitches in Lady Claire's sleeves—they thought they were making Lady Claire a dress. Since the Visitor's arrival they had played croquet and ball, go-a-visiting and school, travel and guess-what's-in-my-mind. They were really quite tired of playing.

"Who's that striped little girl 'cross there, wheeling a baby carriage, without any hat on?" inquired the Visitor.

Sue Frances took another bite, and answered: "Oh, that's the Little Girl That Never Plays. She's always wheeling or sweeping or something; she never plays."

"Never plays! Sue Frances Tre-worthy!"

"Well, honest, she never. I guess you'd pity her if you lived on the opposite side of her! It makes me ache."

The Visitor got up rather suddenly. "I guess I'll take Lady Claire to walk," she said; "she needs a constitution."

But it was not of Lady Claire's health she was thinking; she wanted to go a little nearer to the Girl Who Never Played, and see how she looked.

Across the street the baby carriage came to a stop as the Visitor approached. The Girl Who Never Played was smiling. She looked just like other little girls.

"How'd you?" she nodded.

"No, thank you; I mean I'm pretty well, thank you," murmured the Visitor, in some confusion. "You don't look a bit different," she added, honestly.

"Me? Diff'rent?" in wonder.

"I mean because you don't ever play. I s'posed you'd look—"

"Don't ever play? Me? Why, I play all the time!"

"Oh!" stammered the Visitor. "Oh, I hope you'll pardon me! I thought Sue Frances said you swept and—and worked."

"Why, I do; but I play all the time I'm doing it. I always take the baby out like this. What do you suppose I play then? I was playing it when you came across the street. You can't ever guess, so I'll tell you. I was playing bodyguard."

The Visitor's eyes opened wide.

"Yes," laughed the other, "I'm the bodyguard, you know. The baby's the Czar, and he can't get out alone for fear of being bombed and things. I have to stay right with him every minute to bodyguard him. Then when I feed him I have to taste everything first to be sure it won't poison him—that's the way they do with the regular Czar, you know. I take little bites and when it doesn't poison me dead I give it to the ba—the Czar. I mean. It's lots of fun to play that!"

"But—but you have to sweep a lot, don't you?" questioned the Visitor, slowly.

"Course; and then I play I'm driving out the hordes."

"The—the what?"

"Hordes—of sin, you know. My, don't I sweep 'em out like everything! I make those old hordes fly, I tell you! But they will creep back, so next day I take the broom and drive 'em out again. That play's fun, too."

The Visitor's eyes were getting very wide open, indeed. She had never "played" sweep, or bodyguard the baby. Suddenly she remembered a kind of work you could not play.

"There's washing the dishes," she said, triumphantly. And as sure as you live the other little girl nodded with glee.

"Oh, yes, that's a splendid play!" she laughed. "I play it three times a day. Shipwrecked, I call it."

"Shipwrecked!" the Visitor gasped.

"Yes; the dishes tumble into the boiling sea. Waves always are soap-sudsy on the tips, you know. I play a great ship has been wrecked, and I'm the life-saving crew saving the folks. The nice white dishes are the first-cabin passengers, and the cracked and nicked ones the second-cabin's, and the pans and pots the steerages. The saucers are the boys, and the cups the girls, and the butter plates the little babies. It's the greatest play, that is!"

The Visitor went back to Sue Frances with a thoughtful face. She had quite forgotten Lady Claire, who dangled ignominiously by one leg.

Sue Frances was playing tea party; she had tea all ready. "Well," she said, looking up from the gold-and-white teapot, "don't you pity her dreadfully, that poor little girl 'cross the way that you've been talking to? Think of never play—"

"She plays all the time," the Visitor said, quietly. "I know, 'cause she said so. She has splendid times sweeping and taking care of the baby, and—you guess what else, Sue Frances Tre-worthy! But you can't, if you keep right on guessing till the tip-end of forever. She makes a perfectly splendid play out of washing the dishes!"

The cambric-tea in the tiny gold-and-white teapot grew cold while they both sat gazing across the street with wonder-struck faces at the Little Girl Who Played All the Time, while she patiently, cheerfully wheeled the ba—the Czar, I mean—up and down in the sunshine.—Ex.

Willie's and Teddy's Sleigh-Ride.

March had "come in like a lion," roaring and blustering about and leaving the ground covered with snow.

But the sun was shining brightly and Willie was happy to go to school in such weather. Teddy, his little brother, who was four years old, was happy also until he discovered that he had lost one of his little blue Christmas mittens, and mother would not allow the little fellow to go out to play in the snow that morning without mittens on both hands. You may know that he was something of a baby because he cried when his mother said:

"No, my little son, you cannot go out of doors to play this cold morning until we find your other mitten. It must be in the house, because I saw you take them both off last night when you came in with Willie."

"Don't cry, little brother, I'll help you hunt," promised Willie, but his tones were rather cross, and he hunted for the lost mitten in a cross fashion, as if he really wished to say, "Why were you so careless, anyway? Why didn't you put both your mittens in your coat pocket?"

Mother hunted for that mitten too, and grandma and Sister Nettie; so did baby brother, but when Willie went away to school the mitten had not been found.

"And I'll be late to school if I don't hurry," said Willie, as he took his lunch-box and started. "If you're late now-days you have to stand on the floor five minutes with the whole school looking at you! It's a new rule!"

Willie must have been sorry that his tones were so cross when he spoke of being late, because, after he passed the five-acre field where he and little Teddy had played in the snow the day before, he said aloud, "I wasn't to blame because he lost his mitten!"

The boy was some distance from home when he reached in his coat pocket for his handkerchief. Out came the handkerchief and out came a little blue mit. Then Willie was seriously unhappy. He picked up the little mitten. How it came in his pocket was more than he knew, but there it was, and it meant that perhaps little Ted could not play in the snow all day; and that might be the last snow of the season.

Willie walked on slowly for a few steps, feeling more and more unhappy.

At last he stood still, then said to himself: "Well, if I have to stand on the floor, I'll stand on the floor, that is all!" And back home he ran to carry the little blue mitten to his brother.

"Oh, Willie!" exclaimed his mother, when the door opened and a blue mitten was tossed into the house. "I'm afraid you'll be late to school now, dear child."

"Well, never mind, 'long's we are all happy," answered Willie most cheerfully.

"Wait," called his father, who had just come in from the barn. "I'll hitch up and drive you to school in the cutter, Willie, and Nettie can get Teddy ready to go, too! This is probably your last chance for a sleigh-ride this year!"

"It was my fault, anyway, Willie," Nettie confessed, as she buttoned little brother's coat. "After you left, I remembered that I picked up that mitten and thought I put it in Teddy's pocket, but evidently I put it in your pocket instead. Stand still, Teddy, or I can't get this top button buttoned!"

"It's hard work to thand thtill when you're so happy," declared the little fellow.

Thus it came about that Willie went flying along to school that morning in a cutter, behind jingling sleigh-bells, and reached the schoolhouse just in time to march in with the other children when the bell rang; and Willie was happy every minute of that day!—Lutheran.

The Disappointed Snowflakes.

Four and twenty snowflakes
Came tumbling from the sky,
And said: "Let's make a snowdrift—
We can, if we but try."

So down they gently fluttered,
And lighted on the ground,
And when they were all seated,
They sadly looked around.

"We're very few, indeed," sighed they,
"And we sometimes make mistakes;
We cannot make a snowdrift
With four and twenty flakes."

Just then the sun peeped 'round a cloud,
And smiled at the array,
And the disappointed snowflakes
Melted quietly away.

Floy's Birthday Shopping.

Floy woke up in high spirits. "Tomorrow's my birthday!" she said to herself over and over, as she hurried with her little straps and buttons.

"Tomorrow is my birthday!" she said to every one at the breakfast table. It would not do to let any one forget! "Let me see, how old will you be?" asked Uncle Enoch. "One hundred and—"

"Oh, no!" laughed Floy. "Only just six." Uncle Enoch always made her laugh. And then his name was so funny, to begin with.

"Well, if you are to be six years old tomorrow," said he, his eyes twinkling, "I guess I shall have to put up some decorations. You must help me to find several thousand needles—"

"O, uncle! The shops won't have so many!"

"You and I will go shopping after breakfast, Floy. I want a special kind of needles, in packets of two, three and five. I'm very particular about my needles, you see."

Floy was puzzled, but she knew she was in for a good time, and a pleasant walk, anyway.

"But this isn't the way to the stores, Uncle!" she exclaimed, as they started off, half an hour later. She tried to pull him around, but he kept right on, towards the woods.

"It's the way to my stores," said he. "Ah, here's the first shopkeeper. How do you do, ma'am? Have you any needles for me today?"

The little girl stared. Her uncle was talking to a pine tree!

"Hark!" he continued. "Hear her whisper? Pines are very well-bred. They hardly ever raise their voices. She says she has plenty of needles, in packets of five. Her name is Miss White Pine. Let's look at her stock."

Sure enough, all the green, glistening little leaves, or "needles," were in bunches of just five—never one more or less. Floy had not known that before.

"And she says we can have them for nothing, Floy, because it's for your Sixth Birthday!"

Uncle Enoch cut off a dozen or more beautiful twigs, and moved on, over what he called a fine "needle-work carpet" of brown leaves.

"Here's Mr. Pitch Pine," said he presently. "He's a little rougher, you see, than his sister. Have you any needles in packets of three, sir!"

He pretended to listen, Floy entering into the fun.

"He says his needles are all in packets of three, and we can help ourselves, for your Birthday. I wonder how he knew!"

Once more they stopped beneath a tall, grand tree with reddish bark and drooping branches. This, Uncle Enoch explained, was Sir Norway Pine; and his long, shining needles, which he willingly gave, came in packages of two each, without ever a mistake.

The two "shoppers" returned home with great, fragrant armfuls of pine boughs; and such a good time they had, decorating the dining-room!—Willis Boyd Allen, in Christian Intelligencer.

Stingy Jim.

Jimmy was the stingiest boy you ever knew. He couldn't bear to give away a penny nor a bite of an apple nor a crumb of candy. He couldn't bear to lend his sled, or his hoop, or his skates. All his friends were sorry he was so stingy, and talked to him about it; but he couldn't see any reason why he should give away what he wanted himself.

"If I didn't want it," he said, "perhaps I would give it away; but why should I give it away when I want it myself?"

"Because it is nice to be generous," said his mother, "and think about the happiness of other people. It makes you feel happier and better yourself. If you give your hoop to little ragged Johnny, who never had one in his life, you will feel a thousand times better watching his enjoyment of it than if you had kept it yourself."

"Well," said Jimmy, "I'll try it."

The hoop was sent off. "How soon shall I feel better?" he asked by and by. "I don't feel as well as I did when I had the hoop. Are you sure I shall feel better?"

"Certainly," answered his mother, "but if you should keep on giving something away you would feel better all the sooner."

Then he gave away his kite, and thought he did not feel quite so well as before. He gave away his sixpence that he meant to spend for taffy. Then he said:

"I don't like this giving away things; it doesn't agree with me. I don't feel better. I like being stingy better."

Just then ragged Johnny ran up the street bowling the hoop, looking proud as a prince, and asking all the boys to take a turn. Jimmy began to smile as he watched him, and said:

"You might give Johnny my old overcoat; he's littler than I am, and he doesn't seem to have one. I think—I guess—I know I'm beginning to feel so much better. I'm glad I gave Johnny my hoop. I'll give away something else." And Jimmy has been feeling better ever since.—Selected.

The Sending Out of Helpers.

Did you ever see a field of ripened grain? It is one of the most beautiful sights in the world, but unless it is harvested at the right time the seeds will fall back upon the ground and be lost.

Jesus looked out upon the people around Him and thought how much they were like the ripened wheat. God had given each of them the gift of eternal life, and the power to do good things for others. They were ready to listen to Him, but unless there was some one to tell them the glad news which He had come to bring they would be like the un-reaped grain.

It would not be possible for Him to reach every one Himself, so first of all, as you remember, He sent out twelve men to work in this great harvest field. These men were called Apostles. They were not rich, nor very wise; but they loved Jesus and were able to tell others about Him so that they might follow Him and be Christians.

Out of the little company thus gathered He chose seventy and sent them out in the same manner. Two by two they went out into every tiny place and city where He would go Himself, if He stayed upon earth. They were to cure sick minds as well as sick bodies. They were to tell the people not to believe in idols, but to believe in the loving heavenly Father and Jesus Christ His Son, and to pray earnestly for more helpers.

In after years the first company of Apostles died, but before they died other helpers were chosen to carry on their work. The Apostles laid their hands upon them and through the power of the Holy Spirit they were able to do the great work the Lord had given them. One group followed another all through the long centuries, and so the Church came down to our own time. The successors of the Apostles are the bishops.

Before Jesus ascended into heaven He said to His Apostles, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." He did not want a single tiny grain of that precious harvest to be lost.

So the Church still sends out bishops and missionaries. Some of them work in our own country. Others go to distant lands, to China, Japan, and even to far-away Africa. They brave all sorts of dangers, even death itself.

Today is the First Sunday in Lent and during these coming forty days we are going to try hard to fill our mite boxes and to say each day the little prayer for missions, so that little children everywhere may hear about Jesus. —Shepherd's Arms.

A Hungry Boy.

A know a funny little boy
Who ate a Teddy bear—
The whole of it—and did not give
To any one a share.

You think perhaps this made him sick,
So that he stayed in bed.

O no, because this Teddy bear
Was made of gingerbread!

—Clara J. Denton, in Jewels.

Failure.

As some great bird
Whose hurt wing answers not her will,
Still beats the air in useless striving,
And dying—with strong talons holding yet

Her hard-won prey,
While with wide hungry beaks, her far-off young

Wait, vainly calling:

Or a spent swimmer
Breasting angry waves to save a life,
With dying eyes fixt on the rescuing boat,

And knowing it is all too late,
Makes still his strokes, grown feebler
With each laboring breath—yields not
The life he gives his own to save:

This is not failure.
Nor bird, nor swimmer gives up purpose.

Long, long centuries
Agone, One walked the earth, His life
A seeming failure;
Dying, He gave the world a gift
That will outlast eternities.

Thrift Made Easy

Perhaps at some time in the past you have tried to save money but it proved a little difficult and you gave it up.

Do not, however, despair. There is an easy way.

To start Thrift but three things are needed:

1. A Savings Account in this reliable institution.
2. A determination to save so much each week or month.
3. Careful management in little things.

Those who practice Thrift naturally save money; in fact, it saves itself!

RESOLUTIONS OF SYMPATHY AND LOVE.

Whereas, our heavenly Father has called unto Himself our dear friend and teacher, MISS HALLIE L. MEADE; therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, the members of the Alumnae Association of the Piedmont Female Institute, recognize that in her death we, as well as the community and the church of which she was so long a devoted member and faithful worker, have sustained a great loss. But it was in the home that she was at her best.

Through her illness, which dated back several years, she was great in gentleness, gentle in power, rich in self-giving, pouring life and love into each hour, and it may be truly said of her that "They most truly like their Master grow, who follow Him by suffering here below."

Be it further resolved, That we extend to her bereaved family, and especially to her devoted sisters, our teachers of other days, the assurance of a boundless sympathy from their former pupils, now scattered North, South, East and West, forming, as it were, an endless chain of love and sympathy that would shield them and comfort them now in this their hour of sorrow.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of Miss Hallie L. Meade, and that the same be published in the "Daily Progress" of Charlottesville, and in the "Southern Workman."

Averill, who also preached the sermon. Dr. Richardson, who was formerly a Congregationalist minister, will remain in charge of Trinity Church, Peru, until his advancement to the priesthood.

In All Saints' Cathedral, Milwaukee, Wis., on Sunday morning, February 24, the Rev. William Dawson was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of Milwaukee. The candidate was presented by Dean Lathrop, who also preached the sermon. Mr. Dawson will engage in missionary work in the Diocese.

In St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, Va., on Sunday, February 24, the Rev. John Lloyd, a son of the Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., who is a private in Ambulance Company No. 33, was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Robert A. Gibson, D. D. Mr. Lloyd was presented by the rector of St. Andrew's, the Rev. J. F. Ribble, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. P. Dandridge, rector of St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, Va.

An Uncomfortable Task Master.

Conscience is not made more quiet by plunging into infidelity. Pagan history tells of terrible cruelty which men have inflicted upon themselves to sooth that accusing monitor. Even those who have abused conscience until it has become dumb have a conviction that their peace is only temporary, that in some way and at some time the conscience will awake and turn their lives into a hell. An apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ is the only sure way to take the sting out of conscience. A dose of opiate does not correct the condition which causes pain, and infidelity or skepticism, at the best, is only a dose of opiate.

It may sound very fine to be able to say, "I am my own master, and do not take orders from anybody." But self can never be counted an easy or comfortable master. Self is never a single simple will, but a company of selfish antagonistic factors, like the contending parties which are trying to get control of Russia. Any advantage which one element gains is sure to stir up a snarling protest from the others, like a menagerie of animals when only one is fed. Self rule is always a reign of anarchy, with one strong element in control until another has gained enough support to attempt a revolution. The service of many such unreasonable masters is surely less desirable than the service of one good Master, who will help to bring all these contending factors into subjection and restore peace and harmony.

Many who have made the test will bear witness that the Christian inheritance is the richest and fullest into which men can enter, and to exchange it for anything else is to substitute brass for gold and glass beads for diamonds.—Selected.

spirit incline me to seek things that endure. I shall be tempted today; I may draw to the verge of some awful mistake, in the swift moment when I cannot withdraw to my closet of prayer—give me to know the right, and the power to do it. Let not trifles ruffle my temper, nor disappointment unman me; let not exacting duties make me selfish and churlish; give me rather a sunshiny face, a forthright hand, and the joy of a word fitly spoken to some timid discouraged soul. Strength for the day's service give me in such measure as Thou wilt; pass by my sins of omission; and when the shadows fall, bring me again unsullied by word or deed to sweet, refreshing sleep. For Christ's sake. Amen.—Michigan Churchman.

"Mother—She Died After I Left."

It wasn't a cheerful sort of night. In fact, it was as cold as the Belgian hearthstones, and as black as gloom of defeat. And rain like the tears of all the world over the war beat down upon the draft cantonment field at Camp Lee, Petersburg, Virginia.

Yet suddenly, out of the depths of a trench just ahead, came a rollicking bit of song.

"Oh, we'll hang the dirty kaiser to a sour apple tree!" it announced, to the tune of "Mine Eyes Hath Seen the Glory of the Coming of the Lord." And the secretary, taking a short cut back to his own building, paused to admire the valiant spirit of a man who could sing in a trench on such a night.

"Oh, we'll hang—" began the lusty voice again, then died away in the midst of a word. The singer seemed to have arrived at the tardy realization that it wasn't a balmy summer night. He began to wet-blankety-blank the rain and the mud and the wind and the weather with precision and pungency. The Secretary had never heard a man swear with more fluency and range.

"Cheer up!" he called with a laugh in his voice. "That was hot enough to dry up the mud."

"Halt!" came the sharp command. "Who goes there?" There was an interval during which he established the Y. M. C. A. man's identity by means of a flashlight. "Pass, friend!" he said with a grin. "If you Y. M. C. A. guys always get by as easy as you do in this camp, you should worry!"

He leaned his gun against the side of the trench, and looked up at the Secretary, with a confidential air. He was hardly more than a youngster, with little laugh-crinkles around his brown eyes, and a devil-may-care swagger that he seemed to consider an essential part of the army uniform.

"There ain't no use at all o' puttin' me here on guard," he said, dolefully. "The only two livin' bein's I ever met here was a Y. M. C. A. man and a cow." "I heard your voice as I came over the hill," said the Secretary. "At first, I didn't gather that you were just addressing the weather—I thought you had some one here with you."

"I did have a guy here," grinned the soldier, as he looked down at his feet, half lost in the mud. "But I'm standin' on his shoulders!"

The Association man chuckled.

"You certainly have a soft job tonight," he suggested.

"I ain't in right with the officers," explained the boy with a grin. "I sassed one of them, and since then I been as popular as a mouse at a meetin' of the Ladies' Aid."

They talked for a while, and the Association man found out that his picturesque companion of the darkness had run away from his Pennsylvania home when he was fifteen, and since then had turned his hand to about everything from cow-punching to professional baseball.

"Folks both living?" asked the Secretary.

There was a pause. Then the young soldier spoke in a different tone.

"Dad is, and my sister," he said. "Mother—she died, after I left." There was another little silence. "It always makes me feel like the devil when I think o' my mother. I guess my runnin' away just about killed her." He tramped up and down a few times, jamming his gun viciously into the dirt walls of the trench. "I never would do a thing she wanted me to when I was a kid," he burst out at last.

"The next best thing is to please her now," said the Secretary gently.

"She won't know it now," was the sombre answer. "Oh, I forgot. You're one of them guys that believe you're livin' when you're dead. But I never been much on religion."

The Secretary, who had been a prominent minister before the war, was a wise man; he did not speak much of religion, but led the young soldier on to talk of his mother.

"She was great on church," said the boy, miserably at last. "I'd—I'd like to be the kind of a guy she'd want. You sure think she knows?"

"Sure," said the Y. M. C. A. man.

"A fellow'd like to think that when he's goin' away to fight," the boy admitted. "But I ain't been nothin' but a bum. I couldn't be the sort of church Johnnie she'd like."

"You can start over again, and take Jesus Christ as your Saviour and leader, and you'll come out all right," the Secretary assured him.

"That Jesus Christ fellow ain't botherin' with a cussin', fightin' son-of-a-gun like I am," wistfully.

"That's just the kind He is botherin' about," the Association man declared. All was silent in the trench for a time.

"And you think He can help a guy along, fightin' the booze, and the cussin' and all?" he demanded. "You think He can turn me into the kind of a guy my mother'd want?"

"Just trust Him and ask Him for help."

"Pal, I'm on," said the boy, after a moment, and the two reached for each other's hands in the darkness.

"You're sure she knows?" begged the young soldier.

"I'm sure!"

And there in the trench the rain fell upon two bowed heads, as they lifted their hearts in a prayer of thanksgiving and appeal.—Elias Rutherford, in Association Men.

Many a Christian who thinks he is not growing at all may be growing in the most important sense of the word. He that is growing more acquainted with the weakness and the sinfulness and the waywardness of his own heart is no doubt thinking that he is going back, but he may be really making preparation for going forward in the noblest sense of that word. We may be growing downward in lowly humility, not less important in its place than growing upward in conformity to the Lord Jesus Christ.—John Cumming.

FOOT TROUBLES.

No Need of Them, Says Brooklyn Man, Who Has Evidently Solved a Big Problem.

According to the testimony of hundreds of people living in the southland and elsewhere, E. P. Simon, of 1589 Broadway, Brooklyn, N. Y., has successfully developed a system of shoe building having for its prime object the conquering of foot and shoe troubles. It appears that Mr. Simon's establishment has become national headquarters for people whose feet require his remarkable comfort shoe, known as the EzWear, but obtainable only of the inventor. Mr. Simon's new catalogue shows several hundred shoes that combine comfort with style at amazingly low prices and is now ready for free distribution.—Adv.

Many Christians in looking upon Christians in other communions are like a man traveling in foggy weather. Those at a distance on every side appear to be wrapped in the fog, while near him the atmosphere appears clear, although he is as much in the fog as any that he sees around him. The most difficult task in our approach to Christian unity is the discovery of our own errors.—Christian Union Quarterly.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"God reads our characters in our prayers."

A good church service always begins at home.

He who makes light of his sin makes light of his Saviour.—C. H. G.

It is hard to find a poorer man than the rich man who never gives.—Ex.

The difference between men is not that one is inspired and another is not, but that one yields to the Spirit, another does not.—Selected.

The Christian must remember that the soul above all else is to be kept clean. Sin stains the soul before it touches the mind or the body.—Floyd W. Tomkins.

Turn to the Helper, unto Whom thou art
More near and dear than to thy mother's heart.

—Miller.

Ruminating upon trouble is bitter work. Children fill their mouths with bitterness when they rebelliously chew the pill which they ought obediently to have taken at once.—Spurgeon.

I believe no love, no life ever goes from us. It goes, as He went, that it may come again, deeper and closer and purer to be with us always, even to the end of the world.—Geo. MacDonald.

"I want you to make your ideals higher and higher. Then, when you have gained one height, you will find that what you took for the summit from the plain was not really so: there were further peaks beyond."

There are in every life drawbacks and discouragements, for we live by faith and not by sight, and faith must be perfected in the midst of perplexities and contradictions. The mists are useful. Steering towards our port in the fog means trusting the Pilot.—Forbes Robinson.

A sea before
The throne is spread: its pure still glass
Pictures all earth scenes as they pass:
We on its shore
Share in the bosom of our rest,
God's knowledge and are blest.

—J. H. Newman.

There are many who at least profess that they have no confidence whatever in human nature. They are making an unconscious but awful self-revelation in this profession. The healthy minded man looks for that which is good and rejoices to welcome and to applaud it wherever it is found.

Millet, the great painter, taught that it was the business of art "to make use of the trivial to express the sublime." It is certainly the duty and privilege of the saint so to handle the trivial as to express the sublime doctrines and principles of his holy faith.—W. L. Watkinson.

Why should we seek for that which is not here, but beyond. A haven beckons; a finger points to an end of pain and weariness. But the struggle here fits us for that which is to be. So let us be content to be unsatisfied with this and that, and ask for more, and ever more, of the life that is peace in Him. "Thou madest me for Thyself, and my heart is restless until it find rest in Thee." And so, one by one, we creep silently to rest and peace.—Selected.

To proclaim the Spirit of Truth—that the Spirit is verily with us and striving with us, cultivating all the faculties He has conferred, bringing us to repentance, seeking to mould us after God's image, seeking to make us helpers and not destroyers of each other—this is the work that is left to the Church, this is the one hope for the age.—Maurice.

There are few congregations less ideal perhaps than that in which Jesus worshipped in Nazareth, and few sermons less perfect than those He listened to. But in that little synagogue He felt Himself made one with all the piety in the land; as the Scripture was read the great and good of former ages thronged around Him; nay, heaven itself was in that narrow place for Him.—Stalker.

Happiness is an utter illusion, save when we are seeking it by making others happy. And the supreme gift of happiness to others is to bring them the very best that life has revealed. When we can say, "The Master is here," we have communicated to the sorrows and disappointments of men a new principle of energy, and human conduct is no longer vain. It is a refreshing and renewing life.—A. Connell.

No Church now mourns an absent Lord. When faith looks for Him it sees Him. When love yearns for Him it feels Him near. Only when these are feeble do we seem to be forsaken and alone. We have then one friend to whose memory no tablet will ever be erected, and no tear shed; for the strong arm will never cease to hold us securely, and the loving heart will not fail to keep alive our affection with the fire of its abiding love.—H. B. Robinson.

Not All There.

A friend of the writer's some time ago got out of a train late at night at a country station in England. There was no carriage, but a porter volunteered to carry my friend's bag. The porter, during the walk, told all about himself, how he was twenty-five years of age, always enjoyed good health, had a good education, and was ambitious of getting on in the world. My friend asked him if he were a religious man; if he ever said a prayer. When the porter had answered both questions in the negative, my friend remarked: "It seems to me that you are not all there," meaning that the man had neglected to cultivate one part, and that the highest part of his nature was wanting, and by no means complete. To make this more clear my friend continued: "Do you ever meet a case like this: You have put into a truck many heavy pieces of baggage, and have gone out of your way to select a comfortable carriage for its owner, and into this the man or woman has got without giving you a tip or a word of thanks?" "There are plenty of cases like that," replied the porter. "Well," said my friend, "I know a man who has enjoyed health and strength and many other of the greatest blessings of life for twenty-five years, but who never speaks of, much less thanks, the Giver of them all." "You have me there," said the porter.—Canadian Churchman.

The atmosphere of hope is the purest and the clearest that we have, through which to see the things that really are, as well as all we long for and ought to be. The opposite of hope in our day is not doubt, is not even despair; it is cynicism. It is the atmosphere which distorts, obscures, makes grotesque rather than pitiful this earthly lot of ours. Now, cynicism is the poisoner of human hearts; it is the sworn foe of progress; it is the death of sincerity; it is the enemy of mankind. Cynicism traduces the lives of heroes, dishonors the common moralities of life, imputes base motives to the worthiest, reduces to paltriness the noblest dreams, will dare to shadow even the innocence of childhood. I denounce it as a denier of Christ and set over against it the invincible gospel of hope. What good in life, what grace in God, can any man expect, to see through an atmosphere so murky and so deadly? An atmosphere of cynicism distorts the good which it cannot destroy. An atmosphere of hope will reveal, make beautiful, and save all good. Up to the mountains, then, and let the love that hopeth all things into your heart.—A. Connell.

Tonight.

For all who watch tonight—by land or sea or air—
O Father, may they know that Thou art with them even there.

For all who weep tonight, the hearts that cannot rest,
Reveal Thy love, that wondrous love which gave for us Thy best.

For all who wake tonight, love's tender watch to keep,
Watcher Divine, Thyself draw nigh, Thou who dost never sleep.

For all who fear tonight, whate'er the dread may be,
We ask for them the perfect peace of hearts that rest in Thee.

Our own belov'd tonight, O Father, keep, and where
Our love and succor cannot reach, now bless them through our prayer.

And all who pray tonight, Thy wrestling hosts, O Lord,
Make weakness strong, let them prevail according to Thy Word.
—Canadian Churchman.

College Students and World Service.

College students of the United States are reduced in numbers by nearly a third because of the war, and yet for the same reason young men and women who are attending this year are aroused as never before, it is said, to prepare for world Christian service. President Burton, of the University of Minnesota, to bring forward one instance, is leading the instructors, and more than four hundred students are enrolled. Harvard, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Iowa are nearly up to the Minnesota standard. It has been found necessary to raise up instructors and leaders, so many of those who once served as such having gone to war. Those American students, aiming at an enrollment of 200,000, boldly proclaim it to be one of their purposes to increase the number of Christian men and women to go abroad to serve the world by compelling the Missions Boards to raise more funds and commission larger numbers. It is found that since January 1 this year the war has greatly depleted the college students, especially of the Middle West.

This movement, inaugurated at a conference held at the very opening of this year, aims to get as many students in American colleges as possible to study their world obligation, and to prepare themselves to go to the ends of the earth and teach democracy and Christianity. The work of getting young men and women into the study classes has now been pushed for four weeks, and in one college, that of Kansas, 50 per cent. of the students are enrolled. In Mt. Holyoke it is reported that practically the entire student body is in the classes. Some time since, to pay expenses, students themselves subscribed almost $1,500. About 800 secondary schools and colleges are taking some part, and about 350,000 young people are in some measure interested. Practically all of the agencies of all the churches are behind the plan.

STUART HALL, Staunton, Va.

One of the unique phases of Christ's teaching is this: He speaks to the great questions of human life. What are the relations between God and men? Is God a Father, and is man God's child? How may a soul be cleansed from the guilt and power of sin? What are the grounds of justice and goodwill between individuals and nations. What is the mission of pain? What is true joy? What is real peace? What is man's destiny in the realms beyond? These are some of our human problems which can never grow old. And Jesus has spoken to them once and forever.—F. F. Shannon.

The Cross of Christ Is the Only Solution of the Crisis of the World.

The very first meaning of the cross is the condemnation of man's sin. It is love pointing out, witnessing to, and condemning sin, as rebellion against God which can only issue in death. The fundamental thing in the present crisis is sin—setting up our wills, our self-manufactured hopes and ambitions, against the will, the purpose and the love of God. The cross makes all this clear.

In condemning sin the cross calls to repentance. To repent is fundamentally to think again, to think straight, to correct our vision, so as to understand the will and purpose of God. Right thinking brings the next step—penitence—sorrow for past failure to think straight, to see clear and to act right. But it cannot stop there if it is real. Its final issue must be amendment—beginning to act on the readjusted thought, according to the newly seen will of God, fulfilling the newly grasped purpose of God. That is the first step in the cross's solution of the crisis. It makes clear and condemns our sin. It challenges us to truer thinking and higher acting.

Love which condemned sin died to save sinners. Self is the root of all sin. Selflessness is the beginning of all salvation. It is God's way. He followed it Himself. By following it He made atonement for man's sin. The cross is the everlasting witness to that truth. It is the everlasting justification of every sacrifice men have ever made, are making today, or will make in the future. In the present crisis it is the cross that gives meaning and dignity, worth and power, to the sacrifices we are making in the front line trenches and in the homes throughout the land. It is the cross that heartens us for them, and lifts them out of the mire of meaningless pain into the light and love of God's own will to sacrifice.

Christ dared death and won life. The resurrection followed the crucifixion. The way of the cross led over the Mountain of Death straight into the Garden of Life. So it does still. In His victory is our victory. The present crisis is our cross. It shall be the way to more abundant life for us, if in our crisis we are crucified with Christ. We are in the world war with Christian motives. As Christians we must be prepared for the uttermost of sacrifice. If our sacrifice is made in the name of the crucified, and out of love for Him, we shall be victorious over our enemies, and shall find that it is the victory of Christ.

It has been suggested that Christians of all names keep (in their own way) the week before Easter this year with intensified devotion. We are asked to contemplate with open mind and willing heart "Christ crucified, the power of God unto salvation." We all need to do it for ourselves. The crisis demands that we do it for our world.

Following Christ in His Passion, we shall learn His mind. Saved by the cross ourselves, in victorious faith and faithful labor we shall bring our world back to its Saviour. The crisis of the world will have found its solution in the cross of Christ.

BISHOP RHINELANDER.

O Saviour of the world, who by Thy cross and precious blood has redeemed us; save us, and help us, we humbly beseech Thee, O Lord. Amen.

What Was It?

One of our exchanges tells of a little girl who "fooled" her grandfather. Maybe some of our readers can try the same joke upon grandpa or grandma. This is the story.

Mr. Brompton is very clever, yet the other day his little granddaughter utterly confounded him.

"Grandpa," said she, "I saw something so funny running across the kitchen floor, without legs. What do you think it was?"

Grandpa thought and thought, but at last he had to give it up.

"What was it?" he asked.

"Water!" replied the little lady, triumphantly.

DO WE DESIRE CHURCH UNITY?

In the Churchman (New York) of March 2 there is an editorial article on "Courtesy and Church Unity," with much of which we find ourselves in thorough agreement. We would be sorry to believe, however, that as regards our own Church the situation is altogether as intimated in the following paragraph:

One is given to think nowadays that Church Unity is the dearest heart's desire of all Episcopalians. We have commissions to agitate it, prayers to prepare our hearts for it, conventions to discuss it. It is pure camouflage. Most Episcopalians do not care one rap about Church Unity. What we want is dominion. We want Congregationalists and Presbyterians to become Churchmen. By peaceful conquest and a better understanding (their understanding of us) we hope that the territory will ultimately be ours.

Let it be remembered that "most Episcopalians" are laymen and laywomen who have more common-sense than they are sometimes credited with by the clergy. They read their Bibles and Prayer-Books and have a fairly clear idea of what they teach. They live in daily and very kindly intercourse with friends and neighbors and business and social acquaintances of other Church names, and fail to see any great difference between themselves and them as touching the effect of religion upon life. But they have too much "gumption" to mistake courtesy for unity. They love their own Church with a pure devotion; her services and traditions and "ways" are very dear to them, and they see no reason for, have no intention of, giving them up. They wonder that their "outside" friends cannot see them all in the same fair colors, and ascribe it to training, prejudice and lack of knowledge or of a properly cultivated taste. But they respect their convictions and even their prejudices, and have no disposition to override them. Only they think it is a pity that Christian people in the same community, serving and worshipping the same Lord and repeating the same creed, cannot do it in unison, and save the tremendous waste, the misapplication of zeal and loss of religious influence and dissipation of spiritual energy, to say nothing of the untold cost in money, that is the price of denominationalism.

To this extent at least, we are persuaded, most Episcopalians do care about Church Unity. They see no prospect of it; it is a subject hardly worthy of serious discussion because the obstacles in the way seem insuperable. Religion in this age of enlightenment cannot tolerate compulsion. It demands the widest liberty of thought and conscience, especially among democratic peoples. They are constrained to hold fast to those things which to them seem true and essential, or even admirable and helpful; they have a sacred right to their use and enjoyment, and even a duty to urge them upon the acceptance of others. But they recognize that their Christian neighbors are bound by a like constraint and must be accorded the same right. As long then as they suppose Church Unity to mean uniformity in taste, in customs, in opinion, in ideals, or even in convictions as to the relative value and importance of different aspects of religious truth and of organic Church life, they judge, and rightly judge, that it is a thing impossible if not undesirable.

But suppose the average Churchman could be assured that all this is not implied in Church Unity as we conceive of it today, but that the truest liberty of conscience and the widest diversity in points of view and methods of religious exercise were quite compatible with a real and practical organic unity, what then? Suppose they could be convinced that what we want, "we" being all sincere and thoughtful advocates of Unity, is not dominion but Christian common-wealth, is not conquest but opportunity for worthwhile sacrifice of exclusive ecclesiasticism for the sake of God's kingdom, is not elimination but comprehension, is not the surrender of anything we value but the cultivation of a more generous spirit of understanding, tolerance and charity. Has it ever been shown that "most Episcopalians" would not care for that? Would not the Christian instincts and good sense of the great mass of our thinking people respond to such a program?

We quite agree that most Episcopalians have failed to take even an academic interest in schemes of Church Unity, because none has ever been presented to their practical apprehension. Such discussion of the subject as they have read or heard has seemed to them pointless and to lead nowhere. But their attitude must not be confused with that of the average cleric or the doctrinaire. They are voiceless, but not callous or thoughtless. Had they leaders who were not despairing and not afraid, who could point the Church to a single first step to be taken, a single first principle to be adopted, which would demand their co-operation and command their respect, we believe it would receive a glad and candid response. That fine spirit of democracy, that broad liberality, that innate sense of justice and fair-play, that genius for organization and team-work, that readiness to undertake big things for the good of the whole, which are characteristic of most Episcopalians as of other good Americans, would not be found wanting in the rank and file of the Church if it were called upon to grapple with this problem in a way they could approve and for a purpose they could understand. Let not the attitude of the Church, that is, of the great body of Church people, be reproached, or its sincerity be impugned, until at least it has had the opportunity of expressing itself and showing what spirit it is of. But let some definite, practical program for an approach toward Church Unity be presented, conserving all that they hold to be true and good, but recognizing present conditions, and that wider liberty under higher law which men are trying to grasp today, and then let it be seen whether or not we care for it.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL SERVICE.

The Church and the Crowd. An Interpretation of the Answer of the Church to the Challenge of the Day. By Richard Wallace Hogue, D. D. New York; Fleming H. Revell Company. Pp. 84. 60 cents net.

Six very earnest and thoughtful chapters by a clergyman of the Church who gave up the rectorship of a large parish to devote himself to more direct work among those whom the Church fails to reach. Dr. Hogue is a man of strong convictions, but is neither an extremist nor a crank. In this little book he reminds us that thoughtful people are asking such questions as these: "Has organized religion not only forfeited its leadership, but lost the message of its Founder? If so, or if not, will the Church make good her mission and her message? Will the real redemption of humanity come through forces and channels outside the organized Church?" He seeks to answer such questionings, and "to aid the Church to meet the challenge of today, as her Founder met the challenge of His day." No one can fail to sympathize with such a purpose. If one puts aside the consideration of these and like questions as either impertinent or impractical, he argues himself as much out of touch with the spirit of the gospel as with the spirit of his age. If Dr. Hogue has not given us the final answer he at least awakens one's mind, stirs his imagination and prods his conscience. Such a book is excellent reading for the clergy, lest their preaching grow flabby and pointless, and none the less so for the laity, lest their hearing grow selfish and unprofitable.

There is an element of indefiniteness, however, which we find in all discussions of the Church's duty on lines of social righteousness and uplift. It is agreed on all sides that Christianity, the gospel of redemption, the treasures of truth and love, and spiritual power which are committed to the Church, are hers to be used and applied for the salvation, moral, physical, social, economic of the world around her. Let us assume that we have gotten that far out of the narrow prison-house of our old self-seeking notions of religion. The question is, how and by what sort of agency is this gospel which we have received and grace bestowed upon us to be thus exercised and applied? Is it the business of the Church as a concrete organism, or of Churchmen and Churchwomen who have received her message and grace and inspiration through her ministrations? Shall the Bishops and other clergy leave the word of God to serve these tables of applied justice and benevolence, or shall the body of the Church's membership who have heard the gospel of the kingdom set about choosing the leadership, discovering the methods and organizing the agencies for putting it into practice? Where does the responsibility lie for getting any definite thing done in the way of social or civic righteousness? Should the Church, assembled through her representatives in Council or Synod, proclaim the specific duty, inaugurate the plans, formulate the methods to be followed and furnish the machinery? We cannot think so; and can easily imagine the botch she would make of it and the entanglements in which she would presently become involved. It is the Church's duty, as such, to preach and teach the gospel of righteousness and brotherliness and love so wisely, forcibly, constrainingly, and, if need be, particularly, that the preacher and every hearer would be moved to ask, not only of the Church, but of themselves, "What shall we do, then?" and to find the thing to be done and the right way of doing it. The further responsibility rests with them.

It is for lack of definiteness here that the Church is often berated by those without and misjudged by those within. It is not, as we conceive, the business of the Church as an institution to enforce prohibition or child-labor laws, to arbitrate between capital and labor, or to clean up the slums and eradicate the plague-spots in our cities. It is her business in this regard so to preach and exhort and encourage that the Christian citizenship to which she ministers will see their duty in these particulars and do it. It is the work not of the Church, but of the Churchman.

The willingness and anxiety, indeed, of our Church to further every such good work is somewhat curiously shown by the creation of her Social Service Commissions, general, provincial and diocesan. They are composed of able and earnest men who have given a deal of thought to many difficult problems. They have made surveys, tabulated statistics, written reports and issued exhortations and advice. It is no reflection upon their wisdom or zeal to remark that they have found more to say and less to do than any similar bodies in the Church. They have gone just as far as the authority which created them could go. It seems to us the only practical thing for them to do is to encourage the organization of laymen in clubs, guilds, societies or what you will, in the cities or communities, and say to them, "Here is the work to be done; you have the teaching, the inspiration, the spiritual power of the Church behind you; you have the means, the intelligence, the practical ability about or within you; get busy! Make such plans, use such methods, advance such causes, as seem to you right and good, that's your responsibility; only put into operation this gospel of the kingdom of God delivered unto you right there in your own community, and elsewhere that your influence and power can reach."

For as the Church cannot live the personal religious life of her members, neither can she perform their tasks or fulfil their obligations or shoulder their responsibilities. Let the distinction be clearly kept in mind, else there will be grave confusion of thought both as to the province of the Church and the duty of the Churchman.

One great evil of sin is that it takes away our right to be indignant when other people sin, and so in time our standard of thought is lowered to their scale.—Phillips Brooks.

On the Threshold of the Unseen. An Examination of the Phenomena of Spiritualism and of the Evidence of Life After Death. By Sir William F. Barrett, F. R. S. With an Introduction by James H. Hyslop, Ph. D., LL. D., Secretary of the American Society of Psychical Research. New York. E. P. Dutton & Co. Pp. 354. $2.50 net.

The author of this substantial volume is a man of scientific training who was one of the founders of the Society for Psychical Research in England thirty-six years ago, and was, even before that time, a patient investigator of the phenomena of spiritualism. The facts cited seem to have stood the test of scientific examination as to their reality, so far as it was possible to apply it. They are many and curious, and too well substantiated to be denied by candid minds. Many of us could supply others from our own experiences or those of our friends. It remains to determine not only their explanation, but their significance and practical value as part of the fund of human knowledge. On these points it cannot be claimed that definite conclusions have been reached as yet. Our author discusses some of the problems presented in a candid spirit, in full view of the latest hypotheses of psychological science, and suggests but does not insist upon certain far-reaching implications to which they may seem to point. He considers, however, that survival after bodily death is scientifically demonstrable, and that a philosophy of materialism is untenable in view of proven facts. The book may be accepted as a contribution to the popular thought of the day as well as an authoritative statement of the progress so far made in the investigation of a limitless and to some minds a fascinating, but still obscure and inhospitable, if not treacherous, field of research. It is one, unquestionably, in which it is easy to go astray, and would better be left to the scientists than be invaded by immature investigators or credulous seekers after the sensational. So far, we believe, spiritualism has contributed nothing of substantial value to the sum of religious knowledge or experience.

Our Living Dead. Some Talks with Unknown Friends. By E. Katharine Bates. With a Preface by Sir Alfred E. Turner, Major General, K. C. B., &c. E. P. Dutton & Co. New York. Pp. 160. $1.25.

Here is another book on the same subject but from a different standpoint. It is by an avowed spiritualist in the popular meaning of the word, and is written ostensibly for the comfort and instruction of the bereaved. It contains much that is quite true, which can be far better gotten from other sources, mingled with not a little that is more than dubious and subtly misleading. Let the bereaved go to God's word for comfort and they will find no need for such doubtful and unwholesome aids to faith or hope, which really tend to undermine both.

An Angel of Light. By the Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie, Author of Anti-Christian Supernaturalism, etc. Christian Alliance Publishing Company, New York. Pp. 192. $1.00.

A clergyman of the Church in this volume comes with his antidote, not only for Spiritism, the correct term for that professional cult, but for Theosophy, Eddyism or Christian Science, New Thought and other recrudescences of ancient paganism. He traces their origin, exposes their fallacies and demonstrates their antagonism to Christianity. Indeed he does not hesitate to connect them with the power and lying wonders of that malignant spirit who for his purposes "fashioneth himself into an angel of light." To those who need to be informed as to the real meaning of these proposed substitutes for our holy religion, of the futility of their claims to be compatible with it, the secret of their attractiveness to a certain class of minds and the intellectual, moral and spiritual moccasins into which they lead, Mr. Mackenzie's book is to be recommended. Speaking of spiritism, the author quotes from a pronounced but evidently despairing spiritist who declared, "We have broken into the spirit world on the side on which they keep their insane." Mutatis mutandis, the same remark would seem to apply to these other realms in which we are invited to find repose.

Letters to the Editor

THE CLERGY AND THE ARMY Y. M. C. A.

Mr. Editor: Permit me to say through your columns that I am back on duty at Camp Lee, after an absence of six weeks, due to sickness; and at the same time to tell your readers something of the Y. M. C. A. work in the Army.

There seems to be an impression abroad that a clergyman has to surrender some of the privileges given him in ordination when he enters the service of the Army Y. M. C. A. To my mind, a clergyman not only does not surrender anything that is valuable, but he has a wonderfully increased opportunity for service.

There are twelve Y. M. C. A. buildings serving the soldiers, besides the Central Administration Building, and the big central auditorium, seating 5,000 men.

Each of these twelve buildings has a staff of five secretaries, all wearing a uniform. The Building Secretary is in charge of the building, and is made responsible for all its activities, especially the business end. The Social Secretary looks after concerts, entertainments, social games, etc. The Educational Secretary conducts classes for soldiers whose primary education has been neglected, and teaches French. The Athletic Secretary supervises all kinds of indoor and outdoor athletic games and exercises.

Then each building has a Religious Work Secretary, for which position an ordained minister is sought. He celebrates the Holy Communion according to the rites of his Church, he has Bible classes, and he preaches at morning and evening services on Sunday and on one week night. Not often would he have all these services himself, however, on any one day.

Of course there is more to be done, in the way of visiting individuals, in barracks, in infirmaries, and in the base hospital, than one or a dozen ministers could do, in the portion of the camp served by one building.

Surely there have been in the past, and will be in the future, few opportunities such as presented here for a man to labor in the service of the Master. To help a man go over the top as a Christian; or (and this is the biggest part of the work after all), to do a bit for the Christian religion in a crowd of men, gathered from a wide territory into one place, where they are in a more susceptible frame of mind than ever before; in a crowd of men of whom perhaps 99 out of 100 are coming back to enter into the life of the nation; was there ever such another opportunity to strike while the iron is hot?

A man serving as Religious Work Secretary, as I am here, feels that his best is so little in comparison with the opportunities presented that he is sometimes discouraged. But the bigness of the opportunity constitutes the call.

ARTHUR P. GRAY, JR.
Camp Lee, Va., March 5, 1918.

THE BISHOP JONES CASE.

Mr. Editor: The case of Bishop Jones is causing wrathful discussion in the Church and outside of it, and no wonder, for it raises the most serious question that any one bishop ever has thrust upon the Church, the question debated in colonial times, viz: Is the Episcopal Church a Tory Church?

I do not question the sincerity of the erring Bishop; the most mischievous man of the nineteenth century, "the arch traitor to the world," Carl Marx, must have been sincere; a recent writer has made out a plausible case for the sincerity of Benedict Arnold.

I am sure the Episcopal Commission that acted in the Jones case sought the highest welfare of the Church, and aimed to be as kind as possible to the offender; but I doubt the sufficiency for the bishops is to present Bishop true, the logical, the consistent course for the bishops is the present Bishop Jones for trial on the charge of disloyalty to the country, though a technical case of treason probably could not be made out; and any way that offense would come under the jurisdiction of the civil courts.

No bishop of the Anglican Communion ever has so much deserved deposition as Paul Jones. Bishop Ives and Bishop Cummins together did not hurt our Church one thousandth part as much as Bishop Jones will hurt it if he is not deposed.

There is no test of love but death. THE VERDICT.

By the Rev. Carroll Lund Bates.

Our age is fortunate. The argument of history is before us. A reasonable verdict can be returned.

We know now that war is intolerable. We cannot allow it to continue as a permanent possibility. Had it not been for this particular war which we are experiencing now we might have gone on tolerating war as an occasionally necessary evil. But not after this. This war completes the evidence. The jury has decided. We have pronounced war guilty. This war may not be the last war, but war must cease.

Autocracy is condemned today. The evidence is in, and it is conclusive. Nero, Louis XVI, Charles I, George III, William II have passed before us and we will have none of them. The conscience of man is keen. It realizes that these are guilty. They are condemned.

Pacifism and Socialism have been tried. They are found wanting. Pacifism says, "Peace at any price," and omits to demand righteousness. Socialism says, "Down with Autocracy," and forgets that a leaderless people is powerless. Bolshevism is conclusive evidence against both Pacifism and Socialism. The jury of the people declares the same verdict upon each of them. They are condemned.

What of Democracy? The evidence is in on this head too. Is Democracy beyond reproach? Not the Democracy that we have so far had. We have tried Democracy before the public bar. The verdict is that Democracy leans in the right way, but that it must be improved. Democracy led by leaders whose purpose is to exploit themselves is discredited.

Autocratic leaders we will have none of. Self-seeking leadership is not desired. To have no leaders is intolerable. The evidence of history pins us, therefore, down to this: Ideal government ensues where the people raise up from among themselves leaders who have conscience and ability, and when the people stand behind the leaders so raised up. In a word, the greatest State will be that State which is nearest to being the absolutely Christian State.

We also live in an era when the evidence of history is before us, and when we can confidently return a good many verdicts upon Christianity.

Imperialism in the Church is condemned by the evidence of history. Gregory VII, Boniface VIII, Alexander VI are tried and found wanting. We will have none of them. Those who are chief in the Church merely or mainly to lord it over God's heritage must go.

But what of Liberty of Private Judgment in the religious realm? The verdict of Christian history is decisive against the excesses of this genius once believed to be the one on whom we might pin our supremest hopes.

The evidence is complete. Liberty of Private Judgment comes before the jury of public opinion today with a long list of crimes written against her. She has created almost innumerable sects, some of them deservedly a laughing stock. She is condemned.

The Church then must have leaders duly accredited, but if these be not Christian in spirit to the degree that they will serve the flock and in no wise exploit themselves the Ideal Church is a long ways off.

The evidence of history is in as to other details of Christianity, and the jury rules as follows: (1) In the interests of reverence ritual is desirable, but excess of emphasis upon ritual is a danger since it tends to make ritual degenerate into mechanics; (2) in the interests of the soul's felt need, Christianity must not lose sight of the fact that Christ is an Agent of present day Empowerment and that the Sacraments are vehicles of real spiritual gifts; yet, to stress this (truth though it is) to the limit of forgetting other truths by which it is safeguarded, is sure to lead to moral laxity.

These days press problems upon us, but they are also aglow with revelations.

If we see that Democracy Christianized will mean the end of wars, the beginning of a period of social and economic efficiency under Christian leadership which Christianized humanity can (if it will) raise up and sustain, then it is time for us to respond to that vision.

If we see, by history's evidence, that Imperialism is discredited in the Church; if we see, on the other hand, that a leaderless Christianity, broken up into a chaos of almost headless organizations, is a farce; if we see that ritual means reverence, but that ritual stereotyped means mechanics; if we see that Christianity without Sacrament is like bread without nutrition, but that Christianity that exaggerates Sacrament acts as the heart is acted upon by digitals; if we see the indubitable desirability of keeping the Via Media, knowing also that on this Via Media only can the divided Church unite—then is it not today our duty to consider the evidence and act!

THE SPIRITUAL CALL OF THE WAR.

Extracts from the Lenten Pastoral of the Bishop of Georgia.

* * * My brethren, what are the ultimate causes of this war? What can re-establish man's civilized order on such a basis as will make righteousness, justice and peace abiding blessings to mankind? Surely it is not the mere victory of arms by ourselves and our allies which can do this. Force alone and physical might, the arbitrament of machine guns, can never produce the lasting stability of real peace, any more than prohibitions alone can produce virtue. The final causes of most wars are prevalent among the peoples of all nations. They are human causes, moral, spiritual defects of character, degradation of ideals, perversions of will, the active energizing, dominating powers of evil in human life.

At the root of all of man's life, of his aims, his aggressive activities, his motives and ideals is unquestionably his spiritual attitude to the world about him and the Universe above him. His philosophy, his religion, whatever it may be, dominates and controls his life when once he has risen above the level where appetite and passion and impulse unconsciously control him as in savagery or in infancy.

The only hope for mankind is to adjust his will to the eternal realities of truth and duty, to sanctify his affections, to uplift his ideals, to cleanse his imagination and to convert his heart to the God of love and holiness. Why cannot, why will we not see that? When has mere knowledge of physical things or the greed of power or the contentment of prosperity and wealth ever promoted the permanent peace and happiness of mankind? The history of the world is the history of fallen empires and ruined civilizations. And what has brought these failures? Will anybody, can anybody, deny that they have been caused by irresponsible power and wealth, by selfish indulgence and luxury, by godless pride, by sensuous vice and religion perverted and prostituted to enforce these unholy ambitions and enslave their victims? These have wrought ruin and misery among men and turned God's earth into an ante-room of hell.

These are the facts and truths which I wish to force upon your reflection to make you face seriously and humbly in the hope that by the grace of God and the Holy Christ you may be led to see how solemn are the issues of our life. We are likewise partakers of a sinful human nature. We live also only too much under the same delusions which deceive and enslave other men and women and nations. The seeds of these cosmic sins are latent and active in us. Our nation and people stand before God not innocent of this wilfulness. We are tainted, too, with this human blindness and perversity. Our souls are anaemic, our religion is invertebrate, our churches are losing influence, our business is materialized, our homes are unreligious if not irreligious, our children are growing up undisciplined and without reverence. The clamorous assertion of our rights has drowned the voice of duty and conscience. Our education is secularized, our universities are often times the seed plots of faithless and irreverent criticisms; our philosophies are divorced from true and reasonable religion, their spiritual fountain head.

There are, indeed, thank God, evidences of the turning of men's minds to a deeper and more reverent attitude. The Spirit of God is moving over the face of the waters of human thought and life. The appeal which our country and other countries are making for an unselfish patriotism is finding a response in noble and sacrificing service from the soldiers in the trenches and from faithful souls at home among men and women. Let us thank God and take courage. But let us not forget that the war appeal is but temporary. When peace comes and we can turn again to our profits and our pleasures we shall be living in the same old world, with the same temptations and weaknesses, the same unregenerate natures and its delusions to beguile and betray us. The problems of peace will be more difficult; the dangers of peace will be greater; the sins of peace just as deadly as these things are now. We need God quite as much in prosperity as we do in tribulation, nay, more.

The improvement which we thankfully note will not be, however, radical enough if it reach not into the innermost recesses of human life. It must touch the fountain head of human thought and conduct, in the attitude of the soul and the conversion of the will. We must be converted and become as little children. We must have a truer, deeper, purer religion. We must live more in God and for God. We must become Christian in spirit and in truth.

If we do not we shall only patch up the broken fragments of human society. We shall only whitewash the sepulchres of our still selfish and dying souls. The last end of the world and of our own lives shall be worse than the first. No nation, no man can pass through such profound experiences as we are now enduring, can face life in its depths of suffering and need and sin without some result. If we are not made wiser and stronger and better, we shall be more deeply hardened into insensibility, more blinded, and more desperate in materialized worldliness than we were before.

And therefore, my brethren, I appeal to you to use this holy season as men who are facing life steadily, and in its deepest meaning as those who are moved to their depths, and who in passionate sincerity are seeking from God His forgiveness and His grace, His blessing and His salvation. In all humility, as your brother in need, I appeal to you with all sincerity and earnestness. Can we not hear, as of old, the refrain of the ancient prophets, their solemn words, "Thus saith the Lord God."

I call you in His Name to confession and repentance and I assure you with the authority of an ambassador of Christ that in your sincerity of penitence you shall receive from Him forgiveness and the power and grace of a renewed and holy life.

I call you to reverent faith, to prayer and worship in your closet, at your family altar, at the altar in His House, where the Great Sacrament brings you face to face in communion with your God and Saviour.

I call you to self-denial and self-sacrifice in your Master's Name, for the nation and for His Church. * * * The one great sin and disloyalty in religion is insincerity, unreality and pretense, professing with our lips what we deny in our lives. If we pretend to be Christians and Churchmen, let us be sincere and honestly endeavor to obey our Master and His Holy Church. Otherwise, it is impossible to receive the blessings which He sets before us. * * *

Again I call you to personal service as the supreme claim of our Lord upon us all. The Church has a great mission in the world, as the nation has. Democracy is a great force, and like all other forces may become a very dangerous power. It, too, must become consecrated by the Divine spirit to the service of all mankind, of all classes and nations of men. It must not be prostituted to the selfish purposes of those who direct its energies.

That consecration is the Church's responsibility—to fulfil that duty the Church asks for your Christian service to quicken her life, to sustain her activities and to promote her mission. Let us do all we can for our country and our allies and the great cause to which we are jointly committed. But let us not forget that behind all the activities of our country and its brave defenders on the battle line there must be character; there must be goodness and truth and the strength and peace and holiness of God. It will be a fatal error if our war goes on with the weapons of the flesh to a successful issue, and the Church at home shall have been weakened and its energies sapped and its mission obstructed by the neglect of prayer and of worship and by the weakening of that loyal zeal which seeks to spread Christ's blessed Gospel of comfort and salvation at home and in all the far corners of the earth. * * *

Sincerely your friend and Bishop,
FREDERICK F. REESE.

SOLDIERS ARE LOYAL TO THE CHURCH.

Extracts From Letters to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew Show They Are Interested in Bible Classes, in Personal Work and in the Church at Home.

The young soldier in the cantonment does not forget his Church. It is near and dear to him, judging from his letters, and he frequently expresses regret that he has not been able to get in touch with some chaplain of his Communion, or some members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. A spirit of optimism pervades the soldier's letters. He is becoming interested in his work; he is striving to make himself a good soldier; he looks forward to "going to France" where he expects to acquit himself as a true and loyal American.

"I believe," writes an enlisted man, who is stationed at Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, S. C., "that the men in the National service will return to their homes stronger in moral and spiritual fibre, due to the work of the Chaplains, the Y. M. C. A. men and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew's camp secretaries. Now is the time for religious work, for the men are in a receptive mood and realize, more and more each day, what the Church is trying to do for them."

A fine picture of camp life is presented by one young soldier at the Spartanburg cantonment:

"When in town on Sunday evenings, or even when I can get away in the mornings, I go to the Church of the Advent," he writes. "The men in our tent are showing true Christianity and brotherly love, as we share all our worldly possessions equally, regardless of race or nationality, creed or color. We get along nicely, and when any one is ill or in need, in sorrow or trouble (which is rare), we try to help him. We have a mutual feeling of love for one another, and try to conduct ourselves always like Christian men. We can show our religion most when we minister to the sick."

Another, from the same cantonment, writes: "Yes, I trust God that I will return home again after doing my bit as a loyal soldier of Uncle Sam. I also want to be a true soldier toward God, my Father, and I shall remain steadfast to my Church."

Still another writes of a Bible class of which he is a member. He says: "Considering the environment of camp life, the majority of men with whom I have come in contact have not forgotten the pleasure the folks at home derive from the news that they go to church. I am a member of the Bible class at the Y. M. C. A., under the supervision of a Corporal, and we are endeavoring to spread the influence of this class throughout the camp." This soldier, with his ambition to spread the influence of the Bible class throughout the camp, has a vision of the group system inaugurated by the Army and Navy Department of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

A lad in the 102d Regiment at Spartanburg writes that he is helping his Chaplain organize a choir for the newly-constructed church.

From Washington, D. C., comes a letter from a lad in khaki who deplores the fact that his company has been under quarantine for six weeks, and "during all that time we haven't seen a minister of the Gospel." Here is an opportunity for a Brotherhood group. The quarantine can bar out chaplains and ministers, but the personal workers comprising the group remain with their comrades, and their uplift work among them will continue, quarantine or no quarantine.

A captain in the British Army, describing the terrible assault of Gallipoli, told how the Tommies were notified by their commanders, before they landed in front of the Turkish forts, that there could be no retreat. They were expected to win or die. "While we were waiting," he said, "some of the men said their prayers. Others took out their little pocket Testaments and read them."

The spirit of loyalty to Jesus Christ is strong among the men in all the armies. They will be true to the death.

Organ and Church Furniture Needed.

In a recent letter from the Rev. A. R. Llwyd, our missionary who arrived in Port au Prince, Haiti, the last of January, he writes:

"Is there any possibility of getting us a good second-hand Reed organ and half decent second-hand church furniture, with communion vessels? The cheapest lumber here is $100 per 1,000 feet, while buying furniture is impossible; it is costly beyond imagination."

The work is now rebeginning in such a splendid way and Mr. Llwyd's enthusiasm is so contagious that we hope he will secure this organ and be able to put the services on a satisfactory basis. I might add that the Civil Administrator of Port au Prince, Major Marston, is a devoted Churchman and is keenly interested in helping Mr. Llwyd in every way, so you can see that our opportunities there are now unlimited.

May I ask your help in giving this appeal consideration in your columns?

There Is Reconstruction Work in China, Too.

Mrs. Bliss, wife of a Missionary Physician at St. James' Hospital, Anking, writes on January 11:

I am making a new social service venture. So many patients leave the hospital unable to resume their former occupation that I have been spending many days and nights planning how to help them. Finally I have rented an old Chinese house, put a wooden floor and four glass windows in the work-room and fitted up a second room as dormitory.

At present four live in the dormitory. No. 1 has a defective heart. He was a beggar by profession and is now a neat, conscientious, cheerful, self-supporting man. No. 2 came to the hospital in a dying condition—17 per cent. of something that should have been at least 98 per cent. in his blood, I believe. After weeks in the hospital he has over 70 per cent. He was a water carrier by trade, but will probably never again be able to do any heavy work. He has no education, of course, and is the size of a twelve-year-old child, although he is twenty-six. No. 3 is an obstinate leg ulcer case. No. 4 is a soldier with a diseased bone in his leg. He has spent seven months in the hospital and now goes on crutches, still needs daily treatment at the dispensary. These all are working under ideal conditions, and are entirely self-supporting.

We make place cards, Christmas cards, Christmas toys, blotters, etc. I am sending to America for a jig saw, lathe and printing press, so that we may be able to take on all the needy cripples as they come out of the hospital, and also help those who still remain in the hospital and need work, money and good cheer. Already three convalescents have been able to pay their board and leave with a little money in their pockets, to make a fresh start.

It sometimes frightens me to think of these people dependent upon me for their livelihood, but so far we have been successful beyond all my dreams. We hope our friends will remember us in their prayers.

Orders for the work of this Reconstruction School may be sent through the Educational Department of the Board of Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

A Resident Physician for Anvik.

The Rev. John W. Chapman, D. D., writes from Anvik, Alaska, that the Bureau of Education is considering the possibility of assigning a resident physician to Anvik. He feels that this is likely to be done if the Mission can provide a residence for the doctor. Dr. Chapman believes that this should be done as quickly as possible, "in order to consolidate our gains." He is about to call upon the people of Anvik and the vicinity, both white and Indian, for help in building the house, and believes that they will respond to the call. "It is evident," he says, "that with a little help from home we can make it a credit to the Mission. We shall have to buy paint, hardware, building paper, etc., and if the work is done gratis we may find it best to feed the workmen. Something like $500 will be necessary to enable me to do all satisfactorily."

It is not clear just why the Bureau of Education should be willing to assign a doctor to Anvik, and apparently unwilling or unable to provide him with a residence. The advantage of having a resident physician, both from the point of view of safeguarding the health of the Mission's staff and enlarging the work of the Mission among the Indians, would be great. At present the nearest physician to Anvik is over one hundred miles away, and the nearest approach to a hospital is more than two hundred miles away. During the past summer Dr. Chapman built a small infirmary especially for the use of Christ Church School. This could be made to do duty for the time being at all events as a hospital.

If the doctor whom the Bureau of Education proposes to station at Anvik should be sent there, his reputation is such, Dr. Chapman says, that "we should have patients from all quarters. I do not know how we are going to accomplish all that lies before us, but we shall tackle it, and I hope that our friends will do all that they can to see us through."

Any who desire to help may send their gifts marked "Special for Doctor's House at Anvik" to Mr. George Gordon King, Treasurer, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Missions in Guatemala and Spanish Honduras.

In February Bishop Dunn, of British Honduras, visited the Republics of Guatemala and Spanish Honduras. At his very first stopping place (Barrios) he found a district containing 2,300 Anglians and only a deacon to take charge of them, as well as of a country school.

During his absence two men from the country came up to Belize, one with a signed petition, begging for a school teacher or lay reader in a district where the Church people could muster quite a good-sized congregation, but have no one to take services or teach their children; the other a lay reader who gave notice that he would open a Sunday school in a hut on a bante (plantation) and at once had thirty children all eager to learn.

The news has traveled up and down the rivers that the Bishop is interested in the children, and these men come to town at their own expense to represent the needs of their neighborhood.

The S. P. G. is taking a very sympathetic interest in the District, and instead of shortening the grants is going to try to increase them.

English Limbless Sailors and Soldiers;
An Appeal for "Roehampton."

The work at Roehampton is so widely known that it is unnecessary to describe it, but it may be mentioned that up to December 31 last over 11,500 officers and men (including a large number from our overseas dominions) have been admitted to the hospitals, supplied with artificial limbs (provided by the State) and taught how to use them; large numbers have also been admitted for readjustment and renewal of their limbs.

Two thousand three hundred men have been found good posts through the Employment Bureau attached to the hospitals, and 7,000 men have been returned to their old employment, or passed on to local committees with information necessary to secure them a fresh start in life.

The present accommodation is totally inadequate to meet the increasing demands made upon it, and serious consideration must now be given to the future.

The majority of our limbless men are quite young, cheery and full of hope about their future, but much depends upon the usefulness of their artificial limbs, which always require readjustment owing to the shrinking of the stump. Also at intervals repairs and new limbs are necessary. Consequently, there will be need of Roehampton for the next forty years.

Scotland, Ireland and Wales have recognized this want, and by voluntary effort have established permanent fitting hospitals for dealing with the problem. It is felt that the need here has only to be known, and England will wish to do the same for her gallant men who are maimed for life.

We earnestly appeal for £100,000, not only to extend the present scheme, but to found a permanent "Roehampton," where our men can always return to have their artificial limbs readjusted and renewed, and we feel sure that this appeal to make adequate provision in the future for the limbless men who have served their country by sea, land and air will not be made in vain. No donation will be too small and none too large.

Cheques and postal orders should be addressed to the Hon. Treasurer, Queen Mary's Auxiliary Hospital, 12 Little College Street, Westminster, S. W., marked "Roehampton," and crossed Lloyds Bank, 222 Strand.

Bishop Israel Visits Nice.

21 Boulevard Victor Hugo,
Nice, A. M., France,
Ash-Wednesday, 1918.

The Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., now with the American troops in France, has been able to leave his duties "at the front" for a short time, to visit some of our European parishes. So he has just paid a greatly appreciated visit to the American Church in this city. On Saturday afternoon last he met the parishioners at a reception in the rectory. The next day, Quinquagesima Sunday, he preached both morning and afternoon; and the noble eloquence with which he set forth the power and privilege of Christianity in the world of today will not soon be forgotten by his hearers. The morning congregation was much the largest seen in the church since the beginning of the war. After this service there was a gathering of khaki, to shake hands with our Bishop in khaki, and this informal reception the Bishop followed with a friendly talk to the parish's vestry. Such were the salient features of the Bishop's visit. Very happily, however, he was able to spend several days in Nice, going in and out among us, and when he went on his way again all were sorry. For though he had come to us a stranger, we had found in him a valued friend.

Armenian and Syrian Relief.

Cleveland H. Dodge, Treasurer of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City, announces the contributions totaling $88,746.59 for the week ending February 19, 1918. This makes a total of $8,459,000.67 collected by the Committee for relief of the sufferers in the Eastern War Zone. But the suffering to be relieved is terrible and the need is growing not less, but greater. We give two cablegrams recently received by the Committee through the State Department, samples of many that come to its office:

The Archbishop of York's Visit.

The Archbishop of York, while in Boston during the early part of this week, made the following statement of his purpose in visiting America:

"The object of my trip is very simple, I have two main desires. The first is to do something to cement the ties of affection between the two great English-speaking nations in our common struggle for the freedom and peace of the world. We must strike to finish the work we have begun. When it is done, we have to make it as sure as we can that no other generation will have to do it over again. For both these tasks nothing is more important than the cordial fellowship of these two nations.

"My second desire is this: To tell this country that the will of the English people is set as strongly as ever on seeing the struggle victoriously ended. We are feeling the strain of three and one-half years of unparalleled sacrifice, however."

"I want to gain and to take back to my fellow-countrymen the sense of exhilaration which must come from seeing this great republic girding its loins to take its place—please God, a decisive place—in the struggle for the things which are the very breath of our internal life, and so to strengthen our fortitude and truth and hope."

Archbishop Lang is described as a splendid type of the English prelate, under sixty years of age, of medium height, slight of build, but giving an impression of activity and strength. He has a fine head, high forehead, very thin white hair, piercing blue eyes, a sensitive nose and mouth. He is an easy and graceful talker, and very democratic in manner.

The Archbishop's program in Boston included eight addresses in three days. From there he was to go to New Haven to speak at Yale, and his further itinerary takes him back to New York, then to Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and he will be in Washington Easter, the guest of Lord Reading. From there he will go to Ottawa and Toronto, and will be back in New York April 10 to sail for England.

Rural Social Service.

The General Convention of 1916 by formal resolution instructed the Joint Commission on Social Service "to investigate conditions of living in the rural districts of this country and to prepare a program to assist the Church to do more effective work in the rural districts; this committee to report, if possible, before the next General Convention." Following this action, the annual Synod of the Province of Seawane (November, 1917) memorialized the Commission to consider the same matter.

In response to these two resolutions and to its own growing conviction that in this time of national crisis the rural problem is of greater urgency than ever and that the Church in the country districts must realize its relation to the solution of that problem, the Commission in December, 1917, appointed a sub-committee to formulate a program for such work. This sub-committee has held one meeting, at which, among other things, it decided to address to the rural Clergy throughout the country, so far as they could be reached, a questionnaire designed to elicit information concerning any constructive rural social service being carried on in their communities with their co-operation, and has also drawn up other tentative plans concerning which announcement may be made later.

The questionnaire is as follows:

I. What work, if any, has your community undertaken along the following lines:

(1) Living conditions (including not only farmers' families, but farm hands—roads, rural free delivery, devices for lightening the work of farmers' wives, etc.).

(2) Recreation (under proper auspices, amid proper surroundings, with a special view to solving the 'boy and girl' problem).

(3) Education (especially adapted to the needs of rural communities, with a view, if possible, to training boys and girls to stay on the farm rather than go to the city—local schools, extension courses, including demonstrators from agricultural colleges, clubs for farmers and their children, for the purpose of encouraging competition in production).

(4) Abatement of intemperance, vice and crime (involving proper supervision of motion pictures and other community amusements, jails, probation work, saloons, hotels, etc.).

(5) Public health (including prophylactic as well as merely curative measures, sanitation, hospitals, adequate provision for the feeble-minded, etc.).

(6) Co-operation with or improvement of the local government or community administration.

(7) Promotion of a co-operative spirit in the community (as opposed to the tendency of the rural population to stand apart).

II. What specific social agencies, secular or religious, are there in your community? Do any Federal agricultural agencies operate in your neighborhood (vocational trainers and educators under the Smith-Hughes and Smith-Lever bills, etc.)? Do you co-operate with them?

III. What success have you had in arousing the interest of your own people in community service?

IV. Remarks:

Latest from Bishop Lloyd. A cable from Monrovia received at the Church Missions House on Tuesday, March 5, indicated that both Bishop Lloyd and Archdeacon Schofield were well, and that all their plans were progressing satisfactorily.

Names and Addresses of Soldiers Wanted. If any readers of the Southern Churchman know of Church boys or men at present stationed at Camp MacArthur or Richfield, Waco, Tex., or who will be there in the days to come, the undersigned will be glad to have the names and addresses of such men: and he hereby announces his readiness to hold toward these men as much of the pastoral relation as they will be willing to grant him.

Churchmen in Y. M. C. A. Work Abroad: The National War Council of the Y. M. C. A. publishes a list of names of men who have gone overseas in the Association work. A constant stream is now being sent, we are told, to France and Italy. Among those listed, numbering ninety-eight, are four clergymen and seventeen laymen of the Episcopal Church, or more than twenty-one per cent of the whole.

The American Bible Society has just completed the furnishing of five hundred thousand copies of its Service Testaments bound in khaki to the American soldiers and sailors through the Young Men's Christian Association, being half of its promised gift of one million volumes. It appears as if the total amount will be ready for the army and navy before the time promised, in spite of all the unprecedented delays due to the severe winter, fuel and transportation conditions. They are averaging ten thousand copies a day.

Sunday-School Mass Meeting.

The fourth annual meeting of all the Episcopal Sunday-schools of Richmond takes place this year in St. Paul's Church, April 14. William C. Sturgis, Ph. D., of New York, is coming to address the meeting. Dr. Sturgis is Educational Secretary of the Board of Missions, and has for years been prominent in the work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. He organized the St. Stephen's Church School for Boys, using his own home to suitably house the school, he, meanwhile, occupying a small house. Dr. Sturgis is a man of rare magnetism and a born teacher. Miss Lucy Sturgis, the well known author, is his sister.

As in past years, the different Sunday-schools will announce the result of their Lenten offerings, which usually swell the great fund for missions till adults are amazed at its proportions. Last year it totaled, in round numbers, three thousand dollars.

The bringing together at this time of all the children in a beautiful and impressive service is in itself an uplift to unity of action. Dr. Sturgis' enthusiasm inspires all to the missionary work he is heart and soul in, making it alive and wonderful to all who are fortunate enough to hear him. That he is an indefatigable worker can be judged by the program of his activities for the two days of his stay in Richmond.

Sunday, April 14, he speaks to the Bible class of St. Andrew's Church. Other Bible students who may wish to attend being welcomed. At eleven o'clock he will speak in St. James Church; at St. Paul's Church, at 3:30, he will deliver a special address to the combined Episcopal Sunday-schools of the city. At 8 o'clock he will speak in Emmanuel Church.

On Monday morning Dr. Sturgis will meet with the Clericus, and later lunch with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew at the Soldiers', Sailors' and Marines' Club. In the afternoon at 3:30 in All Saints Parish House he will address the Woman's Auxiliary and the Mission Study Class leaders; at 4:30 he speaks in the same place to the Junior Auxiliary and the Brotherhood of St. Paul. In the evening at 8 he will speak again at Grace Church, where certificates for Sunday-school study classes will be awarded to those passing their Teacher Training examinations under Mrs. E. E. Osgood, Mrs. Randolph Watkins and Miss Sallie Dean.

Section B of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The five branches of Section B, in Richmond, at All Saints, Holy Trinity, Monumental, St. James and St. Paul's Churches co-operate as far as possible in their work. Yearly pledges are made jointly, and one large meeting of all the branches is generally held during the year, where a well-known missionary is the speaker. Monthly officers' meetings are held to discuss the pledges and other matters of business. Occasionally a speaker comes in after the business meeting is over. In January we were privileged to have our Diocesan President, Mrs. Woodward, with us, and in February, Miss Sallie Deane, who spoke on the Silver Bay Conference, urging each branch to send delegates there next summer.

Could not a Mission Study Class be also formed in the many churches of Richmond who are without a branch of Section B? A group of girls over eighteen years of age might be gathered together, and in this way interest them in missions enough to make them also want to have a branch of Section B, for it is a very enthusiastic, active organization of young women forming a connecting link between the Juniors and older branch of the Women's Auxiliary. There are about sixteen churches in Richmond, and only five of them have branches of Section B. We make an earnest appeal to the others to see if they cannot form this strengthening link between the Juniors and older branch of the Woman's Auxiliary.

A. B. R.

The Rev. H. B. Lee, D. D., who for the past twenty-eight years, as assistant minister and rector of Christ Church, Charlottesville, Va., will retire from the active ministry, and go on the retired list, April 1, 1918, the date when his resignation becomes effective. Dr. Lee expects to continue to reside in Charlottesville.

Bishop Gibson visited Christ Church, Richmond, on Sunday morning, March 10, and confirmed a class of eleven presented by the rector, the Rev. Charles W. Sydnor. In the afternoon he visited Monumental Church and confirmed five presented by the rector, the Rev. Dr. James W. Morris.

The twenty-seventh annual State Sunday-School Convention will meet in the First Baptist Church, Richmond, on April 9-11, 1918, having been postponed from February on account of war and weather conditions.

A large number of leading Sunday-school workers are expected to be present. Besides ministers and laymen of Virginia, addresses are expected from the following: Mr. Frank L. Brown, Secretary of the World's Sunday-school Association; Mr. R. A. Waite, Teen-age Field Worker of the International Association; Rev. Dr. E. Morris Ferguson, Secretary the Maryland Association; Mr. Marshall A. Hudson, President the Baraca-Philathea Union; Rev. J. D. Canady, Superintendent the American Sunday-school Union. Dr. Henry Louis Smith, President of Washington and Lee University, will also make an address.

The Convention embraces all denominations, and a large attendance is expected. While every school is invited to send delegates, all Sunday-school workers will be welcomed, whether regularly elected delegates or not.

Ordination.

The Church of the Good Shepherd, which for a long time has been doing a splendid work in the southern section of the city of Wilmington, was the scene of an impressive and beautiful ceremony on the morning of Thursday, February 28, when the Bishop of the Diocese ordained to the Diaconate the Rev. Frank DeVinney Dean, M. D. The candidate was presented by the Rev. W. H. Barnwell, the Ven. T. P. Noe preached the sermon from the text, Acts 4:3, on the words, "Men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom," the Rev. D. L. Gwathmey read the Litany, and the Rev. J. N. Bynum was present in the chancel. The Bishop has placed the Rev. Mr. Dean in charge of the church where he was ordained, and he and his wife are already in residence in the rectory.

St. John's Church, Wilmington, is rejoicing in the fact that they now have a minister in charge who they hope will be with them until the return of their rector, the Rev. R. E. Gribbin, now acting as Volunteer Chaplain at Camp Sevier, S. C. The Rev. John Hanckel Taylor is now in charge of this fine old parish.

The Rev. W. H. Milton, D. D., rector of St. James' Church, Wilmington, visited Camp Sevier, S. C., the Third Sunday in Lent, and the following week was the speaker at the noon-day services at St. Michael's Church, Charleston, S. C. During his absence the Rev. D. L. Gwathmey took his service in Wilmington in the evening.

Funeral of Ensign Weed.

On March 2, at St. Luke's Church, Montclair, the funeral of Ensign Walker Weed was held, both of the Bishops taking part in the service with the Rev. Luke White, rector. The young soldier was married on February 2 in the same church and went at once to the Aviation Camp at Cape May. He and his associate, Bennett, of Newburyport, in flying met with an accident, and in falling the machine caught fire. Weed rushed into the ocean and put out the fire which threatened his life, supposing his companion would do the same. Turning back, he saw Bennett under the wreckage of the machine and rushed to his help, rescuing him while losing his own life in breathing in the flames. Bennett, however, lived but a few days.

Ensign Weed, at the age of twenty-four, was the first of the one hundred soldiers from St. Luke's to lose his life. The church, crowded with people, testified to the sorrow and sympathy of the whole community. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend."

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan

To the Members of the Woman's Auxiliary:

Owing to the illness of Mrs. Henry N. Castle, all custodians of the United Offering, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia, are asked to send their offerings to Mrs. M. P. Barksdale, Paeonian Springs, Loudoun County, Va., until the end of the year. It is hoped that all the custodians will promptly collect and forward all their offerings at the appointed times, and assist in every way possible in securing as large an offering as possible, for this noble and worthy church work, so dear to the hearts of all Churchwomen.

St. John's Memorial Church, Farmville, is the first in the town to install the American flag and the service flag; these were presented by St. John's Guild. Although this is a very small congregation the service flag bears ten stars.

The church is in a very flourishing condition under the rectorship of Rev. Charles P. Holbrook, who entered upon his duties there last June. All of the societies and organizations are alive and working, and each of them made liberal subscriptions to the work of the Y. M. C. A. War Work Council.

On account of the fuel shortage, no evening service has been held in the church since January; all of the churches of the town have been uniting in an evening service held in the auditorium of the State Normal School, which was kindly offered to them by the president of that institution. For the same reason, the only Lenten service is held on Saturday afternoon in the church, but on Wednesday afternoon there is a prayer service for women at one of the private residences of the town.

Notes.

On the third Sunday in Lent the Bishop visited St. Peter's Church, Salisbury, and instituted the Rev. Herbert D. Cone to be rector of the parish. Mr. Cone has been serving the parish very acceptably during the past three months, and the faithful are glad to have a rector, having been without one since the death of the Rev. David Howard last September.

In the afternoon of the same day the Bishop visited Old Spring Hill Church and St. Philip's, Quantico, recently made vacant by the resignation of the Rev. J. A. Brown

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

St. Matthew's Church, Fitzgerald, was completed about seven years ago during the incumbency of the Rev. Frederick North-Tummon. A loan of $1,200 was secured from the American Church Building Fund Commission to finish it. The congregation is a small one and is composed of people of modest means, and as is usual in these migratory days, it has suffered greatly from the removal of many of its members. These good people, however, under the leadership of their vicar, the Rev. J. W. Bleker, worked strenuously and gave liberally, to pay off the debt. They have met their annual payments for interest and principal accounts without fail and, with but little assistance from the outside. On March 1 they made their last payment to the Building Fund Commission and their church is now free from debt. Its consecration, it is hoped, may take place at an early date.

Mid-day Lenten Services are being held this year as usual for four days each week during Lent in Christ Church, Savannah. By the courtesy of the rector and vestry, the services are arranged for, however, and held under the auspices of the Bishop and a committee of the Episcopal Church Club composed of laymen of all the parishes in the city. The preachers this year are as follows: The Bishop of the Diocese, February 14 and 15; the Rev. A. G. Richards, rector of Emmanuel Church, Athens, Ga., February 19 to 24 inclusive; the Rev. Homer W. Starr, Ph. D., rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, Charleston, S. C., February 26 to 29; the Rev. Joseph B. Dunn, rector of St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, Va., March 5 to 8; the Rev. William C. Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., March 12 to 15; the Rev. David C. Wright, rector of St. Paul's Church, Louisville, Ky., March 19 to 22, and Bishop Reese, in Holy Week.

St. Michael's and All Angels', Savannah. St. Michael's Chapel, heretofore the mission of Christ Church, has been moved with the consent of the rector and vestry, to a lot on the corner of Anderson and Harmon Streets, in East Savannah. This lot was given to the Diocese by the children of the late Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Weed, of Savannah, in memory of their parents, in the place of the lot on Henry and Habersham Streets, on which the chapel previously stood. The church is now rebuilt and will be used by a new congregation known as the Church of St. Michael's and All Angels', which will be an Organized Mission of the Diocese. The first service was held in the church at its present location on Sunday night, March 10. It is hoped and believed that in a few years the mission will become a self-supporting parish.

Civilian Chaplain at Camp Wheeler. The Rev. R. N. MacCallum, rector of Grace Church, Waycross, has left his work for the period of the war to become a Civilian Chaplain. He is now stationed at Camp Wheeler, Macon, Ga.

Bequests of a Clergyman's Widow.

A Philadelphia paper reports that at the death on February 21, 1918, of Mrs. Eleanor R. Simes, wife of the late Rev. Snyder B. Simes, for forty-six years the devoted and beloved pastor of Gloria Dei (Old Swedes) Church, Philadelphia, Pa., the following bequests became operative:

In trust for the benefit of "Gloria Dei," Philadelphia, Pa., $60,000; $12,000 in trust, the interest to be applied to the payment of the "apportionment" on that church to the Foreign and Domestic Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church and $5,000 for the benefit of the Sunday school; $5,000 in trust for the benefit of the Home for Aged Women of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Germantown, Pa. The Rev. Mr. Simes died July 18, 1915.

Christ Church Parish, Vicksburg. The splendid report of the individual canvass made by the Rev. Charles E. Woodson, rector of Christ Church, Vicksburg, shows that one hundred and one new contributors were secured by the committee of forty, and an increase in pledges over last year of $1,603.60. The result of the canvass is seen in the people being brought into closer touch with each other and an increase in church attendance. This wonderful success is the result of the rector's energetic labors, his wisdom in administering the affairs of the parish, keeping in close touch with the people by his pastoral work and his strong and helpful sermons.

The Sunday school has been built up and three confirmation classes of eighty-seven candidates presented; the greater portion being adults and men. The old church has been revived and even better things are hoped for in the future.

The Bishop will visit the church for confirmation the second Sunday in April.

The Council of the Woman's Auxiliary will hold its annual session in Christ Church the second week after Easter. The branches of the Woman's Auxiliary in the two parishes of Vicksburg are planning to entertain the Council jointly and an interesting program is being arranged. The Juniors expect to give the little play, "Mannana," during the Council. The Bishop will preach the Council sermon.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The Schuylkill County Clericus held its March meeting on Monday, March 4, at the rectory of St. Stephen's Church, Mount Carmel, as the guests of the Rev. Warren Yeakel. The paper on "The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit" was read by the Rev. Alfred Q. Plank, of St. Paul's Church, Minersville.

The Archdeaconry of Reading will hold its spring session in April at St. Peter's Church, Hazleton.

The Archbishop of York Speaks to Large Crowds in New York.

Not since Phillips Brooks preached on week days in Trinity Church, New York, many years ago, has the Wall Street district, the men who handle the finances of the world, been so stirred as by the Archbishop of York in his daily talks from Trinity pulpit. In the Church were men of national affairs, and what the Archbishop said to them was reported by the newspapers and read by all America. The numbers present each day were exceeded by the numbers who tried to hear, for vestibules were filled far beyond the hearing limit, and on all days, fifteen minutes or more before the hour to start the service, people arrived only to find they could not get in. A church ten times as large could readily have been filled.

Apart from the Trinity addresses, the Archbishop was received by the Chamber of Commerce and other organizations, and spoke to the Church Mission of Help and the Girls' Friendly Society, assembled in force in Synod Hall. Every possible honor was showered upon the Archbishop, and every opportunity given him to speak to New York and America. And nobly did the Archbishop meet the occasions. A man among men in spite of Church of England conventionalities, everybody saw a practical man, free from affectation, easy to talk with, and right up to date in common sense and knowledge of American affairs. Indeed, he astonished New Yorkers by the accuracy of his information concerning New York and American conditions. Not in years has New York known a Lent in which one man made such a profound impression upon the public mind.

In his sermons and addresses, whether at Camp Upton, where the entire official and many of the soldier body paid him honor, before a commercial body, talking to women, or in Trinity pulpit, the Archbishop took the larger view of things. He rarely used a Bible text, or formulated anything approaching a sermon of the ordinary type. Even in the Cathedral he followed his plan. He spoke of a gospel applied to the large things of national and civic life, and especially of an applied Christianity that shall down the Huns and keep Hun kultur down forever. What he said was not always new. American preachers by the thousands have said the same things. But the Archbishop spoke in the name of Great Britain to America. The world listened and heeded. The setting fitted the occasion. There is absolutely no measure to the good the Archbishop has already done in giving New York broad views of the war problem, and of cementing the English-speaking nations now and after the Huns are licked. The service also, which the Rev. Dr. Manning and Trinity have rendered is beyond power to measure.

The following extracts from the Archbishop's address before the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York show well his practical mind, and illustrate the manner of his addresses, whether in church or on platform:

"I am speaking here not so much," he said, "for our statesmen or for our soldiers or for our sailors, but for the great mass of our hard-working people at home. You know how important it is that we should have all the shipping resources by which you can help and sustain us. You have an immense problem in the transporting and maintaining of your own army, but, believe me, anything that you can do to facilitate and hasten the construction and the filling of ships immediately and directly for our aid will do more than anything else to put fresh heart and life into our people after the strain of these three and a half years of war. It would be idle to disguise the fact that the cry which comes to us is ever the same, 'Ships, more ships, and still more ships.'"

"Gentlemen, you will not suppose for a moment that I am here in the guise of a suppliant either for sympathy or for help. No. Our old country has many abuses. A chimney that has smoked so long must needs have some soot in it. We are less able, I dare say, in some ways to adapt ourselves quickly to a new situation, but I know that the old country, with all its difficulties, is still, in heart and mind, strong and resolute, and it is not as a suppliant but rather as a comrade who, because he is fighting as strongly as he can, wants the grasp of a hand stronger and fresher than his own, that I would ask you—but I know that it is unnecessary to ask—that I would ask you to do everything you can with all your resources, to hasten and speed the help that you can give us."

"The government war arsenals," he said, "have increased from five to one hundred and fifty. There are not less than five thousand huge establishments entirely under the control of the government, devoted to the manufacture of munitions of war. And besides these there are ten thousand contractors ceaselessly engaged in the same great enterprise."

"Meanwhile, in all this great strain on our womanhood and our manhood, there is our effort to improve our production of food. I think—I do not know about Germany—we are the only country in Europe that in spite of the war has increased enormously its production of food. We have determined to lay down under plow one new acre for every four previously cultivated. Three millions of acres are scheduled, and of that task one-third has already been accomplished. You know as well as I do how, in spite of this, people have begun to feel real privation in the matter of food. It is not a thing to exaggerate. Our people, gentlemen, like our soldiers, cherish our national birthright of the right of grumbling, but all our grumbling is only on the surface.

"How is it possible, gentlemen," the Archbishop concluded, "that, having been brought as close as we are, speaking the same language, sharing these common memories, and uniting in this common sacrifice for common ideals, we should ever trouble ourselves again with the memories of misunderstandings of times long passed?"

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Silver City: In the resignation of the Rev. Robert E. Browing as rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Silver City, a distinct loss is felt, for he has done an excellent work there; but he has felt that there is a higher call for needed work, as he now goes to be a chaplain in the army.

In this parish, with one hundred and eighty-five communicants, a good church building and a rectory, and with church property worth $17,000, there is a wide field of usefulness.

New Mexico, at this time, needs several good and efficient clergy. The mission at Farmington is still without a clergyman.

The difficulties in New Mexico are many; the high cost of living, indifference to all religion on the part of many, and the many different races of people—Mexicans, Indians and foreigners from Europe and Asia. But in spite of difficulties, progress is made, the number of communicants is increasing, and church property is being acquired. When Bishop Dunlop came in the year 1880 there were probably less than one hundred communicants, and there were only two or three inexpensive buildings as church property. Now there are, in New Mexico alone (not counting that portion of the district in Texas), about 1,600 communicants and church property worth over $100,000.

That gifted mystic and poet, William Blake, in his book on Jerusalem, has a plate of the crucifixion. The atmosphere is sombre, save for one thin ray of sunshine that reveals Christ on the cross, and at the foot of the cross, not the fainting mother, not the beloved disciple, not the centurion or Joseph of Arimathea, but a solitary human figure of indistinguishable type, with outstretched arms, gazing upwards to the Christ. It is the very daring of genius, which in the moment of His supreme weakness sets the world with its wistful, passionate gesture of appeal in the presence of the Sufferer. And yet, perhaps, it is neither genius nor daring which accomplished so bold an utterance of sacred art, but simple understanding of our Lord's own mind. We also can show how brave and loyal and victorious Christian souls can still be, and if we thus range ourselves on the Lord's side and claim, with proud humility, that He still draws all men unto Him and does not disappoint them when they come.—A. Connell.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Virginia is sending out to a number of prominent laymen of the Church the following letter:

"The Social Service Commission of the Diocese has formulated a plan for service in which we very heartily desire to enlist your co-operation.

"The Commission believes that the Church can seize a vital opportunity on behalf of the nation by carrying to the people through the Diocese a message of the spiritual meaning and urgency of this war. We are convinced that the war can be successfully waged and nobly won only as there is created back of it that spirit which is born of an intelligent appreciation of the nation's motives and ideals. In the small towns and country parishes, where the chance for discussion and public information is limited, there is a special field for the Church to take the leadership in this time. Upon the awakened sentiment of the people will depend not only the success of such obvious enterprises as the sale of Liberty Loans and of Thrift Stamps, and of subscriptions to the Red Cross, but the still more basic creation of that enduring morale which will make the nation able to bear courageously the sacrifice which this war will entail, and carry it through to a worthy end with the unflinching fortitude of those who feel themselves committed to a cause which enlists their deep and religious loyalty.

"What the Social Service Commission desires to do, therefore, is to awaken a group of men who will be willing to go upon occasion into parishes where our ministers may organize public gatherings for them to address. No one speaker would be called upon more than a few times, and each engagement would be subject to his convenience as to the date. Added to this letter is a list of those who, together with yourself, we are asking to volunteer for service. When we have received the acceptances of this group, we shall write immediately to our ministers in the Diocese, asking that they organize public meetings in their parishes, and write to the Secretary of this Commission when they desire a speaker. The Secretary will then communicate with that one of our speakers who can most conveniently reach that parish. We shall ask the local committee which organizes each meeting to provide the traveling expenses and the entertainment of the speaker.

"May we not hope to have, if possible by return mail, your acceptance of our urgent invitation to you to be one of these speakers?"

For all those who in institutional churches and other like agencies have tried to make organized Christianity minister to life in its physical and mental as well as spiritual aspects, there is stimulus to new conviction and earnestness in this report made last week by the medical corps of the British army. The report recommends a system of compulsory physical culture for all men and women, covering a period of several years after they leave school.

"Everyone who has studied our industrial system," says the report, "comes to the same conclusion—men wear out too soon. In many vocations a man is an old man before he reaches his fortieth year. This is premature and, for the most part, unnecessary, and it constitutes a serious national economic loss. By improving a man's physique and assisting him to form healthy habits, ten or fifteen years can be added to his industrial efficiency, and a substantial contribution will be made to the wealth and prosperity of the country.

"Men of the laboring classes wear out earlier than men of other classes, because they have no break or variation in their work, no rest, no change. It is not effort, but continuous monotonous labor which ages a man."

An executive order by the Secretary of the Navy last week interdicted all sale of liquor in the cities of Newport, R. I., Annapolis, Md., and Vallejo, Cal., because they lie within zones drawn around great naval training stations for the sake of which Congress has given authority for the establishment of local prohibition.

It is interesting to note the reasons that led to the issuance of the orders.

The ordnance inspectors at Newport had warned the Navy Department that unless the liquor menace could be eliminated there would be danger that intoxication might bring about an explosion which would not only surpass the great explosion at Halifax but seriously imperil the war interests of the government. At Newport is the great torpedo factory and storehouse of the navy. Enormous quantities of torpedoes are stored there.

The Naval Academy is the seat of instruction for midshipmen and the other places are all permanent training stations.

The order provides that within the five-mile zones alcoholic liquors, including beer, ale and wine, shall not, either directly or indirectly, be sold, given, served or knowingly delivered by one person to another, except that this shall not apply to the giving or serving of such liquor in a private home to members of the family or bona fide guests other than officers or members of the naval forces, or to the sale or gift of such liquor by registered pharmacists to licensed physicians or medical officers of the United States for medical purposes, or to the administering of such liquor by them for this purpose. The shipment of liquor to any place within these zones is also prohibited, except to a private home or to registered pharmacists, licensed physicians or medical officers for medical purposes.

Outside of these zones, liquor shall not, directly or indirectly, be sold, given, served, or knowingly delivered to any officer or member of the naval forces, except for medical purposes by a licensed physician or medical officer, with the provision that the regulation shall not apply to the giving or serving of such liquor in a private home to members of the family or bona fide guests. Secretary Daniels, however, hopes that the public at large will refrain from offering to members of the naval forces, particularly the younger element, any intoxicating liquor, even in private homes outside of the "dry zones."

Under date of March 1, 1918, the commandant of the Second Naval District, with headquarters at Newport, stated in a letter to the department as follows:

"I hope you will permit me to urge, with all the emphasis of which I am capable, that the sale of intoxicating liquor be immediately prohibited, not only in Newport, but in every place within five miles of any part of the naval station, Newport, R. I., or the repair plant of the Second Naval District at Newport.

"We owe it to these young men to surround them with the best possible conditions, moral, mental, physical and spiritual. If we can prevent them from being led into temptation, it is our obvious duty to do so. More than one terrible temptation would be removed if Newport and vicinity were dry."

The significant fact of the times is that the mind of the nation is asking why, if the above conclusions are true in war time and for men in uniform they are not equally true for all times and for all the people; and the question is being answered.

The Southern Sociological Congress will meet this year in Birmingham from April 14th to 17th.

The convention will be held under the auspices of the Southern Sociological Congress and the Birmingham Civic Association. Delegates are to be appointed by the governors of the sixteen Southern States, mayors of cities and heads of institutions of education and social service.

The Federal Government is co-operating most effectively and will be represented on the program by some of the ablest speakers from the Department of Agriculture, the Federal Food Administration, the Department of Labor, the Bureau of Education, the Children's Bureau, the United States Public Health Service and the American Red Cross. The governments of France and Great Britain will be represented by speakers appointed by the ambassadors of these nations. Several of the leading national organizations have appointed speakers, including the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, the International Y. M. C. A. Committee, the Anti-Saloon League and the American Federation of Labor. The governors of several States have already accepted invitations to be present and participate.

The program is built on the South's most vital resources for victory—health, food and labor—and for the purpose of organizing a crusade to enlist every man, woman and child in the South to fight disease and produce food in every possible manner during this critical year. The watchword of this Congress and the win-the-war campaign for health, food and labor will be "Make the home line as efficient and patriotic as the firing line!"

God still watches over His Church. He brings to naught the devices of the foolish. He looks with tender care on all our weaknesses. He cherishes and crowns that sincerity whose motto is, "In Thy Name."

Fifth Sunday in Lent: The morning Old Testament lessons during Lent of the second year (both Sundays and week days) constitute a study of the experience of God's people in exile: how and why they were carried into Babylon; what they learned while there; and their coming out in accordance with God's promises: this on Easter. This parallels the similar use of the experience of the children of Israel in Egypt during Lent of the first year. The first lesson for Sunday morning takes up again the sin of Judah that made necessary the discipline of the exile and incidentally sheds a flood of light on what is meant by the Anger or Wrath of God. "I poured forth my fury upon them," says Ezekiel, "for the blood they had shed and for their idols." But right along side of this is the same promise of restoration that we read in last Sunday's lesson, though carried out much more fully: "A new heart will I give you and a new spirit will I put within you and cause you to walk in my statutes." Restoration was to mean not merely change of place, but of nature; regeneration. The New Testament lesson from Hebrews shows how this promise was fulfilled as to its depth of spiritual meaning, only through our Lord Jesus Christ, who is there declared to have inaugurated the new covenant. Both these lessons are in line with the teaching of the Epistle in which, on this Passion Sunday, the sacrifice of our Lord is described as an offering of Himself, through eternal Spirit, without spot to God; and in both lesson and Epistle the sacrifice of the Christ is designed to be followed by a similar consecration of ourselves. Christ as our Redeemer is something more than and other than our substitute. The "blood of Christ" is to "purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God"; and in the second lesson sin under the new covenant of grace is worse than under the law. This, too, corresponds with the regeneration associated in Ezekiel's mind with restoration and with the teaching of Micah in the Old Testament alternate; where "doing justly, loving mercy and walking humbly with our God" is given as the true idea of sacrifice. Never was such teaching more needed than now, when so often the suffering Christ is impaled between an ecclesiastical legalism and an unethical, sordid, so-called evangelicalism, in which connection the proposed collect of 1688* for this Sunday is worth thinking about, though, as a minor point, the present collect is admirably illustrated by the Old Testament lesson ("governed and preserved in body and soul"). The evening lessons were selected with a view to Passion Sunday: in the second lesson our Lord foretells His Passion and follows that, in line with other scriptures for this day, with the insistence upon the adoption by His disciples of the law of the cross for themselves; and the prophecy of the Passion (present P. B. lesson for morning) is given for Old Testament backing: "There would be a cleansing from sin (not escape from punishment), but not unaccompanied by suffering: "What are these wounds in thine hands?"

The week day selections keep to the general tenor of the Sunday lessons. The course reading of St. Luke's Gospel is concluded; Romans is concluded and the pith of the teaching has relation to true sacrifice (11:1); while the prophetic readings have regard to the new covenant and the Messiah to come.

That Difficult Class of Boys.

The Sunday-school teacher who is alert will find little difficulty in holding the attention of any class of boys, if he will take advantage of what is happening at the present moment in Palestine. Here is the change of a lifetime to turn the naturally martial spirit of the boy toward the spiritual mastery which is shown in the willingness of the true Christian soldier to do and to dare for the maintenance of righteousness, justice and peace on the earth. How easy it will be to show that God is a covenant God who keeps His promises forever, and that He is the rewarder of all those who trust in Him! How interesting to speak of the surrender of Bethlehem, the taking of Jerusalem, Joppa, Gaza, Beersheba, Nazareth, the imminent fall of Jericho! The scenes in the lives of Joshua, Samuel, David, the Exiles; the birth and life of our Blessed Lord, the journeys of St. Paul, the fall of Jerusalem, will take such hold on the imagination of the boy that he will never forget them. There is enough material here for a six months' course which may be extended with the trend of events in the Holy Land. We have here an opportunity which, like many others, must be taken now if we are to gain by it.—Wyoming Churchman.

The Secret of Vitality.

If the modern Church would let more be done for it, it would be more robust. In a searching inquiry into "the secret of vitality in the Pauline Churches," Professor H. R. Mackintosh, in the International Review of Missions, intimates that it was because they knew how to take. "No word," says he, "recurs with more arresting emphasis in the Epistles of St. Paul than the word 'receive.'" We have received "the atonement," "the spirit of adoption," "Jesus Christ." "Clearly what creates the Church and gives it continuously prevailing strength is the fact that it takes the materials of its life humbly and perpetually from the hand of God. The first work of the true Church is not willingness to serve, but the grateful and passionate humility that will take." The Church has multiplied its machinery in its well-meaning but mistaken conviction that it must do in order to live and get on. May Paul's prayer, "May you be filled with all the fulness of God," be answered in us till we can say, in truth, "Of His fulness have all we received."—Exchange.

Teach me to follow in Thy steps
Where'er on earth I be,
Thou gentle Shepherd of my soul,
My trust is all in Thee.
Help me to bear each grief and pain
And ev'ry earthly loss—
With meek submission, that I, too,
May learn to share Thy Cross.

When in the coming twilight years
My sands of life are run,
And brightest hours at evening's close
Fade with the setting sun—
May Thy Hand guide me safely on Thro' death's dark vale of night,
And lead me to the glorious dawn
Of Thine eternal light.

Christ's Method of Reasoning.

The gospel for the fifth Sunday in Lent (John 8:46-59) gives an example of our Lord's mode of reasoning. It is not the logical method, the praxis that makes use of syllogisms. That method is a human device by which the human mind, through premises and conclusions and their relations, laboriously reaches its rationalized results. If Jesus had used that method, He would have proved by that very token that He was only human like the rest of us.

No; Christ used the untuitional method, which might be defined as the appeal to pure truth and experience as they make their impingement on the spiritual consciousness. Let us study this lesson, or as much of it as our space will permit these facts in mind.

First, our Lord makes this challenge to His accusers: "Which of you convinceth Me of sin?" (American Revised Version). They had accused Him of falsehood because He bore witness of Himself; they also sought to kill Him because of the trenchant things He had been saying to them. Note His mode of reasoning. He challenges them to convict Him of a single sin. It was a direct appeal to their consciousness, knowledge, consciences. As if He had said: "I have been living among you, doing my miracles to all classes, and living without moral fault among you. Are these the marks of one who bears a false message, of one who means to deceive? Can perfect moral purity go with such deception as you attribute to me? If I were actuated by such motives, would not My acts and words betray Me somewhere? How can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit?"

But you will at once discern the labored process of reasoning by which we, a mere human writer, must work out these conclusions. Not so with Jesus. He simply appealed to the intuitions and consciences of His auditors, and permitted them spontaneously to draw the proper conclusion.

Follow the narrative further. "If I say the truth, why do ye not believe Me? Another direct appeal to conscience, as if He were to say: "Just lay aside all prejudice and listen to Me sincerely, and see whether My truth will not convince you." Then He makes a fundamental statement: "He that is of God heareth the words of God, for this cause ye hear them not, because ye are not of God."

What would a man trained in discursive methods of reasoning think of that? He would say it was a case of "begging the question." The very premise to be proven is taken for granted. Yes, such would be the issue with mere human logic; but that was not our divine Lord's method, which was the method of stating the pure truth from the truth's viewpoint. When men are full of prejudice and anger, as the Jews were at that time, the logical method would be of no avail, but the appeal to intuition might be. This is the method of Christ: "I am from God and speak His words; this must be true because you cannot convict Me of a single moral fault. Then surely, if you were of God, if you had God's Spirit within you, you would gladly receive My testimony." It was the appeal to conscience, not to the merely dialectical faculty. It was just what the Lord had said to Nicodemus: "Except any one be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Or what St. Paul afterward declared: "The carnal mind is enmity against God." It would be as if today some skeptic would want to thrash you by an argument, a purely logical process, and you were to say to him, "My brother, a man must be regenerated in order to know and appreciate spiritual truth." That would be the fundamental way to put the matter. As a human reasoner, you might use the logical process upon him, and might do him some good, though the danger is that he might soon ask you a number of questions which you could not answer. However, if you were to go to the root of the matter at once, you would not argue, but would make your appeal to the need of a spiritual experience. Christ, being divine, mostly used the fundamental method, not the indirect and labored process of human reasoning; and thus He proved that He was divine.

We cannot, for want of space, pursue the gospel lesson further, but hope the reader will study the remaining statements of Christ in the light of Christ's fundamental and therefore divine mode of argument.—Lutheran Church Work and Observer.

One Boy's Bit.

In one of our attacks on the Somme, all the observers up forward were uncertain as to what had happened. We didn't know whether our infantry had captured their objective, failed, or gone beyond it. The battle-field, as far as eye could reach, was a bath of mud. It is extremely easy, in the excitement of an offensive, when all landmarks are blotted out, for our storming parties to lose their sense of direction. If this happens, a number of dangers may result. A battalion may find itself "up in the air," which means that it has failed to connect with the battalions on its right and left; its flanks are then exposed to the enemy. It may advance too far, and start digging itself in at a point where it was previously arranged that our artillery should place their protective wall of fire. We, being up forward as artillery observers, are the eyes of the army. It is our business to watch for such contingencies, to keep in touch with the situation as it progresses, and to send our information back as quickly as possible. We were peering through our glasses from our point of vantage when, far away in the thickest of the battle-smoke, we saw a white flag wagging, sending back messages. The flag-wagging was repeated desperately it was evident that no one had replied, and probable that no one had picked up the messages. A signaler who was with us read the language for us. A company of infantry had advanced too far; most of them were wounded, very many of them dead, and they were in danger of being surrounded. They asked for our artillery to place a curtain of fire in front of them, and for reinforcements to be sent up.

We at once phoned the orders through to our artillery and notified the infantry headquarters of the division that was holding that front. But it was necessary to let those chaps know that we were aware of their predicament. They'd hang on if they knew that; otherwise—

Without orders our signaller was getting his flags ready. If he hopped out of the trench onto the parapet, he didn't stand a fifty-fifty chance. The Hun was familiar with our observation station and strafed it with persistent regularity.

The signaler turned to the senior officer present, "What will I send them, sir?"

"Tell them their messages have been received and that help is coming."

Out the chap scrambled, a flag in either hand—he was nothing but a boy. He ran crouching like a rabbit to a hump of mud where his figure would show up against the sky. His flags commenced wagging. "Messages received. Help coming." They didn't see him at first. He had to repeat the words. He watched them breathlessly. We knew what would happen; at last it happened. A Hun observer had spotted him and flashed the target back to his guns. All about him the mud commenced to leap and bubble. He went on signaling the good word to those stranded men up front. "Messages received. Help coming." At last they'd seen him. They were signaling, "O. K." It was at that moment that a whizz-bang lifted him off his feet and landed him all of a huddle. His "bit!" It was what he'd volunteered to do, when he came from Canada. The signaled "O. K." in the battle smoke was like a testimony to his character.—Conigsby Dawson, Lieutenant in the Canadian Field Artillery, in Good Housekeeping.

The Valley of Vision.

Isaiah speaks of the "valley of vision." The phrase is very suggestive and presents an unusual idea. It is to the mountain top and other high eminences that men think they must go in order to see. The valley hinders vision and narrows the horizon. Distances are cut off by the surrounding hills. So men climb to the heights to see.

But we sometimes forget that mountain-top vision, too, is limited quite as much so as valley vision. While great distances may be swept by the eye, things appear in outline only, indistinct and blurred. Detail and individuality are lacking.

In the valley we see things close at hand. The forest is not now a confused group of trees, but each stands out distinctly and is known by its family name. The river is no longer a mere silvery seam drawn carelessly across the land, but a living, bubbling, edifying artery carrying life and verdure wherever its winding course lies. Beautiful flowers smile up from the most unexpected places; they never could have been seen from the mountain-top. The birds in their gayety of color are seen flitting to and fro, while they fill the air with their melody. And we become conscious of a thousand things we never could have known had we never come down from the lofty eminence.

We are learning this more and more. The telescope must share honor with the microscope. There is more to be seen in the valley than on the mountain.

All of this is equally true in the spiritual realm. Mountain-top experiences, of course, are needed, too; but let us thank God for the "vision in the valley." Ah, what visions of truth have come to such as have walked there. Many a man has said that no price could buy from him what his soul saw and experienced when walking through the valley of sickness and bereavement and disappointment and trial. New glory has come into his life, and God is more real.—Evangelical Messenger.

Couer De Lion!

("We hope, by God's Grace, to receive the Holy City of Jerusalem."—Richard, Couer de Lion, A. D., 1191.)

Wake from thy slumbering, Heart of the Lion!

Rise from the dreams of it, centuries old.

Look ye from Ascalon eastward to Zion, Where in the dawning our banners unfold!

Over the domes of the infidel enemy Blows the Red Cross of the Crusaders' might!

Over the sepulchre, over Gethsemane, Ay, over Calvary, glowing with light!

Godfrey de Bouillon speeds with the tidings, Stirred, too, from dreams in von Hollest Crypt,

High in his stirrups, the dust of his stridings

Staining the Crescent from Saladin stripped!

Nay, royal sire!—no mirage of hope dying,

Fruit of the Dead Sea or figment of sleep!—

Saladin's slain and his Saracens flying!

God and St. George o'er Jerusalem sweep!

Family Religion.

The term is a vague one. No one can define it. And yet all who know the sweetness and power of home ties, on the one hand, and the nature and claims of religion on the other, appreciate something of its meaning.

Having daily family prayer is not family religion. It is an essential expression of it, however. Family religion is not apt to thrive where the family altar has not a daily sacrifice offered to God. Having the children to spend a certain number of hours on Sunday in the home study of the Bible and in religious reading is not family religion. It is needful to it, though. If the young and old people in the home do not take ample time to become acquainted with God's Word and to read of His works, the love of Him will not be apt to dwell long in their breasts. Spending much time in religious song, concerted singing of God's praises, is not family religion. It is a wonderful stimulus, however, and the memories of afternoons and evenings given to religious singing are among the most precious and lasting as one goes down the lower end of the pathway of life.

Praying, reading, singing at home are only expressions of what may be regarded as religion permeating the family life. The ideal family is first of all one whose united head, the husband and wife, are one in the Lord as well as one in heart, mind, purpose and life. The husband and wife sustain and encourage as well as help each other in so disposing their separate and joint affairs as to secure perfect freedom in giving to Christ all the time, effort, duty and offering which belong to Him as Saviour, Lord and Friend. Next, they regard their children as heirs to a covenant which God has made. They keep before them from the very dawn of their young lives that the duty they owe to Christ is paramount, that nothing is to come before it. They exercise their parental, God-given authority in directing the actions and making the habits of their children so that these will always accord with the children's covenant relations. They never allow them to think that they may neglect the house of God or the family altar any more than they let them think they may neglect the morning or noonday or evening meal, or the school-room. They keep them subject to themselves in discipline. They regard it as just as much their duty to train them to take their places among God's people as to educate them for taking their places creditably and becomingly in the world. They teach them, above all, the fundamental principles of obedience and reverence. A Christian father and mother, having their children in rightful subjection, diligently teaching them by precept and example the way of the Lord, and lovingly and faithfully requiring of them attendance upon and respect for the outward expression of the faith, make a home where, without defining or bounding it, "family religion" may be truly said to dwell.

Out of such a family will come the strongest characters among men. Taught to respect authority and revere those who are invested with authority, they grow up into stalwart men and women who in knowing how to obey know also how to rule. The best citizenship, the highest business integrity, the most beautiful womanhood, the richest and sweetest domestic virtues are developed in this atmosphere. If governmental paternalism could be made to command the home with a view to its giving in the years to come strength to the nation and prosperity to business, commerce and social life, it could not effect its end better than by making homes where "family religion" prevails, where "the heart of the fathers is turned to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers."—Ex.

Our New Opportunity.

When the Christmas membership drive gained some sixteen million new members, it proved that the American Red Cross had to offer an opportunity to serve and sacrifice, shoulder to shoulder, in a great cause.

The recruiting was on a tremendous scale because each one wanted to give—and to give without waste; to give in such a way that the giving would do the most good. Powerless as an individual, each felt his strength grow as the number of his comrades grew. Since Christmas he has felt a giant indeed: and as a giant capable of giant deeds.

The membership in the American Red Cross is now a fifth of our total population of over one hundred millions. It is difficult to grasp what this means. It does not mean, simply, that number of men, women and children—a fact stupendous enough in itself.

The American Red Cross is not physical—or at least not mainly physical. It is not even the men and women who make up the organization. It is the total of the sympathy and affection of its members. It is the expression of the patriotism and solidity of the nation—as well as it is the fighter behind the line.

Red Cross truly is a term of the spirit. Membership in it means spiritual communion in a nation's patriotism. To each one of these sixteen million new recruits the American Red Cross offers the right hand of fellowship.

This great army, throbbing with sympathy and affection, carries its message to our soldiers and sailors on land and sea; and acts as the link between the fighting line and the folks at home. Our allies look upon us as a source of strength and an earnest of faithful endeavor. If we shall do our part we shall not only shorten the war itself, but contribute much to a future lasting peace.

An important step in the control of retail food prices has been taken by the Food Administration in a national campaign to obtain pledges from all of the 400,000 food retailers of the country that they will maintain fair prices, and take no more than a reasonable profit.

Returns of the first week's drive for grocers' signed pledges show that 1,781 food retailers in Virginia have pledged themselves to give customers the benefit of fair and moderate prices.

Customers should look in every food store for the red and black poster, bearing the seal of the Food Administration, which shows that the merchant has signed the pledge. The pledge, which appears on the poster, reads as follows:

"We pledge ourselves to give our customers the benefit of fair and moderate prices, selling at no more than a reasonable profit above cost to us."

This pledge is voluntary and it is believed that all merchants will be eager to sign it, because customers will be asked to look for it whenever they go into a store to buy.

Wherever the pledge poster is not in evidence representatives of the National and State Food Administrators have instructions to endeavor to learn why. If the poster appears in any store which is not maintaining fair prices the State Administrator has authority to remove it and report the name of the merchant to the Food Administration in Washington.

Some of the controlled commodities are apples, dried; beans, canned and dried; bread, butter, cheese, cooking fats; canned corn, corn grits, fish, oatmeal and rolled oats, oleomargarine, pork, fresh and cured; peas, canned and dried; poultry, prunes, raisins and rice, sugar, syrup, canned tomatoes and fresh vegetables.

If we could only redeem all the power centered on mere money-making and turn it to the use of cities and States, how soon the kingdom of God would come! If only we could take this uncontrollable eulogy and baptize it, and consecrate and bow it to the seeking of the kingdom of God, how the glory of the kingdom of God would light all our skies with the glory of a divine dawn!—G. G. Atkins.

For the Young Folks

Growing Smiles.

A smile is quite a funny thing;
It wrinkles up your face,
And when it's gone, you never find
Its secret hiding place.

But far more wonderful it is
To see what smiles can do;
You smile at one, he smiles at you,
And so one smile makes two.

He smiles at someone, since you smiled,
And then that one smiles back,
And that one smiles, until in truth
You fall in keeping track.

And, since a smile can do great good
By cheering hearts of care,
Let's smile and smile, and not forget
That smiles go everywhere!

The Seven Sleepers.

"Safe from sorrow and sin and death," read mother as she finished the legend of the Saints at Ephesus, "the seven sleep sweet in that cave until Christ cometh again."

The Band was spending two winter days and nights at the cabin.

"I wisht, I wisht," said Alice at last, "that I could see the nice dear sleepers."

"Well," said the captain from the depths of a monstrous rocking-chair, "there are seven other sleepers who live not far from this cabin, but they aren't saints by any means. Some are gentle and some are fierce."

"Tell us," chorused the Band from in front of the fire that roared in the great arched fireplace.

"The first one," said the captain, "is big and black and dangerous."

"Bumbly-bee!" shouted Alice. "That's big an' black an' very dangerous," she explained, "'cause once I tried to tame one an' he bit me norful."

"No," said the captain, "this is a big, black, growly animal who wears an overcoat of four inches of fur and an under-coat of four inches of fat. He isn't afraid of the cold, but he finds that rent is cheaper than board. So he sleeps all winter instead of eating." "Bear," shouted all but one of the Band.

"Bumbly-bee," piped Alice, who was never known to change an opinion.

"Once," said the captain, "I knew two boys—one was twelve and the other was ten years old. They went off hunting up in Maine in March. One had a muzzle-loading shotgun and the other had a long stick. They found a little hole in a bank," he went on, "and the boy with the stick poked. He felt something soft, so he kept on poking. 'I think there's something here,' he said. There was. All of a sudden the whole bank caved in and out rushed a big, black, cross bear. You see," explained the captain, "they had poked right into the airhole of a bear-den. The snow was so deep that they couldn't run, and the bear could climb a tree much faster than they could. So what do you suppose they did?"

"I guess," remarked Alice resentfully, "that they wisht it had been a bumbly-bee."

"Go on!" shouted the rest with one accord.

"The little chap with the stick," continued the captain, "got behind the big one with the gun who was shaking like anything. 'Don't you miss,' he said, 'cause this stick isn't very sharp.' 'All right,' said the big boy, and he waited until he saw the white spot that showed under the bear's chin when it reared up on its hind legs not six feet away. The shot crashed right through the bear's throat and he fell dead so close to their feet that the hot blood stained the shoes of the boy in front. They got ten dollars for the skin, and ten dollars bounty, and about three million dollars of glory."

"Tell some more," chorused the Band when he stopped for breath.

"Well," meditated the captain, "there was my great, great Uncle Jake who fought in the Revolution and was a famous bear-hunter. One day during a January thaw he was coming down Pond Hill when he stepped into a mushy place back of a patch of bushes and sank in up to his waist. He felt something soft under his feet, and he stamped on it. The next second," said the captain impressively, "he wished he hadn't, for a big animal rose right up under him, and the next thing poor Uncle Jake knew he was astride a bear going down hill like mad, riding bear-back as it were."

Mother gave a deep groan and buried her face in her hands; but the rest of the Band were too young to be affected by the pun.

"He didn't want to stay on, and he didn't dare to get off," resumed the captain hurriedly, "so he drew his hunting knife and waited until the old bear reached level ground and just stabbed him dead right through his neck."

"Tell us about some more," urged Trottie when the captain stopped for breath.

"Some of the gently ones," suggested Henny, beginning to look around anxiously at the dark corners.

"Well," said the captain, "there's a gray greedy one who goes to bed early, just a loose bag of fat. That's the woodchuck. Then there's a nice striped one with pockets in his cheeks, who always takes a quart or so of nuts and seeds to bed with him in case he gets hungry in the night. That's the chipmunk."

"Nice, dear chippy nipmunk," explained Alice to the third.

"Then comes a chap with a funny face and a ringed tail and whose hind-paws make a track like a baby's foot. That's the raccoon. The next one is pretty dangerous," continued the captain. "He is black and white and has a long bushy tail. He won't turn out of his way for anybody, but he'll always give any one that comes up to him three signals before he defends himself. First," said the captain, "he'll stamp his forefeet. Second, he'll raise his long bushy tail. If you still keep on coming he gives the third and last signal. He waves the end of his tail back and forth. If you stand still," finished the captain impressively, "or move backward, you are safe even then, but if you take one step forward—you'll have to buy a new suit of clothes."

"I know," remarked the third wisely. "Bill Darby and I caught one in a trap once. He said it was an albino woodchuck. But it was a skunk—an' we had to live in our bathing suits for nearly a week."

"The next sleeper," said the captain, "has wings."

"A bumbly-bee," tried Alice again.

"No," returned the captain patiently, "this is an animal with a very ugly face and leathery brown wings with hooks on the top. When it goes to sleep for the winter it catches these little hooks on a rafter or beam in some dark corner of a building or steeple. Then it turns and hangs by the long curved nails of its hind feet and goes to sleep upside down. It makes a very high squeak when it flies, and sometimes it comes into houses hunting mosquitoes. It never does any harm, and it does a great deal of good; but silly people," went on the captain severely, looking straight at Trottie, "sometimes kill them with tennis rackets."

"I won't kill any more bats," murmured Trottie penitently.

"Last of all," resumed the captain, "is the dear little jumping-mouse. He has big eyes and floppy ears and a long, long tail. If you boys could jump as far in proportion to your height as Mr. Jumping-Mouse does, you would clear two hundred and forty feet every time you jumped. Before the frost comes he makes a round warm nest of leaves and soft grass, far underground. There he rolls himself into a round ball and sleeps until spring."

"I like the cuddly jumpy-mouse the best," said Alice sleepily.

Then mother announced that it was bedtime for seven other sleepers.

"Just one minute," said the captain. "I want to read the Band a very, very beautiful poem which has the names of the seven animals that sleep all winter, so that the Band can remember them. I know it's a beautiful poem," he finished modestly, "because I wrote it myself."

"Here is the poem:

The Seven Sleepers.

"The bat and the bear they never care,
What winter winds may blow,
The jumping-mouse in his cosy house
Is safe from ice and snow,
The chipmunk and the woodchuck,
The skunk who's slow but sure,
The ringed raccoon, who hates the moon,
Have found for cold the cure."

Who Sat Beside Mother?

"Mother, hasn't old Miss Joynes a funny voice when she sings? I 'most laughed out loud when I heard that squeaky sound."

Little Cary Marsh was tripping home from church between her father and mother. She felt like a very good little girl; for she had sat quietly through the long sermon (at least it seemed long to Cary), had sung out of mother's hymn book, and had bowed her head at prayers. Another reason that Cary was satisfied with herself was that she had on her new dress and her Sunday hat. She had looked at all the little girls sitting near her in church and had decided that none of them had on as nice clothes as she had.

"I like to come to church," Cary said to herself, "when I've got a new dress to wear."

And then she had found old Miss Joynes' squeaky singing very funny, as she said on her way home.

But instead of answering her question and saying, "O yes, Miss Joynes' singing was funny to-be-sure," Cary's mother asked the little girl a question: "What were you thinking about, Cary, while you were singing so nicely off my hymn book?"

"Ma'am?" Cary exclaimed in surprise.

"I noticed how well you carried the tune," said Mrs. Marsh, "and how well you read the words while we were singing 'O Jesus, thou art standing outside the fast-closed door.' Were you thinking about the dear Lord as you sang and how He wants to come into our hearts by His Spirit and make us love what is pure and right?"

Cary did not answer for a minute; she was thinking back. Then, as she was a truthful little person, she said with a queer half smile: "No, mamma, I was thinking that if I couldn't sing any better than Miss Joynes I wouldn't sing at all."

"And how about the prayer time, when you bowed your head; were you trying to lift up your heart and ask God to make you His obedient child?"

"No, ma'am," said Cary, her little face getting red; "I opened my eyes and counted the tacks in the carpet. Do you think God was mad with me, mother?"

"O no," answered her mother, smiling. "He knows what a little girl you are, but I think He was sorry you were not at church."

"Not at church!" cried Cary. "Why, mother, I was sitting right beside you all the time."

"Yes; but I don't think God counts where our bodies are. He is always seeing our spirits; and when we go to church and don't lift up our hearts to God, the place where we sit looks empty to Him."

Cary walked along very soberly for a while; and then, brightening suddenly, she said: "I 'spect God saw Miss Joynes at church to-day."

"Sure," Cary's father said, thinking it was time for him to have a part in the conversation; "and I have an idea that her squeaky voice made a beautiful sound by the time it got to God's ear."

They had reached home, and nothing more was said about church right then. But Cary made up her mind that God was going to see a whole little girl, body and spirit, too, sitting beside her mother next Sunday.—Elizabeth Preston Allan, in Pearls for Little Ones.

Little Sister's Sewing.

When little sister tries to sew,
She takes some silk or calico
And sticks her needle in and out,
Then back and forth and all about,
And, pulling it this way and that,
She makes the doll a dress or hat;
And then, as pleased as pleased can be
She brings it round for me to see,
And always waits to hear me say,
"Oh, see what sister's made to-day!"
I would not be unkind or jeer,
Or let her think her work looked queer,
For though I'm nine and know quite well
The way to hem and shirr and fell,
Still I remember, long ago,
How hard it was to learn to sew.

The Boy Who Was Ready.

The boys' line was perfect. With heads erect, chins tucked in, and backs as stiff and straight as broomsticks they turned a splendid square corner and filed triumphantly into room five. Sunshiny Miss Fay did not smile at her faithful little pupils, however. Her dimples were all ironed out, the twinkle in her eyes had vanished, and worst sign of all there was a genuine criss-cross frown between her eyes!

"How many boys are ready for something hard?" she demanded.

Twenty-four hands flew up. (There were just twenty-four boys in the school.)

"Good!" exclaimed Miss Fay. "We can't play in Mr. Foster's field any more, boys. The principal got a letter from him last night. Now, I want you boys to remind the little fellows to stay in the school-yard. I haven't forgotten how you stopped the snowballing last winter, and I shall count on you to help me."

The boys of room five tried to smile back loyally, but it was hard work. There wasn't any playground near the school, but for years the boys had spent their recesses in Mr. Foster's field, which was big enough for two baseball diamonds with room to spare for other games.

Everybody was unhappy the first recess. The children were crowded in their own yard, and all they could do was to sit or stand around. Phil Rice, Bob Lowe, Tom Whitney and several other boys sat on the steps and looked longingly at the woods in the distance.

"Let's go to walk to-night right after school," proposed Phil.

"Let's," agreed everybody in the group.

Phil, Bob, Tom and Jamie were the first boys out that night. They waited a moment for Chester, who always mixed the "e" and "i" in receive. As soon as he had written it ten times in yellow chalk on the blackboard he joined them and the little group started off.

They followed Parker's Brook for half a mile. Phil gathered specimens of any flower he didn't know, and Bob picked an armful of black alder berries for the painting lesson the next day. Tom tried to catch a fish with his hands and tumbled in head first. He was used to duckings and laughed the loudest of all.

Suddenly Phil stood still. His head was thrown back and he sniffed the air like a hound. "I smell smoke," he announced. The others shook their heads. But Phil stood his ground. "It's up in Mr. Foster's woods. Let's run up and see."

"Don't bother," argued Chester, "if we go up there we won't have time to go through the cave."

"Mr. Foster is as mean as dirt," sputtered Tom, "and I'm not going on his land for one."

Phil didn't say a word, but sniffed the air again and started to make his way through the tangle of vines and bushes. The other boys looked after him a moment and then followed on. It was hard climbing. The bank was steep and the way was obstructed by a growth of briars and brambles.

Phil kept on doggedly and the others pressed on after him. They stopped a minute at the summit to get their breath, but Phil's eyes shone like lamps. "There it is," he shouted, "come on, boys!"

It was only a little fire, but it was burning brightly. In a few minutes it would have been beyond the boys' control. Now they ground it under their heels, and soon the bright flames were conquered and only a heap of black ashes remained.

"Good for you," said a gruff old voice, and Mr. Foster came in sight. "I smelled that fire a mile away, but my legs aren't as good as my nose. I thought the woods would be gone when I came."

He looked at the boys keenly. "I didn't know boys were so useful." He fumbled in his pocket and drew out a shabby old purse.

"We don't want any money," Phil said promptly, "but we'd like the right to play ball in your lot again."

"You've earned it," said the old man.

He scribbled a few words on his pad and gave it to Phil. "Give this to your teacher to-morrow." So at the next recess all the boys of the school got together. "Hurrah for the boys of room five!" they shouted.

Every boy cheered until he was obliged to stop for breath and then Chester climbed the fence and waved his hands. "Three cheers for the boy who was ready and saw his chance," he shouted.

So the boys started cheering all over again until Phil sensibly reminded them that recess would be over and the new football untried.—Mary Davis, in Presbyterian of the South.

A Little Girl of the Plains.

Far out on the plains of South Dakota lived little Ida Brave Boy, with her father and mother, her little brothers and sisters. All around stretched the prairie, green in the summer and brown in the winter, unless the prairie fires turned it to sooty black. Away in the distance was a range of low hills with the silver thread of a stream running through them. Along its banks were bushes and wild plum trees.

Ida's home was a tent, and for playmates she had her little brothers and sisters, some fat puppies, and a pony all her own, which she soon learned to ride. When she spoke she used the Dacotah language, and her name was not Ida at first, but a pretty Indian word.

There were some happy times in the tipi (tent) home and many unhappy ones, for the family lived in the old heathen ways and often they were cold and hungry and miserable.

One day the good white missionary came to visit them and told them about the little church where the Indians might learn about the Heavenly Father, in their own language, and the school for girls, called St. Mary's. Here girls like Ida learned to cook and sew, to read and write, and sing. He asked if he might take Ida back with him.

"Do you want to go?" asked her father.

"Yes," said Ida.

"You will often be lonely, for it is three sleeps away, and we cannot come to see you for six moons."

Yet she still insisted that she wanted to go to school, so she rode away with the missionary. It was all very strange and new to the little girl. For the first time in her life she slept in a real bed between white sheets. She ate at a table instead of from a kettle on the ground. When she had had a bath and was dressed in a dress made by the Junior Auxiliary, with a pretty ribbon on her shining dark hair, you would not have thought she was the same little girl.

She did get very lonely, but there were other little girls to talk to her in the Indian tongue until she learned English, and the teachers were so kind and good that soon she was very happy.

At last there came a day when she was baptized in the chapel and became "Christ's faithful soldier" and a member of the same Church to which you and I belong. When she is older she intends to teach other little Indian girls what she has learned at St. Mary's. In the long summer vacation, which she spends in the tipi home, she puts into practice some of the things she has learned at school.

St. Mary's is only one of many schools which the Church has for the Indians, and some of the money which you are earning this Lent will undoubtedly be sent there. Are you not glad you can help?—Shepherd's Arms.

Cabaniss: Died at Columbia, S. C., March 5, 1918, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, HARLESTON EDWARDS CABANISS, son of Major Charles H. Cabaniss, United States Army, retired.

Ewell: Entered into life eternal on February 25, 1918, at his home, Edge Hill, Prince William County, Va., JOHN S. EWELL, in his ninetieth year.

Frost: MARY ELIZABETH FROST, mother of Mrs. William Forkess, Grace Church Rectory, Pittsburgh, Pa., passed on, Saturday, March 2nd, 1918, in the seventy-third year of her age. Her unassuming manner, her winsome spirit and her many kindly acts have established a large and permanent place in the hearts of all who knew her. Her life indeed was one to thank God for. Missed in body but ever present in spirit will she be.

Fulkerson: MRS. SELINA P., relict of Colonel Abram Fulkerson, died at Bristol, Tenn., January 11, 1918, in her eighty-fifth year. She was a devoted Episcopalian and was one of the founders of Emmanuel Church, Goodson Parish, Bristol, Va.

Morris: While on railroad duty in "The Bluff," JOHN H. MORRIS died suddenly from heart trouble about 3 A. M. March 7th. Mr. Morris was for years a communicant and vestryman of Grace Memorial Church, Lynnwood, and a devotedly regular attendant at the church services. Kindly, gentle and dependable he was liked and respected by all who knew him.

A TRIBUTE.

On Monday evening, January 7th, in the seventy-seventh year of her age, the spirit of MRS. WILLIAM F. ANDERSON, of Covington, Va., passed into the great beyond.

A peculiarly sensitive, timid nature, she loved and suffered much. Of a sunny disposition—gentleness and unselfishness predominating—love of nature and the beautiful was her guiding spirit. Possessed of rare graciousness of manner, and as a young woman, a most beautiful voice, the pathos of which struck deep and nestled forever in the hearts of her hearers.

Loyalty was her watchword.

To those of her family her arms were ever held out in loving embrace, and each member who watched at her bedside, welcomed the release of her suffering into that blessed home where

RESOLUTIONS.

Pursuant to the designation by the vestry of the undersigned to act as its committee in drafting suitable resolutions upon the death of our associate and friend, the late H. R. Berkeley, your committee presents the following resolutions:

Whereas, H. R. Berkeley was a member of the vestry of St. Thomas Episcopal Church of Orange, Va., for a long number of years and filled the position of Recorder with eminent fitness and unswerving devotion, having near to his heart at all times the interests of the church and congregation; and

Whereas, the said H. R. Berkeley was a consecrated, honored and loyal member of the church during his life in the County of Orange; and

Whereas, it pleased Almighty God in His infinite wisdom and mercy to take from us the life of our valued friend and associate on the 16th day of January, 1918, moaned as he is by friends, neighbors and relatives who held him in high esteem.

Therefore, be it resolved, That we record this testimonial to his memory and direct that the same be spread upon the minutes of the vestry; that copies thereof be furnished to local papers and the Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va., and that a copy be forwarded by the Recorder to the members of his family.

HARIOTTE LEE MEADE.

On Thursday, February 28, 1918, the spirit of HARIOTTE LEE (lovingly known as "Hallie") MEADE, went to Paradise, and on Friday, March 1, her body, wearied by long illness, was laid to rest beside many of her departed loved ones in Maplewood Cemetery. A large concourse of sorrowing friends attended the services, which were from Christ Church, of which she had been a member all her life. There was no feature of church work with which she was not actively identified, notably among these were the choir, in days gone by, and the Sunday-school. Besides her church work she was a gifted teacher in the far-famed Piedmont Female Institute, where scores of young women of Virginia and of many other States were educated. This institution was noted not only for its thoroughness in training the mind, but also for the refining influence upon the hearts and lives of its pupils.

"The Piedmont Female Institute Alumnae Association," recently formed, attended her funeral in a body, bearing lovely flowers, thus attesting their affectionate regard for her. Among them were those who had been her fellow pupils, and those whose teacher she had been, and to all a loving, loyal friend.

"Miss Hallie" well known and universally beloved in the community, was the granddaughter of Bishop Meade, and the daughter of the Rev. Richard Kiddie Meade (for thirty-three years rector of Christ Church) and his wife, Elizabeth Brown. She was the sister of the Rev. W. H. Meade, D. D., and the Rev. Frank Meade, two of the beloved presbyters of the Episcopal Church in Virginia. Bishop Richard H. Wilmer's wife was her aunt, and the father of the Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., was her uncle. Rev. Robert N. Meade, of Pittsburg, is her nephew. It does not often happen that one person has been so closely related to and identified with so many, and such distinguished clergymen. "Miss Hallie" manifested in her life the piety, loyalty and devotion to the service of the Master which would naturally flow from such a source and be inhaled from such an atmosphere.

The surviving members of her immediate family are three sisters, one brother, and sundry nephews and nieces. Her sisters are Lucy B., Mary N. and Margaret W. Meade, and her brother, Alexander B. Meade.

In the early dawn of the morning before her spirit departed to Paradise she received the Holy Communion, which was partaken of by her sisters, her faithful nurse and her "beloved physician."

From what her loved ones could gather from the expressions that fell from her lips, from time to time, she felt as she looked forward to the future life:

"My knowledge of that life is small,

The eyes of faith is dim;

But 'tis enough that Christ knows all.

And I shall be with Him."

H. R. LEE.

Personal Notes

The Rev. John G. Larsen will, on April 1, become rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Wichita Falls, Texas, and after that date should be addressed at 1107 Tenth Street, Wichita Falls. He requests that names of the young men of the Church who are stationed at Call Field, the government aviation school there, be sent him.

The Rev. William P. Kemper, of Penn's Grove, N. J., has been granted a three months' leave of absence and is relieving the Rev. C. B. Ackley at St. Bartholomew's Chapel, New York City.

The Rev. Otis E. Gray, of Atchison, Kansas, who has been released by his parish for war work, has been appointed chaplain to the Three Hundred and Fifty-third Infantry at Camp Funsten.

The Rev. Nicholas Rightor, formerly of Savannah, Ga., has entered upon his duties as rector of Grace Church, Lake Providence, La.

The Rev. T. W. C. Cheesman, formerly rector of St. Paul's Church, Pekin, Ill., has entered upon his work as rector of the Church of the Covenant, Junction City, Kans.

The Rev. J. A. Schaad, formerly of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, St. Paul, Minn., who has been conducting Missions and financial campaigns for the past year, has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Bay City, Mich.

The Rev. Walter E. Bentley, rector of the Church of Ascension, Brooklyn, and National Secretary of the Actors' Church Alliance of America, recently closed a very successful ten-day Preaching Mission at the Church of the Holy Faith (Rev. Clifford S. Gregg, rector), Borough of the Bronx, New York City.

The Rev. John L. Saunders has been appointed by the Bishop of Arkansas to take charge of the missions at Searcy, Russellville, Des Arc, Stuttgart and Brinkley, in middle Arkansas.

Archdeacon J. S. Wicks, who had charge of several missions in the Missionary District of North Texas, left February 4 for Cuba, where he has taken up similar work under Bishop Hulse. Beginning April 1, his place in North Texas will be filled by the Rev. William Garner.

Ordinations.

On the third Sunday in Lent, February 3, in St. Thomas' Church, Taunton, Mass., Bishop Babcock advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Leslie F. Wallace, curate of St. Thomas'. This was the first ordination that has ever been held in this church.

In Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, on Thursday, February 21, Mr. Thomas Donaldson was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Murray. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Benjamin B. Lovett and the candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. Hugh Birkhead, to whom Mr. Donaldson will be assistant.

Deaths.

The Rev. Caleb Theophilus Ward, a retired clergyman of the Diocese of

New York, died in Brooklyn, N. Y., on February 17th, aged seventy-five years. Funeral services were held on February 20th, the Rev. Robert Rogers officiating, interment being made in Greenwood Cemetery.

The Will and the Way.

Shortly after the American occupation of the Philippines, General Hughes sent for a young officer of the Second Oregon Volunteers, and ordered him to cleanse and reform Bilibid.

Bilibid was then, and is now, probably the largest prison in the world; moreover, it was at that time the filthiest and the worst penal institution in existence. Its horrors were absolutely unrelatable, and the cleansing of it appeared to be such a task that Hercules' much mooted success at the Augean stables seemed a mere nothing. Filth was literally knee-deep in the prison, while tortures, horrible and unspeakable, were the order of the day. The guards were depraved, besotted by cruelty and license.

When George N. Wolf received General Hughes' order to clean this unthinkable place, he demurred not at all. He did not plead, as perhaps most would have done, that he knew nothing of prisons. He simply and quietly started about the task, although his knowledge of prisons was confined to what he had learned from a single trip to a penal institution.

The man possessed, however, what far surpasses mere experience—initiative, imagination and courage. These have made of Bilibid the finest, most sanitary prison known—not in a day—not in a month—but in years.

Every day in Bilibid four thousand men, spotlessly clean, well kept, well taught, now salute our flag, while their band of half a hundred pieces plays the "Star Spangled Banner." These men are so well trained in all the trades useful in the islands that on their release their services are eagerly sought and no stigma attaches to them on account of their corrective residence in the prison.

This young officer made a remarkable record in the reorganization of Bilibid, and is now considered a fine prison executive, but that is not what makes him notable. Had the general, on summoning him, assigned for his accomplishment another task, it is probable that he would have hesitated and faltered out, "I don't know anything about that kind of work. I never saw it done. I don't know how to begin."

Such words could never have come from such a man. Beyond a doubt he would have saluted, replied, "Very well, sir"—and the work would have been begun forthwith, even if the doing must extend through a score of years.

Unending lessons, incessant schooling, forced instruction, that is the modern tendency. But to each one who lives a full life, comes ultimately an encounter with some unexpected situation—one concerning which there are no instructions in the text-books.

That will be the test. Will the novice, finding no precedent, rise to the occasion as did the young Oregon volunteer, or will he plead, "Oh, I do not know how to accomplish this thing," and fall back supinely.—Elizabeth Whitford.

Sum up the Gospel in a single word, and that one word is "life." Get at the heart of all Christ had to teach, and life is nestling against that heart. One thought determines every other thought; one fact interprets and arranges everything, and that one fact, so dominant and regal, is the deep fact of life. Deeper than faith, for faith is but a name, unless it issue from a heart that lives; deeper than love, though God Himself be love, for without life love would be impossible, life is the compendium of the Gospel, the sweet epitome of all its news; it is the word that gathers in itself the music and the ministry of Christ. "The words that I speak unto you," He said, "they are spirit, and they are life." "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." "I am the resurrection and the life." All that He came to teach, all that He was, is summed and centred in that little word.—G. H. Morrison.

THE GOOD SIDE OF "MILITARISM."

From "A Student in Arms," Second Series. E. P. Dutton & Co.

Before the war I, too, hated "militarism." I despised soldiers as men who had sold their birthright for a mess of pottage. When I first enlisted, and for many months afterwards, the "mummeries of military discipline," the saluting, the meticulous uniformity, the rigid suppression of individual exuberance, chafed and infuriated me. I compared it to a ritualistic religion, a religion of authority only, which depended not on individual assent, but on tradition for its sanction. Now, . . . well, I am inclined to reconsider my judgment. Seeing the end of military discipline has shown me something of its ethical meaning—more than that, of its spiritual meaning.

For though the part of the "great push" that fell to my lot to see was not a successful part, it was none the less a triumph—a spiritual triumph. The war correspondent only sees the outside, and can only describe the outside of things. We who are in the Army, who know the men as individuals, who have talked with them, joked with them, censored their letters, worked with them, lived with them, we see below the surface.

The "Tommy" of the war correspondent is not a human being, but a lay figure with a gift for repartee, little more than the manikin that we thought him in those far-off days before the war when we watched him drilling on the barrack square. We soldiers know better. We know that each one of those men is an individual, full of human affections, many of them writing tender letters home every week, each one longing with all his soul for the end of this hateful business of war which divides him from all that he loves best in life. We know that every one of these men has a healthy individual's repugnance to being maimed, and a human shrinking from hurt and from the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

The knowledge of all this does not do away with the even tread of the troops as they pass, the steady eye and mouth, the cheery jest; but it makes these a hundred times more significant. For we know what these things signify is not lack of human affection, or weakness, or want of imagination, but something super-imposed on these, to which they are wholly subordinated. Over and above the individuality of each man, his personal desires and fears and hopes, there is the corporate personality of the soldier which knows no fear and only one ambition—to defeat the enemy and so further the righteous cause for which he is fighting. In each of those men there is this dual personality; the ordinary human ego that hates danger and shrinks from hurt and death, that longs for home, and would welcome the end of the war on any terms; and also the stronger personality of the soldier who can tolerate but one end of this war, cost what that may—the victory of liberty and justice and the utter abasement of brute force.

And when one looks back over the months of training that the soldier has had, one recognizes how every feature of it, though at the time it often seemed trivial and senseless and irritating, was in reality directed to this end. For from the moment that a man becomes a soldier his dual personality begins. Henceforth he is both a man and a soldier. Before his training is complete the order must be reversed, and he must be a soldier and a man. As a soldier he must obey and salute those whom, as a man, he very likely dislikes and despises. In his conduct he no longer only has to consider his reputation as a man, but still more his honor as a soldier. In all the conditions of his life, his dress, appearance, food, drink, accommodation and work his individual preferences count for nothing, his efficiency as a soldier counts for everything. At first he "hates" this and "can't see the point of" that. But by the time his training is complete he has realized that whether he hates a thing or not, sees the point of a thing or not, is a matter of the uttermost unimportance. If he is wise, he keeps his likes and dislikes to himself.

All through his training he is learning the unimportance of his individuality, realizing that in a national, a world crisis, it counts for nothing. On the other hand, he is equally learning that as a unit in a fighting force his every action is of the utmost importance. The humility which the Army inculcates is not an abject self-depreciation that leads to loss of self-respect and effort. Substituted for the old individualism is a new self-consciousness. The man has become humble, but in proportion the soldier has become exceeding proud. The old personal whims and ambitions give place to a corporate ambition and purpose, and this unity of will is symbolized in action by the simultaneous exactitude of drill, and in dress by the rigid identity of uniform. Anything which calls attention to the individual, whether in drill or in dress, is a crime, because it is essential that the soldier's individuality should be wholly subordinated to the corporate personality of the regiment.

As I said before, the personal humility of the soldier has nothing in it of abject self-depreciation or slackness. On the contrary, every detail of his appearance, and every most trivial feature of his duty assumes an immense significance. Slackness in his dress and negligence in his work are military crimes. In a good regiment the soldier is striving after perfection all the time. And it is when he comes to the supreme test of battle that the fruits of his training appear. The good soldier has learned the hardest lesson of all—the lesson of self-subordination to a higher and bigger personality. He has learned to sacrifice everything which belongs to him individually to a cause that is far greater than any personal ambitions of his own can ever be. He has learned to do this so thoroughly that he knows no fear—for fear is personal. He has learned to "hate" father and mother and life itself for the sake of—though he may not call it that—the kingdom of God on earth.

It is a far cry from the old days when one talked of self-realization, isn't it? I make no claim to be a good soldier; but I think that perhaps I may be beginning to be one; for if I am asked now whether I "loathe militarism in all its forms," I think that the answer is in the negative. I will even go farther and say that I hope that some of the discipline and self-subordination that have availed to send men calmly to their death in war will survive in the days of peace and make of those who are left better citizens, better workmen, better servants of the State, better church men.

The joy of conquest is poor beside the ecstasy of renunciation. The complacency of attainment, the pride of achievement, the flush of success, grows pale before the peace of disappointment. If there is one way in which, more than in any other, God is glorified upon this earth, it is when a man takes the bitter cup of disappointment, and says, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Such men are victorious over defeat by accepting it. Surrender is the supreme grace of the Christian soul. When a man bows meekly down before the will of God, he has reached the highest good.—J. Lewis.

Calm Me, O God.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm;
While these hot breezes blow,
Be like the night-dew's cooling balm
Upon earth's fevered brow!

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm;
Let Thy outstretched wing
Be like the shade of Elim's palm
Beside her desert spring.

Calm as the ray of sun or star
Which storms assail in vain,
Moving unruffled through earth's war
The eternal calm to gain.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The only cure for grief is action.—George Henry Lewes.

The world pays more for pleasure than it does for bread.—Ex.

The right kind of goodness is sure to be good for something.—Ex.

Whoever will take one step to please God will soon want to take another.—Ex.

Whenever God gives us a cross to bear, it is a prophecy that He will also give us strength.—Ex.

Before we can truly possess anything, we must have the spirit that will enable us to enjoy it.—Ex.

It will be found that some of the very best-known people in heaven filled very obscure places while on earth.—Ex.

Get people to believe that it is indeed more blessed to give than to receive, and the church entertainment will die a sudden death.

Unless the mind of a child is fed with that which is good and wholesome, it will be as sure to go astray as a starving sheep.—Ex.

Thy burden is God's gift, And it will make the bearer calm and strong; Yet, lest it press too heavily and long, He says, "Cast it on me, And it shall easy be."

Again and again Jesus urged upon those who listened to Him to "follow" Him. This was to be a sure mark of true discipleship. And it is so still. The men who follow Christ have a right to the name Christian—and they alone.—Exchange.

The spiritual mind develops not so much by study and meditation as by obedience. No man by searching can find out God, yet the weakest of us, by walking in His ways, may know Him, and love Him, and serve Him.—J. S. Hoiden.

We need God more than we ever did. For in the future are problems the magnitude of which we cannot comprehend. After this war, by God's help, has been won, there is the immediate problem of the peace settlement. Shall it be peace upon the best and surest foundations? Or shall it be founded upon the permanence of suspicion and hate?—Selected.

There is something supremely exalting and sublime in the spectacle of the good man who, in the strength of what he believes to be heaven-sent guidance, goes intrepidly forward, noting little of what opposes and may attack, though death itself hang its sword above his head, though the world seem to shake in ruins around him.—C. E. Harris

I will not doubt, though all my ships at sea Come drifting home with broken masts and sails; I will believe the hand which never fails. From seeming evil worketh good for me. And though I weep because those sails are tattered, Still will I cry, while my best hopes lie shattered; "I trust in Thee."

What a shower of mercy comes to the man who prepares for the rich privileges of the Lord's Day! Saturday evening is spent at home, in quiet; he goes to rest early so that he may be ready for a full day, and consecrate as much time as possible to devotion and service, and be fitted for the high demands of public worship. A Sunday of this kind lightens and sweetens every day of the week, refreshing body, soul and spirit, to meet the call of business and the improvement of varied opportunities. Yes, preparedness is the secret of Sunday benedictions.

Thought for the Day.

Don't you remember, tired one, Often, in years departed, When all the day was sodden gray, And all the world sad-hearted, How, when 'twas time to go to bed, You drew aside the curtain For one last sight of riftless night, And stood a space, uncertain, To peer and gaze, and press the glass And doubt your eyes divining, Till with a cry you pointed high—"Oh, look, the stars are shining!"

Can't you believe, discouraged heart, How this, your aching sorrow, That casts its shadow on the sun, May brighten with tomorrow? Go to the window of your soul Before the burden breaks you, And fling it wide and look outside. Whatever vision takes you, Wipe the dim pane of tears' old stain And mists of long repining— And it may be that you will see The blessed starlight shining. —Nancy Byrd Turner.

Seeing and Hearing.

"The blind receive their sight, . . . and the deaf hear."

Yes, some of us, O Lord, are blind!

We fail to see the way of Life,
And o'er our path we oftentimes find
The clouds of doubt, of fear and strife.

Oh, open, Lord, our eyes, that we May see the Light, and follow Thee.

And some of us are deaf to hear

Thy gentle knock, Thy pleading call;
The din of life, forever near.

Keeps from our ears Thy voice withal.
Oh, open, Lord, our ears, that we May heed Thy voice, and follow Thee

Still more of us are dumb to tell

The glorious message of Thy love;
We seek the praise of men too well

To sing the praise of God above.
Oh, open, Lord, our lips, that we May speak to others more of Thee.

And some of us, O Lord, are dead

To all the promptings of the soul;
With careless step life's road we tread,

With selfish ease we seek the goal.
Oh, raise us, Lord, to life, that we May live for evermore with Thee.

And all of us are pressed with cares,

We are perplexed and weak and worn,

Thy golden seed is mixed with tears
That grow more thickly than the corn.

Oh, give us, Lord, Thy strength, that we

May throughout life be strong for Thee.
—The Friend (London).

Confessing Christ.

Why is confession necessary? Feelings that never find utterance may die from suffocation. To confess a sentiment is to strengthen it. To hide a sentiment may be to lose it.

If we only knew it, it is far more difficult to be a secret disciple than an openly avowed follower of the Lord. Secrecy deprives us of the stimulus of publicity. It robs us of the supports that belong to a public confession. The Bible has a great deal to say concerning the giving of expression to our personal faith in Christ. "Every one who shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels of God." This is not a veiled threat. It is a statement of cause and effect. The one makes me fitted in character for the other. It is the fitness of the officer for the office. If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the mouth confession is made into salvation. Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in him and he in God. They that believed came and confessed.

There must surely be something of gracious influence in this expression, or it would never be counselled with such strenuous urgency. A man's faith in God is fortified by the experience of confession.—Dr. J. H. Jowett.

"Too many parents let their children fill their minds with blood and thunder trash, and then find fault with the preacher because they do not join the church."

THE REVEREND JOHN H. MCKENZIE, D. D.
Howe, Indiana.

"Beginning at Jerusalem"—St. Luke XXIV: 47.

Jerusalem has been recaptured and is now under the control of the Allies. This modern crusade brings the Holy City again after many centuries under the control of Christians. An opportunity is offered all Churchmen to share in the redemption of the Holy Land. The Jerusalem and the East Mission ministers alike to Jews, Moslems and Christians. It maintains schools and hospitals at Jerusalem, Haifa and Beirut, and is now engaged in aggressive relief work to all in need.

The American Church has no work of its own in Palestine, but has for years contributed largely to the work of the Anglican Church in Jerusalem, and the Mission makes a bond of common interest between the two Churches.

Churchmen are urged to consecrate their missionary giving for our Lord's own people according to the flesh, especially in this time of great need.

The Just for the Unjust.

Yes, from our sins the Judge of men will save us—

Those haunting sins that made us once their prey,

That stand accusing in the light He gave us,

Or lurk amidst the shadows on our way.

We seek release from bondage and oppression,

Ere yet His warfare in the heart begins;

But He was born to put away transgression,

He came from God to save us from our sins.

O, love too costly for our cold believing!

All our sins were to Him we cannot know;

But the true victim of their guilt receiving,

On to His inmost victory we go.

Yet this freed spirit with His Cross before it Must find the life-long battle hard to win,

And learn of Him who in His body bore it,

To think as He thinks of the weight of sin.

It was the pressure on His Spirit lying In all the holy human ways He trod;

It was the fearful thing He knew, when dying,

He gave His lost creation back to God.

But He did give it back—the wasted treasure

That in our darkest wanderings He could see—

He gave it back at thy redeeming pleasure,

The will of man, Eternal God, to Thee.

A nature that could pierce Him in the hour

That hallowed it with His expiring breath,

Yet yield itself to His reclaiming power,

And suffer in the likeness of His death.

We can requite Him with a free surrender

Of every secret way wherein we live,

By virtue of that love, so deep and tender,

Which has redeemed, and does indeed forgive.

Ours be a faith to all His grace consenting,

Strong through the purpose of that love alone;

To hide us in His wounded heart repenting,

And make His triumph over sin our own.

—A. L. Waring.

A Jerusalem Newspaper.

A son of the founder of the first daily newspaper in Jerusalem, and himself the editor of it for many years, is to return to his native city in company with the American, British and Russian commission starting for Palestine within a fortnight, and there set about resumption of the paper. It was suppressed two years ago by the Turkish authorities following the publication by it of a news story favorable to the allies, and its editor thrown into prison without trial in any form. The paper has been in existence for some thirty years, and was printed in Hebrew, a language which Jews of the city understand, but until now did not speak. Now with the coming of British political control, all Jerusalem is learning to speak Hebrew, almost to the exclusion of every other tongue.

The editor in question tells of the remarkable propaganda of the Germans and their government covering a period of at least ten years before Germany started actual war. The paper tried in vain to get the Reuter News service, but was prevented by the stiff rates charged. The German news service was offered without charge, and would have been used gladly, save that each day, added to other news, were military items to the effect that German guns, German war methods had been adopted by this nation or that, owing to their excellence, while American, British and French had been rejected because poorer. Two million marks a year were said to be lost by Germans in maintaining news service to Constantinople, Jerusalem and Damascus papers, with the aim of influencing public opinion to the German side. The daily, now to be resumed, carried from the first and will now again carry, much news relating to religion.

Large Sums for Denominational Church Work.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., of New York has just gathered about him sixty Baptist benevolences against falling into of Baptist laymen of the country to secure $1,000,000 which is to insure Baptist benevolences against falling into debt this year, as result of the country being at war. More Baptist laymen are to be represented in a meeting to be held in Chicago at the middle of March, and it is now the purpose to launch at Atlantic City in May, when Baptists of the country meet in Convention, a big program modelled in some degrees upon the $100,000,000 projects of American and Canadian Methodists. Baptist leaders say the war has, in their judgment made it possible at this time to inaugurate the biggest move the Baptists of the world ever entered upon.

Church leaders are now thinking and talking in millions and hundreds of millions where before the war they thought thousands. The success of Liberty Loan Funds, of Y. M. C. A. funds and Red Cross is known to be spurring leaders in other Christian bodies to propose campaigns similar to those already launched by Methodists and Baptists.

There is a familiar story about a man who, wishing to sell a small estate, sent for a real estate agent, who prepared a glowing advertisement of it. "Read that again," said the owner. The agent did so. "I don't think I'll sell," said the man. "I have been looking for such an estate all my life, and I did not know I had it."

Mr. Spurgeon used to tell a story of a poor woman and her two children who were destitute. In the depth of winter they were nearly frozen, and the mother took the door of the cellar off the hinges and set it up before the corner, where they crouched down to sleep, that some of the draught and cold might be kept from them. One of the children whispered to her:

"Mother, what do those poor children do who have no cellar door to put up in front of them?" Truly there are very few who cannot "count their blessings" if they only wish to.—Presbyterian.

THE REVELATION OF THE CROSS.

With the awful tragedy of the world's war pressing heavily upon our hearts the lessons of Holy Week ought to come to us with a new significance, and to give us wider and deeper views of God as we seek to know Him in the light of the Cross. The truths revealed in the passion and crucifixion of our Divine Lord are old from eternity; the newness is in our apprehension and acceptance of them. We are too apt to think of the incarnate life of Christ, beginning at Jerusalem and ending on Calvary or the Mount of Ascension, as an isolated period in His eternal existence, extraneous and out of keeping with the rest, a strange episode to which He submitted to meet a special demand upon Him. This is true only as regards the outward manifestation and the work wrought on the stage of human history and in the sphere of time. But this Jesus which was crucified is the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." The Word who "became flesh and dwelt among us," who suffered and died with us and for us, is from everlasting to everlasting the Revealer of God and the forth-going of His character and power and purpose. "Being found in fashion as a man," Jesus did not cease to be this; rather the great purpose of His incarnation was to reveal God where alone man could know Him—in the sphere of human life. Men have sought Him everywhere but here, and have had strange and fantastic notions of God. So too they have missed the key to the earthly life and work of Jesus Christ, and have built up strange theories as to their meaning. Could God be truly revealed in the poverty of a peasant's home and in the shop of a village carpenter? Certainly not, said the men in the synagogue of Nazareth, therefore Jesus' pretensions are false. Can God be revealed and manifested on a Cross, the culmination of a life of humility and service and sacrifice? Surely not, said the pride of the Jew, the wisdom of the Greek, the ambition of the Roman, and so the Cross has been a stumbling-block and foolishness to the world. Yet the truth about God lies just there. If Jesus declared God and manifested
